There are three components of the mass vaccination that the Red Cross uses when they vaccinate a country. First they vaccinate every child age 15 and under. Then, in step two, they go back every three years and vaccinate all of the newborn children. The third step is to make the vaccinations available for free in health centers.

Former student killed in bicycle accident

NORTHAMPTON — A man who hit and killed a former Hampshire College student while she was riding her bicycle on Thursday could face criminal charges, according to Northampton police.

Details of the accident are under investigation, according to police, who have not yet filed charges against the driver, Rafael Sevilla, 25, of Indian Orchard.

Margaret "Meg" Sanders, 23, of Easthampton died after being hit by an armored truck on Elm St., just outside the gates of Smith College around 9 a.m.

Witnesses say the truck took a right turn and hit Sanders as she was riding along side it.

Sevilla had to be treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for emotional trauma. In the emergency room, he reportedly asked police "how bad is the person hurt?" unaware Sanders had already died.

Northampton police are still looking for witnesses near the accident to come forward. Anyone with information is urged to call 587-1105.

Friends of Sanders say her bicycle was her primary mode of transportation, riding it day and night, year round.

A memorial was held for Sanders at 5 p.m. the afternoon after she died. Roughly 100 people attended the service.

Crowd gathers at Sunwheel for fall equinox

By HAYDEN MARX
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the sun began to set in the western sky, a group that would reach nearly a hundred people, gathered to listen to Professor Judith Young give a presentation on the equinox and to later watch the sun set through the Sunwheel.

Young began her presentation by explaining the origins of the Sunwheel. Inspired in the summer of 1992 by a Sunwheel on former Blackfeet Indian territory, she started to think about building one on the UMass Campus. For the next three years, she worked on trying to create one on campus but was stopped by bureaucracy. Finally, on Oct. 17, 1995 she found the right committee to go to and her plan to build the Sunwheel was unanimously approved.

In its first incarnation, the Sunwheel consisted of 12 stones placed to mark the four cardinal directions, and the summer and winter solstice sunrises and sunsets. It was later augmented in 1997 with eight medium-sized rocks to better allow visitors to see where these locations are on the horizon. However, Young was not satisfied with the Sunwheel yet. She wanted to get bigger stones, so that the Sunwheel would be accessible even during the winter, when the ground was covered in snow, and so that the Sunwheel would reach closer to the horizon, allowing visitors an easier way to see their relationship with the sky.

Two years later, in 1999, she obtained the funding necessary to buy the rocks from the National Science Foundation. The next year, the stones were brought up from the Chester Granite Company, located in East Otis MA, to the site. So, after about a decade of work, the Sunwheel was near completion. During the next years, Young made small changes to the Sunwheel, like adding plaques explaining the celestial events and a stone to mark the location of X, a bright star that rises in the East.

After explaining the creation of the Sunwheel, she went on to explain how the sun's progression across the sky works. She said that we see the sun go through a yearly cycle in much the same way a pendulum swings. During the Winter Solstice the sun rises on the right side of the horizon, then, as the year progresses, it rises further to the left each day. Around March 21, the sun is in the middle of its swing and will rise at due east, marking the vernal equinox. This leftward progression ends around June 22, the Summer Solstice, when the sun begins to make its trek back across the sky.

Besides being in motion, the sun also moves like a pendulum in its speed. When a pendulum descends toward the center, it gains speed. When it ascends up towards either side, it slows down, then stops at the apex. Such is the movement of the sun on the skyline. As the sun moves toward the center of the sky, or the equinox, it moves faster across the skyline. However, when it moves towards either of the solstices, it slows down and stops at the point of the solstice for two weeks.

After the presentation, people began to form two lines to see the sun set between the stones forming the West "gate." After they watched the sunset, many people stayed to talk about it.

Andy Morris-Friedman from Hadley said: "The one thing I like best about the Sunwheel is: we get to participate in an event that people have been doing from the beginning of time."

Rich Kowalski, a sophomore, also saw its connection to history. Having visited Stonehenge earlier he said, "It was interesting to see how society would make a Sunwheel today."

Not everyone, however, who came was that excited about the historical significance of the event. Apryl Sabadosa, a junior double major in Continuing Education and Environmental Sciences said she came because, "my environmental-science teacher told us we have to go to one event." She ended liking it though, explaining, "I like watching the sunset."

Also at the event was Laura Young, daughter of Professor Young, who traveled down from New York where she teaches environmental education. She said that she has been a part of the Sunwheel experience since the beginning and loves it.

She summed the event's success over the years as "My mom always has a new way to say it. It's always a different presentation."

Texans return home as Rita falls short of fears

By JULIA SILVERMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PERRY, La. — For the storm-shattered Gulf Coast, the images were all too familiar: Tiny fishing villages in splinters. Refrigerators and coffins bobbing in flood-waters. Helicopters and rescue boats making house-to-house searches of residents stranded on the rooftops.

But as the misery wrought by Hurricane Rita came into clearer view — particularly in the hard-to-reach marsh towns along the Texas-Louisiana line — the lasting signs that emerged a day after the storm's 120-mph landfall were of an epic evacuation that saved countless lives, and of destruction that fell short of the Katrina-sized fears.

"As bad as it could have been, we came out of this in pretty good shape," Texas Gov. Rick Perry said after taking a helicopter tour Sunday.

Even with nearly 1 million in the region without electricity, some coastal towns flooded to the rooftops and the prospect of nearly 3 million evacuated residents pouring back onto the highways for home, the news was overwhelmingly positive.

Petrochemical plants that supply a quarter of the nation's gasoline suffered only a glancing blow, with just one major plant facing weeks of repairs. The refloding in New Orleans from levee breaks was isolated mostly to areas already destroyed and deserted, and could be pumped out in as little as a week. And contrary to dire forecasts, Rita and its heavy rains moved quickly north as a tropical depression instead of parking over the South for days and dumping a predicted 25 inches of torrential rains.

Most significantly, deaths were minimal — with only two deaths reported so far — largely because residents with fresh memories of Katrina heeded evacuation orders and the storm followed a path that spared Houston and more populous stretches of the coast.

Along the central Louisiana coastline where Rita's heavy rains and storm-surge flooding pushed water up to nine feet in homes, more than 100 boats gassed up at an Abbeville car dealership Sunday before venturing out on search-and-rescue missions to find hundreds of residents believed to have tried to ride out Rita.

About 500 people were rescued from high waters along the Louisiana coast in the immediate aftermath of the storm and emergency calls were still coming in from far-flung areas near the Gulf of Mexico.

"The flooding is still extensive," said Michael Bertrand of the Vermilion Parish Office of Emergency Preparedness, adding that water was actually creeping into areas that were spared flooding Saturday. "We'll be going back through there to see if there's anybody left."

During a helicopter tour, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, whose Cajun roots run deep in the region, got her first look at the hardest-hit areas.

In Cameron Parish, just across the state line from Texas and in the path of Rita's harshest winds east of the eye, fishing communities were reduced to splinters, with concrete slabs the only evidence that homes once stood there. Debris was strewn for miles by water or wind. Holly Beach, a popular vacation and fishing spot, was gone. Only the stilts that held houses off the ground remained.

A line of shrimp boats steamed through an oil sheen to reach Hackberry, only to find homes and camps had been flattened. In one area, there was a flooded high school football field, its bleachers and goal posts jutting from what had become part of the Gulf of Mexico.

"In Cameron, there's really hardly anything left. Everything is just obliterated," said Blanco, who has asked the federal government for $34 billion to aid in storm recovery.

Added Maj. Gen. Bennett Landreneau, head of the Louisiana National Guard: "This is terrible. Whole communities are gone."

Some bayou residents arrived with boats in hopes of getting back in to survey the damage to their property, but state officials sealed off the borders and weren't letting anyone in. But all it took was a scan of the Intracoastal waterway to see a hint of the damage: refrigerators and even a few coffins from the area's above-ground cemeteries bobbing in the water.

A tree lies fallen on a van at a house in Port Arthur, Texas, on Sunday. The southeast region of Texas recently began recovery efforts.

AFROTC students get Air Force scholarships

By SARAH FREDOH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the Air Force ROTC program at the University of Massachusetts was notified recently about their scholarship winners for the fall 2005 term, they were surprised at the high number.

"This was the best year anyone here can remember. We normally get three or four, but this year we pulled in nine," said Lt. Col. Ian Fitzgerald, the AFROTC Detachment Commander.

The scholarship process begins in the winter. When I choose my strongest cadets to compete at the Air Force-wide scholarship boards that are held each year at AFROTC headquarters in Montgomery, Alabama," explains Fitzgerald. Scholarship board members then judge the cadets on a number of different factors, including high GPAs, physical fitness, and the cadet's individual scores on an officer qualification test.

This year, the Air Force ROTC did exceptionally well, "winning scholarships for most of the cadets we nominated with a sum of over a half a million dollars. Some of our cadets won scholarships that pay 80 percent of tuition and fees, which at schools like Mt Holyoke, Smith, and Western New England College, is a good chunk of change," said Fitzgerald. Each scholarship winner also receives $610 per year for books and a monthly living stipend of $250 to $400, depending on the school year.

When asked his feelings on receiving a scholarship, Cadet Raymond Geoffroy, a third year UMass student, said "It's very exciting knowing that not only do I have a guaranteed career upon my graduation, but I also won't have to worry about paying back a single student loan. Thanks to my scholarship, I'm able to focus on my studies and not worry about finances, a concern that is often on the minds of most of my friends outside of the ROTC program."

Cadet Edward Sweeny, a fellow third year UMass student, said, "If being part of the greatest Air Force in the world isn't amazing enough, getting scholarship money from them to pursue my dreams is an indescribable feeling."

"It's wonderful to see these students being rewarded for all their hard work," Fitzgerald said.

There are six requirements cadets need to meet in order to qualify and compete for the scholarship for an AFROTC Scholarship. A cadet needs to be a full time student in good academic standing, a U.S. citizen, 18 years or older, able to pass the Air Force Officer Qualifying test, able to pass the AFROTC physical fitness test, and able to meet weight and body fat requirements.

The minimum GPA a cadet needs to maintain in order to qualify is a 2.5. Cadets from every major are encouraged to apply, Lt. Col Fitzgerald says. "We have cadets from many different majors, from Psychology to Biology to the ever-popular Undecided."

Aside from attending classes and maintaining a good GPA, cadets are expected to contribute between five and seven hours a week to the AFROTC Program. Two hours are devoted to a program called Leadership Laboratory which "focuses on developing the cadets' leadership skills," Fitzgerald says. Another two hours are spent improving the physical fitness of the cadets through activities such as basketball, swimming, running and ultimate frisbee. The last one to two hours are devoted to one academic class, in which cadets learn about aviation history, leadership, and writing skills, etc. "It's a fun program, and over 80 percent of the students that participate return for their second year," Fitzgerald said.

The next Air Force AFROTC Scholarship board will be meeting in February 2006.

Hampshire College President Ralph J. Hexter announced that a memorial would soon be held in Sanders' benefit.

"Meg was a remarkable young woman who was held in the highest esteem by all who knew and worked with her," Hexter said to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Sanders was heavily involved in fundraising for AIDS research after both her parents died of AIDS in the early 1990s in Chattanooga, Tenn. She was raised by her aunt.

Sanders participated in the Massachusetts Red Ribbon Ride and a volunteer of AIDS Care Hampshire County. She most recently worked at a women's shelter for domestic abuse victims in Northampton, Safe Passage and a bookbindery in Easthampton, Wide Awake Garage.

She graduated from Hampshire College in 2004 with a concentration in book art.

a bus ticket and having to take time off of work to get to the heath center can be impoverishing for people," said Grabowsky.

In order to get the vaccinations to people, the program went to people's homes, schools, and towns and set up temporary vaccination posts.

Measles is an extremely contagious single stranded virus, which causes blindness, throat infections that often lead to malnutrition, pneumonia, and diarrhea. Due to the overcrowding in developing countries, the disease spreads easily, said Grabowsky.

Grabowsky wanted to inspire students, "I want to show students you can accomplish great things when you have a great problem; it is not hopeless," he said.

Sarah Beladi, a UMass junior and microbiology major said, "I liked the lecture, it was refreshing to see how successful the program is and that people are doing what they can to prevent death. I think this model of prevention could be used to treat other diseases as well."

In the June 2002 campaign, the program went to Kenya and set up 12,000 vaccination sites. They had 24,000 heath workers and 6,000 Red Cross volunteers. According to Grabowsky, they were able to cover 93 percent of the country.

Due to the success of the program, the Red Cross is planning on expanding geographically, as well extending as their services. They are working to combat malaria, the leading killer of children in Africa, by handing out insecticide bed nets. Children who sleep under bed nets reduce their chances of contracting malaria by 25 percent. The bed nets last for three to five years and are not harmful to children.

The UMass Red Cross Club and The Student Activities Center sponsored this event. President of the UMass Red Cross Club, Elyse Lichtenthal, said, "A lot of people benefited from being here. Students interested in international public health can benefit from this information towards their studies and careers."

This lecture was among a series the UMass Red Cross Club will be sponsoring.

"The series will bring a sense of what the American Red Cross is doing internationally, and what students can do here, from home. This series will span the course of the year and bring to the campus an exciting array of workshops, seminars, fund-raisers, socials, and more," said Lichtenthal.

Rally is held to support U.S. troops

By Elisabeth Goodridge
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Support for U.S. troops fighting abroad mixed with anger toward anti-war demonstrators at home as hundreds of people, far fewer than organizers had expected, rallied Sunday on the National Mall just a day after a massive protest against the war in Iraq.

"No matter what your ideals are, our sons and daughters are fighting for our freedom," said Marilyn Faatz, who drove from New Jersey to attend the rally. "We are making a mockery out of this. And we need to stand united, but we are not."

About 400 people gathered near a stage on an eastern segment of the mall, a large photo of an American flag serving as a backdrop. Amid banners and signs proclaiming support for U.S. troops, several speakers hailed the effort to bring democracy to Iraq and Afghanistan and denounced those who protest it.

Many demonstrators focused their ire at Cindy Sheehan, the California woman whose protest near President Bush's Texas home last summer galvanized the anti-war movement. Sheehan was among the speakers at Saturday's rally near the Washington Monument on the western part of the mall, an event that attracted an estimated 100,000 people.

"The group who spoke here the other day did not represent the American ideals of freedom, liberty and spreading that around the world," Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican, told the crowd. "I frankly don't know what they represent, other than blaming America first."

One sign on the mall read "Cindy Sheehan doesn't speak for me" and another "Arrest the traitors"; it listed Sheehan's name first among several people who have spoken against the war.

Melody Vigna, 44, of Linden, Calif., said she wants nothing to do with Sheehan and others at nearby Camp Casey, an anti-war site set up to honor her son, Casey, who was killed in Iraq.

"Our troops are over there fighting for our rights, and if she was in one of those countries she would not be able to do that," Vigna said.

The husband of Sherri Francescon, 24, of Camp Lejeune, N.C., serves in the Marine Corps in Iraq. One of the many military wives who spoke during the rally, Francescon said that the anti-war demonstration had left her frustrated.

"I know how much my husband does and how hard he works, and I feel like they don't even recognize that and give him the respect he deserves," Francescon said. "I want him to know and I want his unit to know that America is behind them, Cindy doesn't speak for us, and that we believe in what they are doing."

Organizers of Sunday's demonstration acknowledged that their rally would be much smaller than the anti-war protest but had hoped that as many as 20,000 people would turn out.

On Saturday, demonstrators opposed to the war in Iraq surged past the White House in the largest anti-war protest in the nation's capital since the U.S. invasion. The rally stretched through the night, a marathon of music, speechmaking and dissent on the mall.

Area news in brief

Hampshire student facing criminal charges after car accident

HADLEY — A Hampshire College student was arrested Friday after she allegedly failed to yield when entering the Mountain Farms Mall parking lot around 7:19 p.m.

Samantha Smith, 20, of West St. in Amherst was arrested and charged with operating a motor vehicle without a license and failure to yield right of way. Police say Smith was traveling north on South Maple St., turned left into the entrance to Wal-Mart and struck the side of 2004 Nissan.

The Nissan then spun around and hit a 1998 Honda van.

Two people were hurt in the accident, Peter Choi, 57, of 161 Pomeroy Lane in Amherst and his passenger, Young Choi, also 57 of the same address were transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for treatment. The driver of the van, Deidrce L. Waters, 50, of Feeding Hills and Smith were unhurt.

Developer scales back Hobart plans

NORTH AMHERST — The developer who proposed building a housing complex on Hobart Lane said the project will be reduced from 250 to 200 units.

Lance Hannah, senior associate of Texas-based JPI, said the company would contribute $500,000 for community recreational projects.

The land being discussed was previously owned by Hope Church, which planned to build a new church there over ten years ago. JPI originally asked the town to take the land by eminent domain, as the church plan had stalled for some time. Instead, the town formed the "Land Use Committee," which examines the best uses for the land.

The Land Use Committee will continue to meet until it presents its ideas to the Town Meeting beginning Nov. 2.

Frat installs new sprinkler system

AMHERST — One University of Massachusetts fraternity has made major improvements in fire prevention.

Theta Chi, 496 North Pleasant St., has installed a new sprinkler system on all four floors, Allied Fire of Chicopee installed the system, which cost $125,000.

Officials are applauding the measure by the frat, which went above and beyond state regulations. Amherst Fire Department Assistant Chief Lindsay Strongren says sprinklers are not required in existing buildings, which he thinks is unfortunate. The law does say, however, that new fraternities and sororities must install sprinkler systems.

Smith College approved to make new capital improvements

NORTHAMPTON — A $33 million financing package just approved by MassDevelopement for Smith College will go towards capital improvement projects.

The projects will include making improvements and additions on campus. Officials say the Nelson Library will receive upgrades to its heating and cooling systems and a renovation of the power plant will begin next year. Several 60-year-old boilers will be replaced by a single turbine engine that will drive an electric generator.

The University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate is set to hold a general meeting tomorrow night at 7 p.m. in Campus Center room 168.

The meeting's agenda will include discussing a proposed constitutional amendment regarding voting procedure, a proposal for reform of the funding formula for student legal services and the formation of a proposed joint GSS-Graduate Employee Organization Housing Committee, according to GSS President Uri Strauss.

Anyone with am questions should call Strauss at 413-545-2896.

Credit Union finds high student debts

By Judith Hudson
The Miami Hurricane

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — On any given day, students passing through the Breezeway can walk away with a new credit card — and a financial debt waiting to happen. Credit card companies are bombarding millions of students across college campuses each year, setting up tables with free giveaways to entice college students to sign up. But if students don't read the fine print, they might graduate with more debt than just college loans.

"Most students are still under the umbrella of their parents," Michael Cook, member service representative at UM Credit Union, said. "They don't understand the ramifications of their actions. They don't know how hard it is to rebuild their credit after it has been ruined."

According to a 2004 study in credit card usage among college students conducted by Nellie Mae, student loan provider, 76 percent of undergrads have a credit card. On average, college students have a debt of $2,169 and only 22 percent report paying off their cards each month. For the remaining 78 percent, the numbers add up to one thing — debt. Fortunately, there are many preventive measures students can take.

"I would advise the UM students to join the credit union," Cook said. "In fact, they don't have to join this credit union. Any financial institution where someone will sit down and explain how credit works [will do]. Someone who sets up a table and wears a Bank of America T-shirt might not be who they say they are."

Although credit cards can be a great way to build credit for when students need to take out loans or rent their first apartments, they must be used carefully. Misuse of credit cards, including late payments or no payment at all, may lead to consequences that stay on cardholders' credit reports for years. In the case of a joint account, the main cardholder's credit suffers if the secondary holder doesn't make a payment on time.

David J. Young II, shown in Beaumont, Texas, recieved credit cards while in college and now is in debt by several thousand dollars.

Priest resigns due to financial flap

NEWTON (AP) — A Newton priest has resigned at the request of the Boston Archdiocese because his parish-funded car and monthly stipend violate archdiocesan rules, he said on Saturday.

The Rev. Walter Cuenin, who publicly disagrees with the Catholic church's policies limiting the roles of women and homosexuals in the church, said he will step down after 12 years as pastor of Our Lady Help of Christians.

Cuenin gave no indication that his ouster was related to his past criticism of Cardinal Bernard Law's handling of the clergy sex abuse crisis, or his continued support of gays and lesbians at Our Lady.

"The archdiocese has advised me that the monthly stipend paid to me by the parish and the automobile lease by the parish for my use and the use of visiting priests violates archdiocesan policy and requires my resignation," Cuenin, who was out of town Saturday, said in a statement distributed at the parish.

The archdiocese, which is closing dozens of parishes because of its financial problems brought about in part by the sex abuse scandal, declined to comment.

"The only (thing) I can say is we make every effort not to speculate on personnel matters," archdiocese spokesman Terrence Donilon said. Cuenin said he was continuing a parish precedent of accepting a monthly stipend from the parish, which was in place when he arrived in 1993. He did not specify the amount of the stipend.

The parish's finance council expressed "shock and dismay" with the archdiocese's decision. In a prepared statement, members Andrew Majewski, John Marshall, Chris Graf and Bill Bradway said they approved the stipend and the car, and that the parish's annual financial statements have been audited several times by the archdiocese.

"We are greatly distressed by the implication of impropriety in the matter of the stipend and the leasing of

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

I want a government I can trust

Matthew Giancola

On the evening of Nov. 2, 2000, I was sitting in my room watching the election coverage with intrigued eyes. I was a freshman in high school and having been too young to really remember the election of 1996, I was interested in how the process worked. I had some sense of politics at this time, watching the news more often than others my age. I was rooting for the Governor of Texas, George W. Bush. In the debates he seemed, to my young self, to be the better candidate. Al Gore was monotonous and cold and I couldn't make sense of his positions.

Bush spoke like he was the guy that lived down the street you always passed by on the way home from school. Awaking the morning after, I was pleasantly surprised to see that Gore had in fact not won — well, for the time at least. I considered myself after that date to be a conservative, a Republican. After all, the guy I was rooting for was, I should be too.

After inauguration, politics became boring for Americans. There were more important things to do. Then Sept. 11 came, and the nation was suddenly transformed. We were shocked and devastated, defiant yet scared. We needed a leader to guide us through this.

But governing should not be about beating someone else. It's about making the country better when you leave than when you started. Government should be about helping people.

When President Bush spoke at the ruins a few days after the attacks, I watched with tears in my eyes as he comforted the city. I watched his address to the Joint Session of Congress and thought that I was very possibly witnessing the greatest president of our time give the speech that rallied the nation. He had my trust and admiration and the hope of millions by his side.

And then, he blew it. He turned what could have been a time when Americans began to understand all the great things that this country represents, and appreciate all the differences that make us all unique into a partisan mockery: a game of us against them, Republicans versus Democrats, patriots versus traitors. A game where winning is the most important aspect of governing.

But governing should not be about beating someone else. It's about making the country better when you leave than when you started. Government should be about helping people. It should stand for equality, liberty and justice; for helping those who, due to physical or social circumstances beyond their control, cannot help themselves.

Government should not be used to help self-sustaining corporations as is the case in the recently adopted energy bill. In this monument too big, wasteful government, millions of dollars are given to big oil companies that make hundreds of millions of dollars in annual profits; companies that aren't in dire need of receiving federal subsidies. To paraphrase Massachusetts Congressmen Ed Markey, "Adam Smith would be spinning in his grave." This money should go into helping small start-up businesses get on their feet. And since this is an energy bill, that money could go to companies developing new, clean energy alternatives.

But that would conflict with a vital source of money for the Republican Party, wouldn't it? You know your party is more obsessed with power than helping America when it would rather help terror-funded oil companies in Saudi Arabia than have good old American ingenuity be the source our energy. If President Bush announced today that in 10 years we would be completely energy efficient, America would not only be free from getting into foreign entanglements in response to our energy needs, but the condition of our environment would improve dramatically.

But doing that almost makes too much sense. Where's the partisanship in that? If these are so-called liberal ideas, how do conservatives retaliate? What are the opposition talking points?

And that's where I differ from both parties. It shouldn't be about ideology. It should be about doing what is right, at all costs for our fellow citizens, especially the ones in need. The President squandered a golden opportunity not because he's simply a conservative, but because his administration is so incompetent at executing the missions they say they will accomplish.

They say they will make America safer but they fail to secure our ports because it might hurt profits for shippers. They say they will improve the image of America throughout the world and yet they allow the men and women of our armed forces to torture suspected terrorists, by refusing to support a bill introduced by Senator John McCain that would make it illegal to torture detainees. And then there's the incompetence of helping Katrina victims.

I want a government that I can trust; a government worthy of its fine citizens. A government that truly stands ready to help its poor and weak, not one interested in power and greed. Is that too much to ask?

Free isn't always better

Allison Edles

Cheap is good but free is always better. This statement can be applied to just about anything and holds true for the most part. If you're going to get a discount on something, then that's wonderful, but it would ultimately be better if you could just, you know, have it free of charge. So how about a college education? Yeah, that should be free too, right?

According to a cnn.com article, currently in Alaska, there is a provision that allows "Alaskans age 60 or older can take classes without paying tuition if seats are not filled by paying students." There was a rally in Alaska recently where about 5,400 of Alaska's senior citizens decided to protest the new policy of ending the waiver.

Remaining active when you're older is extremely important. I'm not even talking so much about physical activity, just any activity that gets you out of the house and away from yourself. Attending classes at a college or university is a fantastic way to occupy your time and also educates you on the hip, new, trendy ways of thinking. However, it's not a free service. If education was free to everyone, well, this country would be a lot smarter as a whole. Students get a lot of breaks on tuition and fees, albeit not nearly enough. Schools spend so much money annually working on campaigns to attract new prospective students. If those students have to pay, who seem to be the primary focus, then why shouldn't senior citizens pay as well?

Cheating is universally not tolerated for the very reason that a student who cheats is stealing he prize that many hardworking students have worked for. School is very expensive and to attend a university without paying is just the same as a student who excels buy cheating.

There are many public educational services that are free and absolutely great. If you happen to live in an area where there is a college or university. Right here at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, in our own W.E.B. DuBois library, everything is available to any resident who has a library card/student ID. Library cards in this day and age, are free too, which goes along with creed of this column.

As it stands right now, tuition in Alaska (although at which specific school I cannot say as the article neglected to mention) is around $1,392. Compare that to what we as UMass students pay every semester, not to mention the out-of-staters, $1,392 is by no means a cheap number, but it's on the cheaper end of the scale compared with what we're used to here. There is, however, a middle ground.

Senior citizens were able to take classes in Alaska for free if there were open spots that were unable to be filled by students. Rather than having them pay the proposed tuition, (which is scheduled to increase, as always), have them just pay for the credits for the class they're sitting in on. The only exception to this would be, of course, if they're taking a full semester's load of courses which, at ages 60 and over, would be quite amazing and praiseworthy.

From a professor's point of view, many of whom have tenure, students are usually students, who come to school to get an education. There isn't always a special differentiation that comes with being older if they're in the class. However, fairness among students by providing them all an equal opportunity to learn is something that is stressed very strongly.

For example, cheating is universally not tolerated for the very reason that a student who cheats is stealing the prize that many hardworking students have worked for. School is very expensive and to attend a university without paying is just the same as a student who excels buy cheating.

Also, the parameters for a non-paying student are not clearly defined and bring up a lot of questions. Are they officially enrolled in the university and classified as a student? Are they a non-degree student? Do they have to follow the same rules and codes of conduct as all the other students? And finally, what policies specifically do and don't apply to them pertaining to within the classroom?

If a senior student is taking an exam, cheats and is caught, the punishment is a lot more ambiguous. After all, if you expel them, what would it matter? They already have had or currently have a job so it wouldn't affect their employment record. They presumably already have a family, with kids and grandkids, so where would the punishment lie?

Obviously, the only factor holding that whole system together is the honest motivation of the senior students and the trust system of the administration. Maybe one day there will be a school program that will enable tuition to be waived for certain candidates but until that day, I'm just going to stick with my discounts.

The pill and the police

Chris Eckel

In case you haven't been reading the newspaper, browsing the Internet or in general, paying any attention to life at all, a man named John Roberts is being debated as a candidate for the next Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He seems competent enough, but he won't be easily confirmed. It seems like one of the big obstacles to his nomination is that many feel he would overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal. Essentially, the logic behind the original decision was that a woman should have the right to privacy to do with her body as she wishes, and that the state shouldn't be allowed to infringe upon that privacy by outlawing abortion.

Now, I'm not here to debate abortion. I wholly admit to being on the fence about it. Instead, I'm thinking of another privacy issue that slipped below the Katrina/Roberts/Rita/Red Sox clogged news radar this week. The FBI has apparently been spying on college students uninvolved in illegal activities for some time now. John S. Friedman of The Nation writes about Brad Goodnight, a 21-year-old student at North Carolina State University.

Now don't get me wrong, I respect the men and women in the law enforcement agencies across this country. But an FBI agent in Amherst seems a little bit excessive, unless the Red Sox riots are an Al Qaeda plot.

According to The Nation, one evening, "an FBI agent and plainclothes officers approached Goodnight and asked him to accompany them to police headquarters." Once there, the article said they inquired about some of his friends, about his role in some liberal campus groups and other seemingly trivial questions. "Goodnight said he was told, 'We have paid informers and treat them well,'" and was warned that he would be closely monitored if he didn't cooperate. Despite the intimidation tactics, Goodnight, an innocent man, refused to cooperate with the investigation, was not charged with any offense and was soon released, according to the article.

Sounds rather troubling, doesn't it? Good thing we don't have to worry about it up here in Amherst, since all the problems are happening at NCSU. Except, according to the Friedman article, our fine institution has recently admitted to having a full-time FBI agent on the police force. Now don't get me wrong, I respect the men and women in the law enforcement agencies across this country, but an FBI agent in Amherst seems a little bit excessive, unless the Red Sox riots are an Al Qaeda plot.

Even more strangely, the university is paying this agent's salary. In such tight times, couldn't that money be better spent elsewhere?

But it gets even worse. If UMass is anything like the University of Toledo, this agent isn't exactly accountable to those paying his/her salary. John Dauer, chief of the University of Toledo's police force, has been quoted as saying, "I had no idea what the (FBI) officer was doing." Such sentiment makes one rather uncomfortable. We are all most likely paying part of this agent's salary. Shouldn't any employer be entitled to know where his/her money is going? Picture yourself asking the chair of the English department what one of her professors was working on. Can you imagine her admitting, "Oh, I don't really know." Didn't think so. Seems kind of odd to be paying someone to violate our privacy rights in clandestine fashion.

So, this is your United States. A woman is entitled to the privacy to do what she wishes with her body, but apparently, the same courtesy isn't extended to college students at certain universities. So be careful out there, UMass. I have no doubt that, other than the jerk that pushed you at Club Sidewalk the other night, we are all good, upstanding people, but that's not how the FBI sees it, apparently. The guy sitting next to you in class might not care that you're on the pill, but he sure might perk up if you tell him you're planning on going to the peace march.

It doesn't matter to him whether it's because you believe in the cause or just because the cute guy sitting on the other side of you asked you to go. No matter where the FBI might be lurking, stand up for what you believe in, but be smart about it. It was intelligent debate that founded this great nation centuries ago, and it continues to be the best hope for the sustained success of democracy. Let's hope the debate over John Roberts isn't the last debate that echoes all over Amherst this year.

Hurricane support imperative

Jessica Katz

Do you know what it's like to lose everything you've ever known in a matter of minutes? Your house, your car, your way of life all gone in one night? I know what it's like to feel truly lucky that I'm alive. My name is Jessica and I survived a category 5 Hurricane. The mother of all hurricanes killing thousands, causing billions of dollars in damage and making a historic memory in the lives it destroys. In July of 1992 my family bought a new house hoping to bring new opportunities. However, one month later Hurricane Andrew plunged into our neighborhood and squashed any dreams of normalcy.

At 8-years-old, I saw my father cry for the first time, fearful of what tomorrow may inevitably bring. We survived glass blowing at 90 miles an hour from every direction, and howling winds that brought down trees four stories high. When the night was over, we opened the door and it was as if the end of the world was near. I couldn't believe my eyes, everything that once made Miami beautiful, vanished. In the aftermath of the hurricane my parents shipped my brother and I off to West Palm Beach, Fla. for a two week stay with my Grandmother while they sorted things out. At the time, we had no idea how serious things were. There was no food, water, electricity of any kind. We had a pet alligator swimming in our pool for three days. Now my mom refers to our pool as a relocation center, back then it was no joking matter.

When we came back home for good, school didn't start until October. Eventually the schools did re-open but mostly in shifts to help those schools that were completely demolished. For an entire year I went to school from 6 a.m. to 12 p.m. My teacher, Mrs. Oatmeyer, had a complete nervous breakdown and could barely even function for herself let alone teach us anything new. Needless to say, 1992 to 1993 was a struggle for everyone in South Florida.

I know what it's like to lose everything and I'm begging you all to never stop helping. Soon there will be people in Texas whose biggest fear

Hurricanes, tornadoes and earthquakes are devastating but in the last two years that I've attended UMass Amherst, I have never seen any interest from my fellow students about any hurricanes. It took something so tragic to make people raise money in the masses at this school. Well, Hurricane Katrina is yesterday's news because today Hurricane Rita is a category five and Texas is a new target. No matter how bad Katrina was and how much praying people do, Rita will be worse. I don't want to sugar coat it because I know it like it's a fact. I know what's it like to lose everything and I'm begging you all to never stop helping. Soon there will be people in Texas whose biggest fear is starting over. They will have nothing left but endless disaster. Help because it's the right thing to do and don't stop because if people stopped helping when Miami was in its revival stages, many people's homes would still be in disrepair 13 years later.

Every year hurricanes hit along the coast and every year during hurricane season I glue myself to the TV praying that it won't hit my family. If there was a hurricane that reached the shore, my friends ask if they were hit and then quickly move off subject as if it's not important because I am not personally affected therefore there's nothing to worry about. Well, guess what? There is something to worry about. People die from natural disasters and to neglect them in their need just because it doesn't personally affect you is disgusting. Katrina's devastation isn't the first natural disaster and won't be the last and I can only hope that those who have helped will continue to do so this year and years to come.

'Flightplan' is bumpy ride

'Flightplan'
Directed by Robert Schwentke
Starring Jodie Foster, Peter Sarsgaard
Touchstone Pictures
93 minutes
Grade C

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

Before we even set foot inside the movie theater, "Flightplan" made an unspoken deal with us. It called to us from the previews, telepathically beckoned us and confidently assured us. It said, without saying anything, "see our film and we promise: the grabber we've shown you here in the previews will be resolved in an intelligent and satisfying manner."

The grabber was simple. Jodie Foster is the recently widowed Kyle Pratt, who's flying to Long Island to deliver her husband's casket to her daughter's grandparents. Mid-flight, she wakes up from a nap to find that her daughter has disappeared. Pratt must find her daughter in the face of a disbelieving crew.

It's a compelling situation that immediately calls to mind films that have had similar grabbers the kind of plot setups that leave us totally baffled as to what answers lie beneath the surface. For instance, there was the Julianne Moore flick, "The Forgotten," where her son disappears and no one thinks she ever had a son (are there no laws against plagiarism in Hollywood?) Or "Jacob's Ladder," where demons materialize out of nowhere throughout the films setup. It leaves us helpless to pray that the resolution isn't contrived. Some films, like "The Forgotten," take the easy way out, blaming the mess on supernatural beings. "Jacob's Ladder" was quite intelligent, on the other hand.

"Flightplan" is written by Peter Adewling and Billy Ray, and they are to be commended for finding an explanation to the film's grabber that isn't supernatural, makes a little bit of sense and that we can run with while watching the film. The film's problems mainly come into play with some of Foster's acting and the direction by Robert Schwentke. There are scenes that just don't work, lines that fall dead and shots that are just strange. Schwentke has a thing for slow motion and some of these shots give the film an unnatural and forced feel.

Foster is very uneven. She displays some considerable acting talent in some scenes – tears, terror and love for her daughter but there are quite a few scenes where it looks like the director is just making her look bad or the editor took the wrong take. It's hard to find another reason for such an obviously talented actor giving such a lopsided and often times over-the-top performance. The rest of the acting is stellar. Sean Bean does a wonderful turn as the captain of the plane and Erika Christensen (Michael Douglas' daughter in "Traffic") is good as a suspiciously strange flight attendent.

One point of contention has to do with the issue of racism with which the film flirts. In the post-9/11 world, I suppose films that comment on Arabs' involvement in terrorism were inevitable. But here Foster accuses two Arabs of spying on her and in the last scene one carries a bag for her – it all just feels dim-witted. To put a statement like this in the middle of a popcorn movie trivializes it and brings both the statement and the film into the pits. This aspect of the film is slightly laughable.

"Flightplan" is mildly thrilling at points, especially towards the end, and it is very engaging. But the more I thought about the film, the clearer it became to me that the explanation it provides for the disappearance of Foster's daughter and the fact that the crew thinks her daughter has died is filled with holes. There are about three or four very big questions it all calls to mind — none of which are answerable. The entire plotline is preposterous. In the end, despite its intense and compelling story, "Flightplan" is a bumpy ride.

Hawaii. When mentioned, one conjures up images of surfing, palm trees, golfing and bikinis. What are not usually associated with Hawaii are original artists such as John Cruz.

Cruz won a Grammy in 2005 and a Na Hoku Hanohano award in 1997. He is a native Hawaiian, but also a UMass alumni. His tour will make a stop in Northampton on Tuesday at the Iron Horse Music Hall.

Rating: 7.8
Quiet Storm Records

What should one expect from a John Cruz show? Mellowness, to be sure. His CD, "Acoustic Soul," is a ten-track audio chill-out. Hawaiian to the core, this CD fits tightly into its genre. It opens with "Island Style," which sets the tone for the entire album. Acoustic guitar-driven and accompanied by Cruz's harmonious vocals, the tracks on this CD make one want to hum along while drinking coconut milk. Cruz alternates between English and Hawaiian throughout the album, which makes for a combination that most popular music fans aren't used to. It is enjoyable, even if it's tough to sing along. For instance, "Kawa ilehua'a'alakahonua" is entirely in Hawaiian, and no one has any idea how to pronounce the name of the song.

While "Acoustic Soul" is all original songs, with a few exceptions, it can also come across as stereotypical, laid-back surfer music. The songs can blend together to the undiscerning ear and the rhythms tend to be similar, so one should not listen to this album if they are looking for a diverse collection of tracks. This is not progressive rock, but it is a collection of themes that aren't usually found in Hawaiian music. "Impossible Anna" is jazz influenced and was actually inspired by a drunk heckler at one of Cruz's shows, so it shows his upbeat outlook on life and his ability to laugh off uncomfortable situations. "Kahala Moon" is reminiscent of Latin music, such as the flamenco. It's interesting, because one would not expect a Latin-flavored track on a Hawaiian's album. Another memorable song is "Shine On," the story of a poor man in love. He relates to his loved one about how he has nothing except his song and his love to give.

According to Cruz, "The River Runs," "speaks of the water, the sustainer of life." The song does cover this, and it works in a gospel-inspired chorus, sung by a choir.

Overall, John Cruz is the epitome of a Hawaiian artist – musically, image-wise and in language. His show Tuesday promises to be a heartfelt one. It is sort of a homecoming for Cruz, as he spent several years of his life here. His CD is geared for listeners of a specific genre, but those listeners will be pleased with it.

Tickets to see John Cruz with special guest Joe Boyle are 10 dollars in advance and 13 dollars the night of the performance. The show starts at 8 p.m.

ther play the game of football."

UMass redshirt freshman quarterback Liam Coen made a statement as well. Making his second career start, Coen was 18-of-24 for 290 yards, but more importantly, he led the offense to its second straight week without a turnover.

In the 10 quarters that Coen has played this season, the Minutemen have turned the ball over only once: on an interception he threw during the first drive of his collegiate career during a loss to Colgate.

"Coach has been making some great calls, especially for me getting my feet wet," Coen said. "Getting the run game going is big for me. It takes so much pressure off me, especially with a team like URI that likes to come after you a little bit. It keeps them on their toes."

The freshman's favorite target on Saturday was junior receiver Brandon London, who caught eight passes for 95 yards. Four of those receptions were good for third-down conversions.

Junior running back Steve Baylark controlled UMass' ground attack once again, rushing the ball 28 times for 132 yards and one touchdown.

The Massachusetts defense looked confused by the triple-option on URI's first series of the game, as freshman halfback Joe Casey ripped off back-to-back runs of 40 yards and 25 yards to the UMass eight-yard line. The Rams were unable to punch the ball into the endzone, though, and settled for a 21-yard field goal off the foot of Colin Gallagher to make the score 3-0.

After three unsuccessful possessions, the UMass offense started to get it rolling at the end of the first quarter.

On the first play of the series, Coen rolled out to his left and hit London with a 29-yard pass to the URI 25-yard line. After four Baylark runs, including a five-yard score, the Minutemen took a 7-3 lead just over a minute into the second quarter.

UMass used a 31-yard pass up the middle to the URI 18-yard line from Coen to redshirt senior tight end Mike Douglas to set itself up for another score.

Two plays later, Coen hit London on a quick slant in from the left side for 10 yards to the URI 8-yard line.

Four plays after that, on fourth-and-goal from the one-yard line, the Minutemen gave the Rams a taste of their own medicine. Coen took the snap and optioned right, pitching the ball off to R.J. Cobbs just as he was getting hit by a defender, and Cobbs walked into the endzone untouched to give UMass a 14-3 advantage with 5:36 remaining in the opening half.

Rhode Island closed out the scoring with another Gallagher field goal, this one from 29 yards out, with 12:44 left to play in the fourth quarter.

Baylark utilized in victory

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It's no secret that the Massachusetts football team relies heavily on junior tailback Steve Baylark to control the pace of its offense on the ground each and every game.

It can be read in the scouting reports, told on the stat sheets and heard through the national media.

But, even more impressive, is that Baylark keeps motoring along, straight up the middle into the heart of eight-man defensive boxes on a regular basis with tremendous success.

That held true once again on Saturday night when he rushed for 132 yards and one touchdown on 28 carries during UMass' 14-6 victory over Rhode Island at McGuirk Stadium.

"He is the best back in the league," URI coach Tim Stowers said. "When the game was on the line, that is exactly what Coach Brown did, get the ball into the best back's hands and run the clock out."

When it mattered most as Stowers said, in the fourth quarter, Baylark rushed the ball 11 times for 68 yards and was a main reason why the Minuteman offense was able to run a 15-play, 66-yard drive to kill the final 7:29 of the game and secure a key Atlantic 10 victory.

"We just want to keep the ball out of the other team's hands and run the clock out, control the ball and not turn it over," Baylark said. "In the fourth quarter, the running game is very important."

With his team trailing 3-0 in the second quarter and the ball resting on the URI 25-yard line after a 29-yard pass from Liam Coen to Brandon London, Baylark put the offense back on his shoulders.

Two plays later, he took a right toss 14 yards to the URI 10-yard line before finishing the scoring drive with back-to-back runs up the middle to give UMass a 7-3 lead, an advantage the Minutemen wouldn't relinquish.

The touchdown was the 20th of Baylark's career, tying him for seventh all-time at UMass with Frank Alessio, Jerome Bledsoe and Paul Metallo.

Baylark could feasibly score eight more touchdowns this season, which would land him at fourth on the all-time list, leapfrogging Kevin Smellie (21), Greg Landry (22) and Lou Bush (27).

game), and I felt we were doing okay on the flanks. We just weren't getting by people."

The series of events in the 18th minute were preceded by a one-on-one encounter in the 16th minute, in which Walker, having fallen down flat-footed, made a last-second dive to her left to push the ball away.

Two minutes later, Johnson's free kick just outside the box hit the extreme left of the crossbar, setting up the rebound shot by Mrowka to put them up for good.

The first corner kick of the game didn't come until seven minutes into the second half, the first of four corners in the game by Fairfield. Walker made a diving save to thwart the opportunity.

UM's only corner happened in the 64th minute, but a failed cross prevented anything from happening.

One of the more opportune shots by the Minutewomen in the second half occurred two minutes later when the connection of freshman sensation Vanessa Patry and lightning-quick sophomore Britt Canfield made a big stride through the heart of the Fairfield defense. After taking a beautiful feed from Canfield, Patry took the ball in front of the net, just inside the box, only to nick it just wide left.

Defensively, the Minute-women didn't fail to shine. That was best put to example with 18 minutes to go in the game, when Johnson threatened inside the box again. With Walker down again, sophomore defender Kaelyn Caldwell came from behind and kicked the ball away at the last second, preventing what would have surely been a 2-0 affair.

"I'm happy with the way we played defensively," Rudy said. "We're not allowing a whole lot... Our creativity out of the back, our ability to connect passes out of the back, particularly balls that are going forward, I'm not happy with that aspect of it.

"I think we turn over too many first balls coming out of the back. When you do, it means the other team has it at least at midfield or in attack range. It's something we need to just keep working on."

The Minutewomen open their Atlantic 10 schedule on Friday at Rudd, when they take on the Fordham Rams (5-3).

conversion by the Rams, which moved the ball to the UMass six-yard line, a touchdown almost appeared inevitable. Three plays later, however, the Rams were looking at a fourth-and-goal on the UMass one-yard line and facing the nation's top defense.

Attempting to run the ball to the right side, Ram tailback Jerell Jones was knocked back by UMass linebackers Brad Anderson and Jason Hatchell and the Rams were forced to turn the ball over at the UMass six-yard line. The only other points of the game came from another URI field goal in the fourth quarter.

"It showed we have a lot of heart to stop them; not only stop them, but move them backwards like that," UMass free safety Shannon James said. "I'm just proud of the guys tonight; they came here and got it done like we knew we could."

A fight to the finish

Minutemen win physical contest

By JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In one of the more physical football games the national schedule has slated this season and in one of the most anticipated match-ups between one team's offense and another's defense, the No. 24 Massachuse'ts football team (3-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) held its own against No. 25 Rhode Island (3-1 1-1 A-10) on Saturday night, defeating the Rams 14-6 in front of 15,314 fans at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The Minutemen have a bye week before taking the field again when they play host to Northeastern on Oct. 8 at 1 p.m.

UMass' defense, which had given up only nine points in three games heading into Saturday, was pressed with its most daunting task to date in shutting down the triple-option rushing attack that had been indefensible in the Rams' three wins so far this season.

Nationally ranked for the first time since 2001, URI marched into McGuirk over the weekend full of confidence, especially with its offense that had averaged 46 points and 495 total yards per game.

The unique ground attack – made famous during URI coach Tim Stowers' 12 years on the staff at Georgia Southern – had accumulated 343.7 yards per game.

Once again, though, the Minutemen shut their opponents down, holding the Rams at bay with just 171 rushing yards and 249 total yards. And for the third consecutive game, the UMass defense held its opposition out of the end zone.

"I don't think we had a statement game yet, but I thought we made a statement [Saturday]," Brown said. "We've got a long way to go … but I'm just proud of my guys. I'm proud of their physicality. I'm proud of the way

UM dominates against the Rams in the red zone

By ERIC ATHAS

The area between the end zone of a football field and the 20-yardline represents more than just space. It symbolizes victory and defeat, champions and losers, but mostly, it is where games are decided. This section of the football field is most commonly referred to as the red zone, and the Massachusetts football (3-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) team proved on Saturday's 14-6 defeat of Rhode Island (3-1 1-1 A-10) how important success in the red zone truly is.

On three separate occasions, the Rams visited the UMass red zone with hopes of coming away with a touchdown. Those three trips past the Minuteman 20-yardline resulted – not in three TDs – but rather six points in total. With UMass winning the game by a small margin of eight points, the defensive stands near the goal line turned out to be one of the major contributing factors to pave the way for a Minuteman win.

The first red zone battle won by UMass came on the opening drive for URI when three carries by freshman Joe Casey brought the Rams down to the Minuteman's eight-yard line. One the following three plays, as the defense of UMass dug in, the Rams only managed a total of four yards, forcing a Colin Gallagher field goal.

The following stand came with UMass holding onto a 14-3 lead and URI preparing for its first score of the night. Following a fourth-and-14

The Minuteman offense was dormant yesterday at Rudd Field, as the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-5-0) was shutout by the Harvard Crimson (3-1-1) 2-0, in a match where the Minutemen never hit their stride.

Harvard out shot UMass 15-11, but the statistic doesn't show the reality: that legitimate UMass scoring opportunities were a rarity, and it was outplayed by a Crimson squad that has had four games in the last week.

"[The Harvard players] came out and they played hard," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "They played a lot of games in a short amount of time — they didn't look like it. We were the team that looked like it."

Both Harvard goals came on UMass defensive miscues: the first came just seven minutes into the game when Crimson sophomore Jeremy Tchou fired a low shot from inside the 18-yard goal box into the right side of the net.

The score came after sophomore Douglas Rappaport – in an attempt to clear the ball out – headed the ball straight up in the air. It came back down to him and he headed it again, advancing it only a few yards forward where Harvard forwards and UMass defenders were entangled.

Tchou broke free from the crowd with the ball and put Harvard ahead for good with a shot past the diving UMass goalkeeper.

The second Harvard strike came with time winding down in the second half and the Minutemen pressing to even the score.

It came in the 13th minute when a pass from the midfield down the left side of the UMass goal box evaded the slide of redshirt freshman Chris Brown and left Crimson forward Nicholas Tornaritis with an open lane to the UMass goal.

He fired the ball into the upper-right corner, bending it slightly inside the goal post, giving Harvard the 2-0 lead. It was a demoralizing blow for UMass, and the players' body language indicated that the Crimson had all but secured a victory with 10 minutes left in the game.

For the Minutemen, it wasn't necessarily poor play, but momentary lapses on defense that cost them the game.

"It's the thing where whoever gets the first goal sets the tempo," Koch said. "If we had a one goal lead I thought we were playing real well. We've got to get the ball in more dangerous positions. We've got to do it quicker. We've got to move the ball quicker. We just didn't play well; bottom line is we just didn't play well."

For most of the game, the ball was either in the UMass end or in the midfield, with the Minutemen getting few chances to give the Crimson keeper a scare; the closest the men's team came to scoring was in the 10th minute of the second half when sophomore Matt Lemire charged through the midfield, he stole a pass from a Crimson defender, then dribbled down the right of the field, ripping a shot that sailed right of the net.

"We have to play simple," Koch said after yesterday's loss. "We tried to take too many touches. We tried to dribble back. We did things that we're not good at. Against a team like [Harvard] you can't do it. They'll put pressure on you; they're going to intercept balls.

"And once they win it they're very good at playing fairly direct, fairly simple and they move the ball quickly. I give them a ton of credit."

The Minutemen dropped two games below .500 for the second time this season and are facing Boston University at home on Wednesday. The Atlantic 10 schedule begins with Duquesne on October 14, and while playing well is encouraging, seeing the team down two goals when the buzzer sounds isn't comforting for Koch.

UMass has played eight games so far, and though it isn't crunch time yet, dropping further below .500 will only dig the hole deeper for the Minutemen. Koch is hoping that the team will begin its ascent on Wednesday.

"Hopefully it's a one time thing and we'll be ready to play on Wednesday," Koch said. "We've got a job to do; we've got a big job. We have to get back on track and right now we're not there."

Senior Oral Bullen and the UMass men's soccer team fell furthur below the .500 mark yesterday. Bullen has started five games this season and has recorded five goals.

UMass loses a close contest

By BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's becoming an unwelcomingly familiar storyline.

Last Saturday afternoon, the Massachusetts women's soccer team once again outshot its opponent and controlled most of the game tempo, but failed to show anything for it on their home turf, as they faltered to the Fairfield Stags 1-0, at Rudd Field.

UMass falls to 3-3-1 on the season, while FU improves to .500 at 3-3-1.

Laura Mrowka netted what was eventually the game-winner for the Stags in the 18th minute on a rebound shot past goalkeeper Kristin Walker's right. The goal was set up after freshman midfielder Ahna Johnson took a free kick in front of the net just outside the eighteen-yard box that hit the crossbar, prompting Mrowka to follow up the rebound to find the back of the net.

A three-game losing streak is something nobody wants to do on a five-game homestand, but it's the situation the Minutewomen have defaulted into, thanks to some troubles – surprise, surprise – in the final third of the field.

UMass outshot the Stags 12-11, but in terms of shots on goal, just three of UM's shots were on target, compared to Fairfield's eight. So, despite several scoring opportunities on the cross and through the flanks, the final kick was what kept themselves at bay.

"I think we just get too excited when we get chances," senior midfielder and co-captain Lindsey Bellini said. "We just have to be confident, just take a touch and stroke it in. We're just nailing it every time; we get too excited because we don't get that many chances."

Coach Jim Rudy credits Fairfield's defense for making the shot conversions tough on them.

"They played great defense. They had a keeper (Brett Maron) that was just active as hell," Rudy said. "We didn't get at her enough, but their defense didn't allow us to get at her."

"I didn't really make many changes today. I went with some athleticism on the flanks (later in the

Field hockey drops third straight

By DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts field hockey team suffered their third consecutive loss on Saturday afternoon, losing to the No. 15 Connecticut Huskies (6-3) 2-1 at the George L. Sherman Family Sports Complex in Storrs, Conn. It marked the seventh loss of the season for the Minutewomen (3-7), as the Huskies were able to hold on to a one-goal lead and fight off a potential UMass comeback late in the second half.

Assistant Coach Steve Simpson believes that if his team played like they did in the last few minutes of regulation, then there might have been a different outcome.

"It was disappointing," Simpson said. "When we played with the urgency that we're capable of, we did really well, but we didn't compete with them the way we did at the end of the game."

UConn got on the board first when senior Rebecca Helwig tipped in a shot after the team's eighth penalty corner of the first half. The goal was Helwig's seventh of the season, and came just eight minutes after the officials waved off a UConn goal due to a high stick call.

UMass put the pressure on the Huskies late in the first half, but senior goalkeeper Melissa Bostwick was able to hold the Minutewomen scoreless going into halftime. UConn dominated most of the first half, out-shooting UMass 10-4. The Huskies also had an 8-1 advantage in penalty corners.

It remained a 1-0 game until late in regulation, when UConn sophomore Lizzy Peijs scored on a penalty stroke with 2:44 left on the clock to give the Huskies a comfortable 2-0 lead.

The Huskies may have been a little too comfortable, as freshman Katelyn Orlando made it a one-goal game just 41 seconds later with a shot from the near side post. Sophomore Kristina DeRosario set up Orlando for her team high third goal of the season. Orlando leads the team in points this season with eight.

The Minutewomen put the pressure on UConn within the last few minutes of play, but was unable to even up the score, giving UMass its seventh loss of the season.

Although the team is only 3-7, UMass' defense has been much improved, as the Minutewomen have limited their opponents to two goals or less in the last seven games.

Coach Simpson is pleased about his team's defensive improvements this season, but knows that giving up too many penalty corners will hurt them.

"We do a much better job of putting teams under pressure early," Simpson said. "But we let UConn into our circle too easily. It's discouraging to play, play, play and end up defending penalty corners, instead of having your own."

The Huskies dominated UMass in shots, out-shooting the Minutewomen 18-8, and having an 11-3 advantage in penalty corners.

The Minutewomen will travel to New York to play Syracuse at 7 p.m. on Friday.

Totman reallocated; student clubs evicted

By DAN TERK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the student body was returning to class and readjusting to college life, some found that they were not able to return to their old college ways. When the time came for student groups to resume meetings and practices, a number found out that their usual practice space, Totman 101, was no longer available to them.

Totman has been reallocated to the Exercise Science Department to be used a lab. The groups that used Totman 101 included: the Ballroom Dance Team, the Fencing Team, the Ping-Pong Club, and the Hip-Hop Culture club, among others.

"It was very cold of them to just simply evict a group, and not give any realistic alternative or notification," said Paul Schunk, a member of the Ballroom Dance Team. "And to me, that seems just extremely inappropriate."

Jedediyah Williams, the president of the Ballroom Dance Team, was also troubled by the fact that no one had offered his team a reasonable replacement for their old practice space. "No one is actively taking an interest into helping to relocate the people [who] were displaced," said Schunk.

In addition to being evicted, the Ballroom Dance Team was informed that they could no longer use the room just hours before their first practice, when they had no time to reserve another room. With the location already set and a turnout of nearly 200 people, the team was forced to use the foyer of Totman as well as the tar in front of the building.

The Exercise Science Department, according to Dr. Joseph Hamill, the department chair, has been expanding; the numbers of professors and students alike have been on the rise in recent years and more space was needed. Since the majority of the Exercise Science Department is already housed in Totman, it was a logical location for their expansion.

"I am sorry that [the groups] are being evicted," said Hamill. "All we are trying to do is provide the best possible educational environment to our students."

Before the decision was made by the Capital Asset Board, the provost did meet with the Athletic Department in order to discuss solutions for the displaced student groups. Whether this was in respect to all the groups or only the Fencing Team, which is part of the athletic department, was unclear. "There were many issues and needs that came into consideration with the reassignment of Totman 101," wrote John McCutcheon, Athletic Director, in an e-mail, adding. "…this was not done without a great deal of fact gathering and consultation."

SGA election brings about new platform

By MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Nearly 90 University of Massachusetts students have entered their names in the Student Government Association Senate race. Thirty-nine of those students have voiced their approval for the three-prong platform created by "Take Back UMass."

"Student government has been plagued by in-fighting and grandstanding for too long. We want to change this type of environment and get student senators to recognize the need for all students to work together to get something done," said "Take Back UMass" in a statement released to the press.

The focal point of their platform calls for a more "participatory democracy" in the distribution of the Student Activity fees, which are funded by $82 from every UMass student, and also in the process of how the distribution is determined.

Currently, the dispersal of the surplus is decided by a small group of 5-7 student bureaucrats.

In the first phase of the platform, named "It's Your Money", "Take Back UMass," along with its supporting senate candidates, demand that each and every student directly have an influence on how their money is spent.

"Last semester, we had a surplus of $600,000 and we still cut funding from some of the Resident Student Organizations (RSO). That clearly doesn't make sense," said Qingjian Shi, a junior at UMass and a candidate in the Commuter branch of the Senate. "We want to organize a system where students get a say in how their money is spent."

Government makes student info database

By SHANNON ELIOT
THE GUARDIAN (UC-SAN DIEGO)

LA JOLLA, Calif. — University of California at San Diego officials may make private student information available to the U.S. Department of Defense for the purpose of military recruitment should the federal government request it, according to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Joseph W. Watson.

In an effort to expand waning military reserves, the Department of Defense is planning to compile a database with personal statistics of approximately 30 million Americans, including high school students aged 16 to 18 and all college students. Such information would include student addresses, telephone numbers, ethnicity, Social Security numbers, grade point averages and areas of study.

Known as the Joint Advertising and Market Research Recruiting Database, the list is being established "to provide a single central facility within the Department of Defense to compile, process and distribute files of individuals who meet age and minimum school requirements for military service," according to the official notice published in the Federal Register.

In implementing the Federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act that limits the disclosure of a student's personal information, the University of California classifies itself as 13 separate institutions rather than as one single entity.

Each UC campus exerts some degree of independence when it comes to decisions involving student records.

While University of California at Los Angeles officials have said they would only release student information under a court order, UCSD officials say that any request for information will be processed in compliance with campus regulations that limits the type of student records that may be released to third parties.

"We consider the protection of student privacy as an important responsibility of the campus," Watson said. "Consequently, we are most concerned about any proposal that might compromise the privacy of students."

When asked whether UCSD would overrule a federal request, Watson said that at the present time there is no conflict between federal law and university policy regarding the release of student information, and there have been no requests to date of student information.

"Federal recruiters have the same access to the campus, student information and students as other public and private entities," he said.

Chancellor Mary Anne Fox expressed similar sentiments.

"Our policy would normally be to not turn over personal student information, since that's consistent with student privacy laws," she said. "On the other hand, we would follow the law if need be."

Establishing a database for recruitment would not be a new practice, according to David S. C. Chu, the Department of Defense's undersecretary for personnel and readiness. The military have kept lists of potential recruits for multiple years, he stated in an article published by an informational entity of the Pentagon. The Pentagon will also strictly limit the use of data collected, according to Chu.

"We don't give these lists out to other people," he stated. "[The data] are given only to the military recruiters."

The database is not the first effort by the federal government to attract new military personnel. Under a provision of the 2002 No Child Left Behind Act, high schools must turn over student information at the behest of a military recruiter.

While students and parents may request that private information not be turned over by schools, they cannot prevent military collection of student data from other sources.

arly violated [FERPA]. The continuing collection, use and maintenance of a system of records provide a basis for legal action and congressional oversight."

Police arrest Cindy Sheehan at demonstration

By JENNIFER C. KERR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Cindy Sheehan, the California woman driven by her son's death in Iraq to re-ignite the anti-war movement, was arrested Monday while protesting outside the White House.

Sheehan and several dozen other protesters sat down on the sidewalk after marching along the pedestrian walkway on Pennsylvania Avenue. Police warned them three times that they were breaking the law by failing to move along, then began making arrests.

Sheehan, 48, was the first taken into custody. She stood up and was handcuffed, then led to a police vehicle while protesters chanted, "The whole world is watching."

Others who were arrested also cooperated with police. Sgt. Scott Fear, spokesman for the U.S. Park Police, said they would be charged with demonstrating without a permit, which is a misdemeanor.

Park Police Sgt. L.J. McNally said Sheehan and the others would be taken to a processing center where they would be fingerprinted and photographed, then given a ticket and released. The process would take several hours, he said.

Sheehan's 24-year-old son, Casey, was killed in an ambush in Sadr City, Iraq, last year. She attracted worldwide attention last month with her 26-day vigil outside President Bush's Texas ranch.

Sheehan was among several hundred demonstrators who marched around the White House on Monday and then stopped in front and began singing and chanting, "Stop the war now!" Organizers had said some planned to be arrested.

The demonstration is part of a broader anti-war effort on Capitol Hill organized by United for Peace and Justice, an umbrella group. Representatives from anti-war groups were meeting Monday with members of Congress to urge them to work to end the war and bring home the troops.

Rescue efforts continue in Rita's wake

By APRIL CASTRO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEAUMONT, Texas — Rescuers pushed their way into once-inaccessible neighborhoods as Hurricane Rita's floodwaters receded along the Texas-Louisiana coast Monday. The death toll climbed to seven when the bodies of five people were discovered in a Beaumont apartment.

The five — a man, a woman and three children — apparently were overcome by carbon monoxide from a generator they were using after the hurricane knocked out the electricity over the weekend, authorities said. The children's aunt discovered the bodies after going to check on the group.

Rita roared ashore Saturday morning, slamming the refinery towns of Beaumont and Port Arthur, Texas, as well as Lake Charles, La., after an epic evacuation that emptied out a large swath of coastline and saved countless lives. Some three million people fled from Rita's path after seeing what Katrina did to New Orleans a month ago.

As of Sunday night, only two deaths had been blamed directly on Rita.

"As bad as it could have been, we came out of this in pretty good shape," said Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who called the absence of widespread fatalities "miraculous."

Hard-hit towns along the Texas-Louisiana coast began to pick up the pieces.

Crews worked to clear roads of fallen trees and other debris so that utility workers could begin restoring power.

The more than 110,000 people living in Beaumont were urged not to return home, though, since water, electricity and sewer services will not be restored for weeks. Police blocked exits off interstate highways leading to the city.

In Lake Charles, National Guardsmen patrolled the town and handed out bottled water and food to hundreds of people left without power. Scores of cars wrapped around the parking lot of the city civic center, picking up food and ice. The storm knocked out power to hundreds of thousands of customers in Louisiana and Texas.

Dorothy Anderson said she had not had time to get groceries before the storm because she was at a funeral out of town. "We got back and everything was closed," she said.

Mike Deroche, director of the Terrebonne Parish, La., Office of Emergency Preparedness, said Monday that the floodwaters were going down in most areas and that the parish had nearly 9,900 homes that were severely damaged.

"We're just starting to get back into some areas that we haven't been able to get to," Deroche said.

In Chauvin, a steady stream of people were brought by small boats from the flooded sections of Terrebonne Parish. Some cried as they hauled plastic bags filled

Police log: liquor violations

Because of complaints of noise and vandalism, the Amherst Police Department has launched a town-wide investigation into the illegal sale of alcohol and the illegal practice of informal bars.

On Sept. 23, 2005, the Amherst Police received information that there was a party at 3 Hobart Lane. Officers spotted people going in and out of the building with alcohol. Many of these people were underage. Officers estimated that there were about 500 people at the scene. Undercover cops joined the crowd and paid money for beer. The party was shut down and the crowd was broken up. The police seized cups, multiple kegs of beer, about $500 in cash, and a small amount of marijuana. A 21-year-old Plymouth man will be summoned to court on charges of illegal distribution of alcohol and a town bylaw violation of illegal possession of a keg. Mark Silva, 20, of Amherst and Erik Wolf, 20, of Boston, were arrested and charged with underage possession of alcohol.

Friday morning at 1:05 a.m., there was a fight outside of Antonio's pizza at 51 North Pleasant St. Ryan Fleming, 22, was arrested and was charged with disorderly conduct and assault and battery.

Friday morning, there was a liquor law violation on 111 Main St. The police arrived at 2:29 a.m. Derek Popek, 20, was arrested and charged with having an open container of liquor and being in possession of liquor under the age of 21.

Friday morning, there was a case of operating a vehicle under the influence of alcohol. The scene was 642 Main St. The police arrived at 2:12 a.m. The vehicle was a red 1990 Plymouth. Rebecca Linden, 21, of Oakham, was arrested for marked lane violations, OUI liquor, and leaving the scene of property damage.

On Sunday, there was a town bylaw violation. The scene was 364 North Pleasant St. Craig R. Weise, 19, of South Hadley, was charged with having an open container of alcohol and with being underage and in possession of alcohol.

On Sunday morning, the Amherst Police assisted the Amherst Fire Department. There was a party at the Lambda Chi Alpha house on 374 North Pleasant St., at which someone pulled the fire alarm. There was a crowd of people running outside of the building. The police arrived at 11:11 p.m. and rendered their services.

Practice space lost

Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs, Michael Gargano, declined to comment on the issue, but Director of News and Information Ed Blaguszewski said, "I know the Student Activities Office is trying to work for an arrangement for these clubs as soon as they can."

The Fencing Team, after having to practice in the basketball courts in Totman, has been accommodated with practice space in Boyden. When The Massachusetts Daily Collegian asked the team's president how the eviction affected the team, he declined to comment. The Ballroom Dance Team is not angered as much that that they can no longer use Totman 101 specifically, but by the fact that they have no appropriate, permanent practice space. "[Totman 101] wasn't the best place to begin with," explained Williams, but the team had been using it for over fifteen years and the location of their practices was never an issue until now. The team also utilized locker space in Totman 101 to hold their music, a stereo system, and costumes – all of which is now being stored in the closet of one of the member's apartments.

"I meet with a new facilities director every day trying to find a space," said Williams, "and they all say the same thing: that they don't have any space and someplace else to try." The Ballroom Dance team is currently working on an agreement with the Fine Arts Center in which they may be given a more suitable practice space, but at the moment they will be using the lobby on days when there are no events. Williams put it succinctly: "It's not easy for us to pick up and move."

The candidates have proposed that students be allowed to voice their opinions in a forum setting.

"If they want an ice cream machine in every dorm, or someone wants to create a new student business, or a big concert, they can let that be known," said Nate Kupel, a candidate in the Commuter branch of the senate.

The second point of their platform calls for the defense of fraternities, sororities, RSOs, and student businesses.

"Student rights have been under attack for the past couple of years: cameras in public places, harsh penalties for alcohol violations, and the takeover of student organizations by the administration," said "Take Back UMass" in its statement to the press. "Now, the administration is going after fraternities, sororities, RSOs and student businesses."

According to "Take Back UMass," the office of Student Affairs has taken away the ability for student businesses to get necessary start-up loans and allowed the introduction of private corporations to UMass. The introduction of these companies may lead to the end of certain student businesses.

Candidates say UMass is in the final stages of a plan that would allow Kinkos Copying to build a store in the basement of the Student Union, in competition with the student-run business Campus Design and Copy.

"This would lead to the end of Campus Design and Copy," said Shi. "The administration makes more money if a Kinkos is built; they make nothing off seeing a student business become successful. That may be where the motivation lies."

"The administration's motto is 'Students Comes First,'" said Kupel. "These actions prove that students only come first if it's cost-efficient for the university."

The final point of the platform calls for a freeze on the increase of tuition cost, a goal that was succeeded 10 years ago by a united group of UMass students.

"Students did it after a year of effort, so there's no reason why we can't do the same," said Elvis Mendez, a candidate in the Southwest North branch of the Senate. "With fees constantly rising year after year, UMass Amherst is becoming unaffordable to many, and difficult to pay for to most. Working with Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, we hope to get these [costs], and [those of] the other UMass campuses… frozen."

Rescues continue with their possessions out of the skiffs that carried them to dry land. Others cursed.

"This is the worst thing I've ever been through," said Danny Hunter, 56. "I called FEMA this morning, and they said they couldn't help us because this hasn't been declared a disaster area."

"Texas is a disaster area!" Jenny Reading shouted. "I guess the president made sure of that, and everyone just forgot about us."

Robert LeBlanc, director of the Vermilion Parish, La., Office of Emergency Preparedness, said just about everyone who needed to be rescued had been taken care of, and the focus instead turned to clearing the roads to Pecan Island and rescuing roughly 5,000 cattle there.

"These people's livelihood depends on this," he said.

LeBlanc said the parish has about 500 livestock farmers. He said that the storm also wiped out hunting camps that bring in tourists, and that shrimp boats in Delcambre had been thrown up onto the land.

LeBlanc said the water had fallen, and hundreds of people have gone home to save what they can and begin rebuilding.

Recycle this newspaper

Daniel McGrath

I always find it ironic when environmental issues get thrown on the backburner. Why is it so easy to put something as obvious and life sustaining as the environment out of sight and out of mind? The ideal attitude towards protecting the environment has always been, "Each of us can make a difference." But the general attitude is more like, "What's the difference?" As human beings, none of us will ever live long enough to see the effects of our actions on our environment, so where's the pressure to be environmentally friendly? Tomorrow I'll get out of bed, breathe the air, drink the water and walk in the sunlight, regardless of whether or not I drive my car, recycle a bottle or just sit in a lawn chair spraying aerosol cans all day.

My biggest problem when it comes to helping the environment is intimidation. It's overwhelming, not to mention difficult, to think of my actions in a world perspective. And because I can't imagine the effects of my actions, I confuse myself into not doing anything at all. Often times when I'm walking downtown or through the Campus Center and I see some ad for a way to get involved and be supportive, I just dismiss it, having other priorities on my mind. But lately I got to thinking about that attitude. I decided that even if I don't actively pursue issues of environmental change, I should at the very least be aware of what the issues are.

I decided that even if I don't actively pursue issues of environmental change I should at the very least be aware of what the issues are.

Imagine what a difference it would make if everyone were simply conscious of how society and industry affected the natural world? Therefore, I am of the opinion that the most important environmental issue is awareness. No one needs to rush out in a recycled plastic cape and save the planet. I'm not even asking people to feel obligated to make a difference. What I am saying is get educated. The next time you go online to look at pictures of some naked college kid covered in marker, take 10 minutes to look up an article about alternative energy or sustainable agriculture. That way, when the opportunity to be environmentally conscious presents itself, you'll have some clue of what to do.

So what should we be aware of here in the five-college area? Well, the other day while I was swearing out loud to myself about the price of gasoline, I started thinking about how lucky we are to be living in an area with free, convenient public transportation. Then I remembered a story I'd heard about some hippie driving cross-country in a school bus that ran on vegetable oil, and suddenly I had an idea: Why not convert all the PVTA buses to run on vegetable oil? I got on the Internet and started researching the idea, only to find out that I'm not the first person to make that connection. A plan is already underway to run all the PVTA buses, or at least those operating in the five-college area, on locally produced biodiesel fuel.

For those of you who don't know, biodiesel is a clean burning fuel that runs in any unmodified diesel engine. Its only byproducts are glycerin and water, and it can be made from used cooking oil, an abundant waste product of all the dining facilities at each of the five colleges. The project that I found is called "PVTA Veggie Bus" and is being organized out of Mount Holyoke College. Their goal is to take used cooking oil from dining commons and local restaurants and convert it to biodiesel through the Pioneer Valley Biodiesel Cooperative. In doing so, the PVTA would no longer need to rely on foreign fossil fuels, the local colleges and restaurants would no longer have to pay to dispose of their grease, and the world would be a cleaner place. You can find out more about this project by going online and searching for "PVTA Veggie Bus."

This is only one of many projects underway in the Pioneer Valley, and it only took about 10 minutes to read up on it. So tomorrow when you're out there in the world, keep your eyes and ears open. God knows we all spend enough time glued to computer screens, so take a little of that time to check out an environment-related Web site. The next time you see a sign or an ad about keeping nature clean, don't shut it out. Let the idea swirl around in your head for a while. Who knows, you might even find yourself making a difference one of these days. But for now, breathe in the fresh air, be grateful for what we've still got, and be sure to recycle this newspaper when you're done reading (it's the blue bin that says "paper" on the side).

We are all held accountable

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

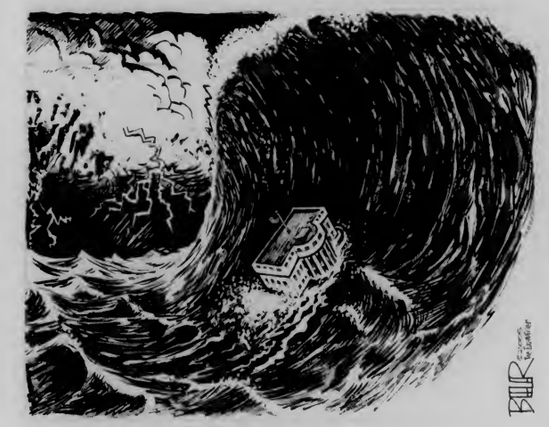
The destruction caused by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita has been well documented in this country, and thus throughout the world. September is always hurricane season in the Caribbean, and this year is no different. Last year's major storms – Bonnie, Charley, Frances, Ivan – caused sizable destruction in Florida and Alabama and brought the problem of systematically worsening hurricanes to the nation's attention. Katrina and the panic preceding Rita have driven the point home.

According to David Helvarg, President of the Blue Frontier Campaign and author of the books "The War Against the Greens" and "Blue Frontier: Saving America's Living Seas," this is not an entirely uncommon occurrence: the hemisphere generally goes through 25- to 40-year cycles of lesser and greater hurricane activity. The 1990s represented a lull in the sequence and the first decade of the new millennium will prove to be a rise in activity. "The only difference between the last period of intensified hurricanes back in the '50s and the '60s and today is massive coastal sprawls," says Helvarg. "We have a government report that says 25 percent of all houses within 500 feet of the ocean will be gone in the next 50 years."

It makes sense that urban sprawl onto hurricane-prone lands would cause increased property loss when hurricanes strike, but there are also important aspects of this country's environmental policy that contribute to the rise of hurricane activity and the susceptibility of our Caribbean coastline to storm damage. For example, nearly 200 years of damming and irrigating the Mississippi River has had massive effects for the city of New Orleans, which finds itself sinking as much as two inches per year, farther and farther below sea level. For eons, the wide, meandering river deposited sediment from the Ohio River Valley and the forests of Louisiana and Mississippi into the Louisiana Delta. This created and sustained the bayou upon which New Orleans sits and which shelters the city from Caribbean squalls.

A couple hundred years of regulated and unregulated damming and agricultural use of the river have converted it into a concentrated stream that blasts light agricultural runoff hundreds of miles out to sea. The barrier islands and bayous protecting the Louisiana Delta coast are depleted and the city itself is sinking. That class of erosion requires larger levees than we have been able to erect yet.

Of course, there's always the possibility that human-induced global warming is actually increasing the instance and intensity of hurricanes in the hemisphere. There is a virtual consensus in the scientific community that the release of greenhouse gases, primarily carbon dioxide, into the atmosphere is causing a not-so-gradual rise in global temperatures. The melting of the polar ice caps causes a rise in water levels in the Arctic that will eventually have drastic effects upon the weather patterns along the wind stream that runs down the middle of the Pacific Ocean, around the point of South America, up along the continent, and eventually moves east to warm Europe somewhere around the Caribbean.



Bush, whose approval ratings are at an all-time low, will have to lay the blame at some area of our treating the environment with impunity.

Doomsday ecologists such as the authors of last summer's thriller "The Day After Tomorrow" predict that the recent rash of damaging hurricanes is a prelude to much more serious weather problems if drastic environmental measures are not taken soon. While little stock should be placed in sensationalism or desperation theories, Katrina and Rita undoubtedly have given credence to these ideas among many in the South. Even up here in New England, the change has been undeniable between the winters of 20 years ago and those of today. In the hills of Franklin County, the winter once lasted from early November until late April, but now runs from December until March and rarely brings the heavy snowfall of just two decades ago.

It appears that political pressure in the aftermath of Katrina and Rita will force President Bush, who has referred to global warming as one theory among many, to acknowledge the role of humans in the rising global temperatures. A country seeking answers is demanding to know why there is a systematic increase in hurricane destruction over the past few years. Bush, whose approval ratings are at an all-time low, will have to lay the blame at some area of our treating the environment with impunity. He will either be forced to blame our use of the Mississippi River or our role in global warming.

Whether these acknowledgments lead us to alter our environmental policy is much less clear. There has been little discussion of cutting greenhouse gasses or finally joining the rest of the civilized world in the Kyoto Protocol, and no talk about using the Mississippi River more sustainably. In fact, the only environmental measure taken thus far was a relaxation of industrial emissions standards in Texas and Louisiana to jump-start oil production just hours after Katrina struck. As a country we need to start putting two and two together and holding our long-time policies accountable for environmental degradation.

Peak oil? Peak schmoil

David Lawrence

We are gradually using up the world's supply of oil. Though this fact recently arrived very suddenly in the public's attention, the slow process of burning several millennia's buildup has been ongoing for centuries. We are going to "run out" of oil, but it isn't going to be sudden; there's no need for panic. Caution is prudent, awareness appropriate, but fear and panic need not apply.

It's now widely accepted that we are eventually running out of oil. There is a limited amount of it and we use it, so you'd expect that sooner or later it would all get used up. What isn't always agreed on is when we're going to run out. By many reasonable accounts it is going to be sometime this century, and the slow decline in production will certainly be a factor in our use of the resource in the coming decades. This decline starts when we reach our "peak oil production" – a term you've probably heard thrown around before. Basically we're going to start finding and digging up less and less oil each year. Experts disagree about exactly when this will happen (some say it already has) but it is certain to be soon enough.

The speed of that impending decline is an important factor. Reporting on the coming "oil crash" or "oil shock" is a popular counterculture/liberal left pastime. It has replaced "Marxian revolt" as the premiere "the sky is fulfilling on capitalism" standby. These reports generate fear and panic by implying that the oil supply is going to suddenly dry up, leaving us helpless and unable to get to work or heat our homes. This "drying up" actually won't occur in days or years even, but over the course of decades. During this time alternative energy sources will also gradually increase in popularity and use, as they fill in the gaps that decreasing oil production leaves.

The average person isn't going to pay five times as much as he could to get to work each morning because we are going to run out of oil 50 years from now.

Alternatives to fossil fuels already exist. You've probably seen or heard of electric cars. Nuclear power, solar power, wind power and literally dozens of other alternatives to fossil fuels are all already in use to varying extents. The reason they aren't used as much as oil is because they are in general much more expensive than oil. The average person isn't going to pay five times as much as he could to get to work each morning because we are going to run out of oil 50 years from now.

This isn't the result of an oil-corporation/Halliburton/BushCheneyRove brain wash. It is merely normal people thinking. "Hmm, gas is $3 for 20 miles, and complicated fuel cell systems are $3k." As technologies improve and new methods are engineered, the price of oil-alternatives will decrease. At the same time, the price of oil will be gradually increasing as production slows. At some point the oil alternatives will be comparable in price to oil, and lots of people will start using them and eventually, the price of oil alternatives will be much lower than the price of oil, and nearly everyone will use them. The "invisible hand" of the free market will solve the problem even before it arrives.

Major transitions in how we power our world have occurred before without significant incident. We have not used oil forever, and we won't use it forever. Modern man is innovative and tenacious, and we'll find our society gradually prepares as the problem gradually grows, so don't panic. If you are really concerned, I suggest converting the ol' Y2K shelter to an oil storage tank – you'll be well prepared when the "oil crash" hits.

Protecting the protectors

Mike Sances

I'd like to talk about supporting the troops, and to do that I'm required to write more than the three words printed on that magnet ribbon on your car. Matters of life and death call for a little more of a discussion than that.

Of course, the army exists (in theory if not always in practice) to protect us all, and this is also the reason why people decide to join. But the relationship between the public and the military can't be that simple. In a country where wars are waged only with the consent of the people, it is also the duty of the citizen to protect the soldier, to avoid needlessly sending the soldier into harm's way.

Or, as in our present situation, to keep the soldier in harm's way. Unfortunately, that's what's happening today; what has been happening for several years now. To be blunt, we've been treating our soldiers horribly, and I don't see that there is any excuse for it.

The only reason the country bought this war is because it was presented as a case of self-defense (interestingly enough, the only legitimate reason for the use of force permitted under the UN Charter).

The only reason the country bought this war is because it was presented as a case of self-defense (interestingly enough, the only legitimate reason for the use of force permitted under the UN Charter). We know now that Iraq never attacked the United States and never had the ability to do so. So for what reason are we still there? If we aren't keeping our soldiers there to protect us, we ought to bring them home right away.

But it's even worse than that. The tragedy of this war is that it puts our military in harm's way while at the same time making us less safe here at home. Every day we continue to occupy Iraq, let alone for the moment the greater Middle East, public opinion in the Arab world grows even more hostile and 1,000 new bin Ladens are born. This is not idle speculation, and the question of whether we are safer since the war is not a "debate." There is zero evidence that we are, and mountains of evidence to the contrary.

"We're going to deny the terrorists a safe haven to plot their attacks." I was surprised Thursday when the President presented this as the war rationale-of-the-week, since his own intelligence agency admitted in January that Iraq had already given terrorists "a training ground, a recruitment ground, the opportunity for enhancing technical skills" and that even "under the best scenario," these newly trained terrorists would spread to other countries, according to an article in the Washington Post on Jan. 14.

And in April, the State Department was so embarrassed that the number of terrorist attacks worldwide had increased from 175 in 2003 to 625 in 2004 (two consecutive record highs) that they decided to stop printing their annual report on global terrorism. That was 625 on top of the carnage in Iraq, which they didn't bother to record, according to an article on Knight Ridder on April 15.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon continues building military bases in Iraq. According to Larry Diamond, a former adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority, "intense opposition to U.S. plans to establish long-term military bases in Iraq is one of the most passionate motivations behind the insurgency," according to the Nieman Watchdog Web site, "Questions the press should ask."

So are we safer? Ask the people in London, Madrid, Bali, Egypt, etc. Ask the people in Baghdad, Fallujah and Tal 'Afar. Or do we not count them? In fact, the idea that the war would be just fine if we were protecting ourselves by "bringing the war to the terrorists" is racist on its face. What it fundamentally assumes is that an Iraqi life is worth less than an American one. I, for one, am unable to hold such a view and continue to look myself in the mirror.

I may be preaching to the choir. A Gallup poll from last week has 63 percent of the public favoring the immediate withdrawal of some or all troops, according to USA Today. I'd guess that number is higher on this campus. So how are we going to stop this war? Is there really anything we can do to change things?

Questions like these are downright absurd when you look at history. The fact is that any progress we've made as a society has been accomplished through the actions of ordinary people working together. What's different in 2005 is that we have absolutely nothing to lose, while as recently as the 1960s antiwar protesters were being gunned down at Kent State and civil rights workers were being lynched in the South. Probably the greatest obstacle to stopping this war is not the threat of state violence but this ideology of hopelessness that's fed to us from the earliest age. Stop believing this lie and almost anything is possible.

In the meantime, the war goes on, and soldiers and civilians continue to die, all because we don't bother to put a stop to it.

Bob Dylan's musical career is easily one of the longest and most consistent in the history of modern music.

As the story goes, Bob Dylan came to New York from Minnesota in hopes of joining the up and coming folk music scene in Greenwich Village.

Soon after arriving, a buzz started going around the Village about the young singer songwriter. Quickly he was signed to Columbia Records, who put out his first album when he was still in his early 20s.

The album was actually a flop. Most people could not get by his voice and wanted to hear original material, but instead the album was mostly folk classics written by other people.

Before the work of his next album, the classic "The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan," Dylan went around and performed his new songs for anyone would listen and soon enough the buzz was back.

The results of these gigs were bootlegged, but mostly lost through the years. However, one bootleg remains and was recently remastered and officially released.

This bootleg brings the latest live Dylan album, titled "Live at the Gaslight 1962."

This album is an amazing piece of rock 'n' roll history. During the album, one can hear Dylan with just his acoustic guitar on his back and a pocket full of songs. The album includes early renditions of classic songs like "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall" and "Don't Think Twice, It's All Right."

For those two songs alone the album is a worthy purchase, but instead it's an entire gig with eight more songs. The quality for the album is so clear, it is as if Bob Dylan is still 21 years old and just recently performed this concert.

This album is rare for the time being; unlike any Bob Dylan album before it, it was officially released to be sold for a period of eight months at Starbucks locations before it would be released in music stores worldwide.

This decision, as well the use of a song in a Victoria's Secret commercial lately, may lead fans to think that Dylan has sold them out for profit, but that shouldn't lead fans away. Dylan has always surprised his listeners and was frequently told he sold out even back in the '60s during his prime, so this special release should by no means limit anyone from buying this amazing album.

UMass musicians celebrate the musical works of Mozart

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Staff

Tuesday, Sept. 27 marks the 250th birthday of the famed classical composer, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. In celebration of the late musical genius, the faculty of the university's Department of Music and Dance will be putting on a concert featuring selected works from the composer in addition to several pieces by Franz Joseph Haydn, a fellow classical composer of the first Viennese School.

Mozart tribute
'Tuesday in Bezanson'
Bezanson
Sept. 27

The performance will feature several pieces by Haydn, including "Divertimento in G for Flute, Violin, and Cello, Hob. IV:9" as well as various songs, and three works by Mozart: "Duo for Bassoon & Cello in Bb Major, K.292," "Sonata for Two Pianos in D, K.448," and "Quartet for Oboe & Strings in F, K.370." Although Mozart wrote many pieces ranging from symphonies to operas to music for small groups, these three pieces have been hand-picked for their intimacy.

"I think this is a great opportunity for students to open their eyes and ears to different music," says Director of Publicity & Fundraising for the Music and Dance Department, Marilyn M. Kushick. "Tuesday's concert will be a very intimate experience. Students are even encouraged to come up and talk to the faculty after the show."

Faculty members performing on Tuesday include: Elizabeth Chang, violin; Fredric Cohen, oboe; Christopher Krueger, flute; William Hite, tenor; Kathryn Lockwood, viola; Estela Olevsky, piano; Stephen Walt, bassoon; Nadine Shank, piano; and world-renowned cellist Astrid Schween.

Schween is a two-time winner of the prestigious Juilliard cello prize, presented by the noted university. She is also a member of the Lark Quartet alongside fellow University of Massachusetts faculty member, Kathryn Lockwood. This acclaimed string ensemble has performed all over the world including famous venues such as Carnegie Hall, Lockenhaus, and the Beethoven Festival in Moscow. Schween came to the University in 2004 as a visiting professor.

Mozart's birthday celebration is the first in a series of four concerts called "Tuesdays in Bezanson." These annual shows are all performed exclusively by faculty. This year's series was coordinated by flutist and faculty member Professor Christopher Krueger, who will also be performing at Tuesday's event.

The second concert of the series will take place on Nov. 15 with Igor Stavinsky's "L'histoire du Soldat" (The Soldier's Tale). This classic work of musical theater features instruments, narration and dance. Co-written with the Swiss author C.F. Ramuz, this work is based upon a Russian fable about a soldier who plays the fiddle. The university faculty's interpretation will feature the soldier being represented by a violin.

On Feb. 28, the spring semester phase of the series begins with a concert focusing on the composers of "The Second Viennese School." This will be followed on April 11 with the last concert of the series, which features collaborations of jazz and classical music.

Come join in the celebration of Mozart's 250th birthday and let the music department's talented faculty treat you to an intimate display of classical music genius this Tuesday evening in the newly renovated Bezanson Recital Hall at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are $5 for students, children under 18 years of age, and senior citizens, and $10 for the general public. Tickets are available for purchase at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, 413-545-2511.

Ok Go

Oh No
Capital Records

OK Go first stepped onto the national music scene in 2002 with their self-titled debut. Lead by a boisterously anathematic single, "Get Over It," OK Go seemed poised to take over Weezer's throne as the top power-pop band in the country. OK Go's best moments are born out of the fact that they are just as literate as Weezer but Rivers Cuomo's insane genius is replaced by frontman Damien Kulash's playful energy. On "Oh No," OK Go maintain their lively pop sensibilities but kick up the rock factor by many notches.

"Oh No" still sounds like the same band; there are handclaps and backing harmonies and calls scattered all over the album, but now Kulash is more prone to let out a scream then a whimper and the guitars screech and bend in between big power chords. The band sounds like they strive to fall somewhere in between The Cars and The Pixies – or perhaps a 21st-century version of the latter raised on the former – but despite the added gritty production on this album, a sharp contrast to the heavily polished feel of the self-titled album, "Oh No" still sounds a little too calculated to make a real statement.

The songs are all generally strong – "Invincible" is a strong jumping-off point and "Oh Lately It's So Quiet" is OK Go's take on old-school soul music – but the album starts to wear fairly quickly. OK Go may be more interested in making their guitars sound like Steve Albini's but it is undeniable that they thrive on big stadium-sized hooks. "Oh No" is definitely the sound of the band flexing their wings rather then simply trying to recreate the best parts of their first album. The beginning of "Oh No" announces that power-pop is a genre that can still be accounted for but the middle of the album is weighed down by a lot of similar sounding songs – however, the last few songs are more experimental and interesting than anything the band has done before. OK Go may not have the mystery – or the credibility – that Weezer has, but that is part of their charm. "Oh No" isn't groundbreaking, but it is full of fun, simple, and catchy rock music; an antidote for radio-friendly corporate power-pop.

Thoughts of Predicate Felon
Interscope

When G-Unit first hit big a few years ago, Tony Yayo was biding his time behind bars. Rocking prison wear instead of the newest G-Unit hoodie, Yayo worked on his raps while his friends on the outside chanted "Free Yayo" on their songs.

Now, after the prison system released him, he can finally release his music to us.

As we know from 50 "I got shot nine times" Cent's image, G-Unit is not above gimmicks. Therefore it is unsurprising that "Thoughts of a Predicate Felon" opens with a completely unnecessary jail skit of a prison guard barking instructions to an inmate we assume to be Yayo. This intro affirms to us that Yayo has been in jail. The bark is all Yayo's though once the first track "Homicide" begins and his lyrics pack more bite than those of many of his peers (this includes his fellow crew member 50 Cent.) While Yayo's G-Unit crew has been enjoying their success, Yayo has been locked up and his mind is still attuned to the street life. While 50 doesn't sound gangster anymore, we can now be scared because he's got Yayo as his back.

It pays to be a G-Unit soldier these days; you get equipped with some of the best beats around. On "Thoughts of a Predicate Felon," executive producer 50 Cent is supported by Eminem and a group of lesser known producers who deliver hardcore beats sure to bump through your speakers. Standout tracks here are "We Don't Give a F*ck," "Drama Setter," and the lead single "So Seductive." Yayo's voice is gravelly enough to hold him up when he shares songs with the likes of Eminem and 50. His flow is also distinctive enough and he rides the beats he is given well. Like the rest of G-Unit, Yayo is all about drama in his lyrics. He tears into Fat Joe and other snitches on "Tattle Teller" and talks about the numerous ways to commit "Homicide." No new thoughts here, but Yayo twists each theme and adds his own signature to them.

The beats are excellent and his lyrics deliver. This is another solid album from the G-Unit camp.

The All-American Rejects

3/10

Move Along
Interscope

The All-American Rejects have followed a common pattern in today's music world. The pattern is as follows: band releases album on independent label, major record label re-releases album, song becomes hit, and band disappears to write follow up and major label debut.

Three years later, The All-American Rejects have returned with the release of a new album. The new album definitely differentiates from their self titled debut and their hit single "Swing, Swing" – the band returns to the radio with a new sound to recapture their audience.

The result is an album easily classified as catchy pop rock similar to their other album, but much more produced and stripped down. Fans of Simple Plan, Wakefield and other similar acts will enjoy this album because for what it's worth, it's a solid album, but it's not that good.

Stripped away is the organ sound of "Swing, Swing," the very piece that made the band fun in the first place.

In its place is a pop punk anthem, "Dirty Little Secret," that is by far the best song on the entire album and also coincidentally the first song on the album.

The rest of the album is just full of filler; sadly, 11 tracks of filler do not make a good album, despite the fact that the album is full of hook guitars and simple drum beats. It's pop punk – what do you expect?

The next single will most likely be "It Ends Tonight," a ballad of some sorts that starts with lead singer Tyson Ritter on piano, but ends with the full band joining him, creating a pop rock ending.

This song will put the band back on the map and sell them a fair amount of albums so that Interscope will not drop them and send them back to their original label, Doghouse.

However, demoting the band back to Doghouse might not be that bad – the band could go back and rediscover their music roots like Nada Surf did years ago after they were dropped from Elektra Records when they made an allegedly unmarketable album.

zzzzzzzzzzzzzz Either way, it might be a long time until we hear from The All-American Rejects again. The band have a lot of growing up to do and so does their music.

Brady clutch as always

By Rick Gosselin
Knight Ridder

PITTSBURGH – Tom Brady isn't the perfect quarterback.

Until he needs to be.

The New England Patriots reminded the Pittsburgh Steelers and everyone else in the NFL for that matter – why they have won three Super Bowl championships in the last four years and are the favorite again in 2005.

The Patriots have the best quarterback in the game. Brady proved it once again in the fourth quarter Sunday night with 15 minutes of perfect football that produced a 23-20 victory over the Steelers.

The Patriots were knee-deep in imperfect football game. They were committing uncharacteristic turnovers – three in the first 45 minutes. They were committing uncharacteristic penalties – 10 on the night for 118 yards.

That flawed performance produced a 13-10 deficit against the Steelers heading into the fourth quarter.

Pittsburgh held regular-season streaks of 16 consecutive victories and 11 consecutive home victories.

The fourth-largest crowd in Heinz Field history was screaming for the Steelers to avenge that 2004 AFC title game loss to the Patriots on this very same field just eight months before.

Brady must have been wearing earplugs, because he was oblivious to the frenzy. He also was oblivious to the Steelers, playing the fourth quarter as if there were no defenders on the field.

Brady completed all 12 of his passes in the fourth quarter for 167 yards, directing three scoring drives. Even when the Steelers gamely fought back to tie the game at 20-20 on a short touchdown pass from Ben Roethlisberger to Hines Ward with 1:21 remaining, the Patriots never flinched.

"I was hoping our defense would stop them," Brady said. "But when they scored I said, 'OK, now it's our turn.' What was there, 1:20 left? We've seen that before. What more could you want?"

The Patriots have won all three of their Super Bowls this decade by three points. Two of them came on Adam Vinatieri field goals in the closing seconds.

It was more of the same Sunday as Vinatieri rammed home the game-winner from 43 yards with one second left in regulation.

"Adam is the most clutch kicker in the history of football," Brady said.

And Brady is the most clutch quarterback of his generation. As good as he was Sunday – 31 of 41 passing for 372 yards, including that perfect fourth quarter – he's been better.

Harrison out for season

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. – Rodney Harrison, the fiery leader of the New England Patriots' defense, is expected to miss the rest of the season with a knee injury that further depletes a battered secondary.

"I feel so bad because he's one of the hardest working guys on the team," linebacker Willie McGinest said Monday. "He puts everything into this game. He plays it with passion."

Harrison suffered a torn anterior cruciate ligament Sunday that will sideline him the rest of the season, his agent, Steve Feldman, told the Boston Herald. The Boston Globe and area broadcasters cited an unidentified team source in reporting the same information.

Feldman did not return several phone calls from The Associated Press.

Patriots coach Bill Belichick refused to disclose anything on Harrison or tackle Matt Light, who left Heinz Field in Pittsburgh on Sunday with a cast on his right leg.

The loss of the Super Bowl champs' best defensive back could be costlier than last year's injuries to starting cornerbacks Ty Law and Tyrone Poole that sidelined both for most of the season.

Harrison, a strong safety who started every game since he arrived from San Diego in 2003, was hurt in the first quarter of New England's 23-20 win when Pittsburgh wide receiver Cedrick Wilson hit his legs after being bumped by a New England player.

Harrison grimaced and was driven off the field on a cart. After the game, a cart was used to get him to the team bus.

"I went in at halftime and you could just tell that he was hurting," free safety Eugene Wilson said. "He had tears in his eyes because he loves the game so much and to go down and know that you might not be able to play, it hurts."

The loss of Harrison diminished the Patriots' enjoyment of a last-second win against a tough opponent after the Steelers tied the game at 20 with 1:21 left. Tom Brady completed all three of his passes to set up Adam Vinatieri's 43-yard field goal with 1 second left.

"You always try to know what you need, try to manage the game given the game situation," Belichick said, "and I think that's one of the things that Tom does best."

Harrison, whose physical style has led to numerous fines during his 12 NFL seasons, kept the patched-up secondary together last season. Now that task falls to Wilson, a starter since the Patriots drafted him in 2003 out of Illinois.

"Of course, Rodney was the leader back in the secondary and now I'm going to have to take on that void," Wilson said. "He's like a big brother to me out there. He's helped me along since I've been here."

Guss Scott, who missed all last season with a knee injury, replaced Harrison.

The Patriots also lost Light to what could be a serious injury. Like Harrison, he left the field on a cart. Light's agent, Ben Dogra, did not return a call seeking comment.

When asked if Harrison or Light would play Sunday against San Diego, Belichick said only, "We'll do the injury report on Wednesday."

Light was replaced by Nick Kaczur, a third-round draft choice who gives the Patriots two rookies on the left side of the line. First-round pick Logan Mankins has been the starting left guard all season and both played fairly well against Pittsburgh.

"We bring in smart guys here and guys that know how to play the game," center Dan Koppen said. "When they get in those situations, they're able to execute it out on the field."

The Patriots played Sunday without three injured defensive backs: cornerbacks Poole and Randall Gay and safety James Sanders. Cornerback Duane Starks was hurt on Pittsburgh's first series, but returned later in the game.

Scott "is smaller [than Harrison] but he also brings a lot of intensity, like yesterday. He made a lot of great plays," Wilson said. "Rodney, he brings different kind of intensity. He's like a wild man out there. Guss, he's a little more composed."

Last season, numerous injuries in the secondary led to Belichick's decision to use wide receiver Troy Brown at cornerback and linebacker Don Davis at safety. Still, New England won its third Super Bowl in four years.

"We don't pride ourselves on getting guys hurt and still trying to win games," McGinest said. "We need everybody we can [get]. We just play hard and guys that are coming in have to just step up."

UMass getting healthy

ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

This weekend saw the first signs of fall at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, with temperatures dropping down into the 50s, dreary overcast skies and the wind blowing just enough to make indoors seem enticing.

It wasn't ideal conditions for returning from an injury (let alone playing a soccer game), but Saturday against the Harvard Crimson marked the first time the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-5) has seen senior Ernie Billittier this season, and the first time senior captain Oral Bullen has played since coming down hard on his ankle against Hartford on Sept. 13.

Bullen started the game for the Minutemen and didn't make much of a splash in his first game back.

His only shot came in the first half with UMass down 1-0. Sophomore Matt Lemire dribbled down the left side of the field and chipped a pass to a streaking Bullen on the left side of the 18-yard goal box. Bullen angled his body toward the net and headed the ball across the goal, going out of bounds on the other side.

Bullen has two goals and one assist in the five games he has played this season, good for four points and 10th in the Atlantic 10 for points scored, just behind teammate Lemire who is in ninth place with six points (three goals).

Bullen, a preseason All-Atlantic 10 selection, led the Minutemen last year in all offensive categories, including points (23), goals (9) and assists (5).

However, this injury has shown that Bullen is not invincible.

"I thought he did OK," UMass coach Sam Koch said after Bullen's return on Sunday. "[Bullen] needs to play simpler. He's not free of making mistakes either. I thought there was some times where he turned when he could have hit the ball back.

"There was one play in the second half where he turned right into the defender when he had an easy back pass," he added. "Those are the kind of things we have to eliminate. We can't be giving balls away."

Ankle injuries can be underestimated. With the constant turning, change of direction and weight shifting that come with playing an endurance sport like soccer (a sport where the skill positions value lower body grace and agility), the games can be dangerous to an already-tender ankle.

"It felt alright," Bullen said after Sunday's game. "It felt pretty good. It was twisting a little bit. It doesn't feel like I'm 100 percent yet.

"I'm just excited to be back out there. Unfortunately we had a rough [game] today and it kind of took the excitement away. But I'm just happy to be back playing and practicing."

When athletes are saddled with injuries, there is no worse punishment than watching from the sidelines as teammates celebrate the elation of victory or the bitterness of defeat.

That is what Bullen and Billittier have endured. Bullen had played in four games before he went down with an injury, but Billittier hadn't set foot on the field for a game until Sunday, where he received significant playing time.

"It's getting a lot stronger," Billittier said of his ongoing ankle injury. "It's getting stronger week by week. I've been doing rehab two or three times a day so it felt good to get out there and run around a little bit. I'm not as explosive as I was before I hurt it but I'm definitely not far away."

For the senior defender it was as difficult a task to watch his teammates play without him as it was to overcome his injury.

"It was hard watching," he said. "I missed five games and that was tough. It wasn't just a physical battle; it was a mental battle, too. Finally, to get back out here and running around with the guys felt pretty good."

UMass took its fifth loss on Sunday against the Crimson, losing 2-0 with few positives to squeeze out of the loss. Billittier has watched from the sideline enough to know what needs to be done to turn things around.

"We need to work on keeping a better shape on offense and defense," he said. "We've got a few more games before the conference [season] starts so hopefully we can figure it out. We have to get in some kind of a rhythm, offensively as well as defensively."

Koch offered his own take on the two returning seniors after Sunday's game.

"Are they back at game speed? Let's put it this way: the whole team wasn't at game speed."

The Minutemen face Boston University (1-3-1) Wednesday at Rudd Field, then travel to Siena on Saturday before coming home to face Rhode Island on Oct. 8 for their first conference game of the season.

UMass is 3-5-0 right now and struggling to find a rhythm. Koch said before the season that by the time the Rhode Island game arrives, he wants his team firing on all cylinders. Maybe it will be an easier task with two more seniors suiting up.

Minutewomen battle through losing streak

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Last week was a long week for the Massachusetts women's soccer team. The Minutewomen (3-5-1) played three games at home in six days, losing all of them, and are now left searching for some of the confidence that led them to a strong start.

The problem is there isn't any easy answer to why UMass has lost the games, as they've found a different way to squander each one.

There was the frustrating one goal loss last Sunday to a Vermont team they completely dominated. Then on Wednesday they hung tough with a superior Dartmouth squad, but ultimately came up short. And they outplayed a tough Fairfield team on Saturday, but lost 1-0 because they were unable to generate any goals.

During this three-game losing streak, the main feeling for coach Jim Rudy and his players has been frustration.

"The frustrating part is that we're close," Rudy said. "We're close, but we're not there yet."

Much of the frustration has come as a result of the Minutewomen's inability to score. UMass only managed one goal in the three losses, while limiting their opponents to just four goals.

The Fairfield loss was especially difficult to take, because it continued a trend for the Minutewomen, in which they outplay their opponents for much of the game, but fail to capitalize on their scoring chances.

"We just have to capitalize on our shots," senior captain Lindsey Bellini said. "I think we get too excited when we get chances."

Rudy feels that it will be necessary to turn up the intensity in practice to try to get some of the confidence back that the team seems to have lost.

"I'm going to be very demanding next week," Rudy said. "After the sessions we're going to have Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, if they're not back into it, we won't be back into it. They're going to be grueling sessions."

Another concern during a losing streak like the one UMass is currently in the midst of is that the young players could let their confidence be shaken. And with half of the roster comprised of freshmen and sophomores, this team would seem particularly vulnerable, but Rudy and Bellini are confident that the veterans will provide leadership.

"I think it's easier for the younger kids," Rudy said. "They come in here and they're used to winning. It's the veterans that are more like 'Oh boy, where are we now, what's going to happen?' I think we'll be OK though, because we have good leaders."

"My whole class is awesome," Bellini said. "There are five of us seniors and I think all of us have our own little things that we take as leadership. If people are down, we have to go out of our way to pull them up, because we can't get too down after a game. The next game starts at the end of this game, so we can't sulk for too long."

Rudy is aiming to have the team ready for this weekend's games, as UMass will face two Atlantic 10 opponents at home, Fordham on Friday and St. Bonaventure on Sunday.

"We're getting ready for the A-10 [schedule] and it's a different season right now," Rudy said. "I'm just disappointed that we ended [the non-conference schedule] the way we did; losing three games, two of which were very winnable."

"We just have to get our confidence back next weekend," Bellini said. "We have to keep up a positive attitude. Conference is the important thing. We want to make the A-10's – that's one of our goals every year."

And if the Minutewomen have aspirations of making the postseason, this weekend is as good a chance as any to start to make strides in that direction.

SEATTLE – No wonder we're falling in love with Charlie Weis. Notre Dame's new coach revealed Sunday he used a play sent in by a 10-year-old boy dying of an inoperable brain tumor on Saturday during his 31 team's 36-17 victory over Washington.

Weis met with Montana Mazurkiewicz, his mother Cathy and brother Rockne on Wednesday, three weeks after the boy had been informed by doctors there was nothing they could do to stop the spread of the tumor. Weis showed up at the Mazurkiewicz home in Mishawaka, Ind., just east of campus, and spoke with Montana about his tumor and about Weis' 10-year-old daughter Hannah, who has global development delay, a rare disorder similar to autism.

He told Montana about some pranks he played on Joe Montana while they were roommates at Notre Dame. "I gave him a chance to hammer me on the Michigan State loss, which he did very well. He reminded me of my son," said Weis, whose son, Charlie Jr., is 12. "Then I was able to get a couple smiles out of him. His mom got to take a couple pictures. She said it was the first time he really smiled in about three months.

"He told me about his love for Notre Dame football and how he wanted to make it through this game this week," Weis said. "He just wanted to be able to live through this game because he knew he wasn't going to live very much longer."

As Weis talked with the boy, Montana's mother rubbed her son's shoulder, trying to ease the pain. She told Montana, who had just lost feeling in his lower body a day earlier, to toss her a football Weis had given him. Montana tried to throw the ball, but could barely lift it. So Weis climbed into the reclining chair with him and helped him complete the pass to his mother. Before he left, Weis asked Montana if there was anything he could do. He agreed to let Montana call the first play against Washington. He called "pass right."

Montana never got to see that play materialize. He died on Friday.

Weis told the team about the visit and then dedicated the game to Montana. He called Montana's mother Friday night to assure her he would still call the play. "I just wanted our players to realize they represent a lot of people that they don't even realize they're representing," Weis said.

Notre Dame received and got the ball on its own 1, but Weis never forgot his promise. He called for a rollout right and the play wound up being a 13-yard completion from Brady Quinn to tight end Anthony Fasano. It is now the newest chapter in Notre Dame folklore.

Weis called the family after the game and arranged for the team to autograph a ball he brought to the Mazurkiewicz's house.

And third-ranked Virginia Tech (4-0) looks like it has a legitimate shot to play in the BCS Championship Game at the Rose Bowl.

Conversely, Louisville, considered to be the best team in the newly realigned Big East, fell flat on its face Saturday, losing to South Florida, 45-14, in Tampa and leaving the potential for either West Virginia or South Florida to play a Big Ten representative like Wisconsin in the Orange Bowl.

Injured Akers earns respect

BY SAM DONNELLON
KNIGHT RIDDER

PHILADELPHIA – He has argued for years that he is an athlete by nature, kicker by trade. And it's not that he wasn't believed. It's just that when a guy speaks eye-to-eye to you in a locker room full of stadium-sized football players, in a locker room full of discolored limbs, of braces, of casts and tape – well, it's like, "Yeah sure."

Never again. Not after Sunday's doctor-place drama at Lincoln Financial Field, when David Akers and Donovan McNabb took turns lifting their damaged limbs off the Linc carpet, taking turns grimacing in pain for the television cameras as 67,735 and those stadium-sized men felt their pain.

"They call him a kicker, but he's not a kicker," Mike Bartrum, his kickoff replacement, was saying after Akers winced the Eagles to a 23-20 victory over the Raiders with a 23-yard field goal in the waning seconds of the game. "He's a football player.

"A tough guy," Bartrum also said, a description that echoed throughout a locker room more relieved than celebratory.

Relieved because the outcome could have been, and by all rights should have been, much worse. Relieved because in a season already marked by the usual dubious decisions by the head coach, not deactivating Akers and his sore hamstring for this game had the chance to be – and over the long haul still does – a most costly one.

Akers collapsed on the opening kickoff, grabbing the back of his leg.

"I just felt like I got shot," Akers said. "A totally different kind of pain."

The Eagles were offside. Akers tried again and collapsed again, and again the Eagles were offside.

He was under trainers' care by the time Bartrum booted a third and final try out of bounds. Soon after, he was carted into the locker room, and Oakland was starting the game's first drive on the 50-yard line. The Eagles' Pro Bowl kicker couldn't kick. Who knew for how long? Soon after, it seemed the Pro Bowl quarterback couldn't throw, or run, either. Someone said something about a sports hernia. Who knew for how long?

A warm, inviting day was becoming one of cold realities. A once-inviting season has become one of ominous clouds.

"If he wasn't coming back," Oakland safety Stuart Schweigert said of Akers, "we would have won that game hands down."

Here's why: The Eagles traded touchdowns with the Raiders in the first half and trailed 7-6 because Akers could not confidently assure coaches he could make an extra point. Instead, they went the Mark Simoneau route, a well that proved to be a quick dry. Simoneau pumped his try into the line of scrimmage.

But Akers came out and tried a few chip shots before the second half began, changed the tilt of the ball and the stress on his right leg, tried to make this a mission of pain and not performance.

"I asked God," he said, "just let the pain go away for a minute here."

Instead, the pain was meted out in time segments that allowed. Akers said, "the throbbing to go down." Terrell Owens scored early in the third quarter and Akers put the Eagles up 13-10. Almost 10 minutes of playing time later, Brian Westbrook scored and Akers kicked one through again. The Eagles led 20-10.

Had Akers been healthy all game, Oakland's final touchdown would have required a two-point conversion to gain the tie. Had he not been available in that second half, there is a good chance the touchdown Oakland scored in the final minutes would have given them a lead, not a tie.

Had he not been available all game, there is a good chance the Eagles' final drive would have required a touchdown, not his field goal.

"I would never purposefully let anybody down on this team," he said. "But I felt privileged to be able to have the opportunity to make it up to them."

Take away Akers aching and McNabb limping and this was still no work of art. Twice the Eagles coughed up the football on the verge of a touchdown. Twice the Raiders coughed it up as well, but pounced on their own miscues. On the Raiders' final drive, which tied the score, Michael Lewis dropped an interception that would have saved us from watching Akers fall to the ground in pain one last time.

But collapse he did, disappearing under his overly exuberant holder, Koy Detmer, who seemed oblivious to anything that had happened to that point, seemed oblivious to anything but the fact that one of the NFL's most dependable kickers had once again won a game.

He has kicked in snow and rain, with winds trickier than any of Reid's gimmick plays. He has won games with such kicks, determined playoff games and homefield advantages.

And he has won games the way athletes do, not just playing in pain, but performing despite it.

"I'm honestly most proud of this kick today," he said. "I want people to know that when I'm out there I give 100 percent of whatever I can. Right now it's not very much."

No, but on a day of mess and misses all around, "not very much" was just enough.

Jeter receives death threats

BY PAT MILTON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – Yankees star Derek Jeter has received a threatening letter reportedly warning him to stop dating white women or "he'll be shot or set on fire."

FBI special agent Scott Wilson, speaking by phone from Cleveland, confirmed the bureau's probe Monday, saying "we have an ongoing open investigation into racially threatening letters to Jeter and others across the country." He declined to comment further.

The New York Police Department has also investigated the matter.

The Daily News reported Monday that the hate mail to the Yankees' 31-year-old captain called him a "traitor to his race" for dating white women. It warned him "to stop or he'll be shot or set on fire," the News said.

The Daily News reported that others received similar threats, including U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, Miami Dolphins defensive lineman Jason Taylor, and the parents of tennis star James Blake.

Jeter, picked by People magazine as one of the world's most eligible bachelors, has been linked with models, singers, actresses and athletes of various racial and ethnic backgrounds in New York's gossip columns. His mother is white and his father is black.

The NYPD's hate crimes unit recently completed a four-month investigation into the letter to Jeter – mailed to Yankee Stadium earlier this season, according to Detective Brian Sessa. The department has not made public the investigation's outcome.

Yankee spokesman Jason Zillo declined to comment.

In an interview broadcast Sunday on CBS' "60 Minutes," Jeter said that he and his sister were taunted for being bi-racial while growing up in Michigan. But the soft-spoken, cool-headed Yankee said that he has never heard any racial epithets from the fans at Yankee Stadium in his 11 seasons as a Yankee.

The threats have been traced to the Cleveland area.

UMass expands online learning program

BY ANNA DOLIANITIS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Center for Educational Software Development at the University of Massachusetts is expanding its computer science component by marketing it at universities nationwide this fall.

Online Web-based Learning (OWL), first developed in 1996 at the UMass Amherst by the Center for Educational Software Development is now used at over 200 colleges and universities nationwide, including the University of Arizona, San Francisco State and Texas A&M.

"It's like a practice system more than a quiz," said David Hart, the director of the group responsible for developing OWL.

The premise behind OWL is that a student is assigned a user ID and password for a particular class and homework assignments are given on the program. The homework is thereafter electronically graded, and students are given the correct answer, as well as feedback explaining what they did incorrectly. "The difference between this and taking a quiz in a particular class is that if students fail, they can take the quiz again, until they have an understanding of the material," Hart said.

Originally, the program consisted solely of a chemistry component, however, because of its growing popularity, OWL has branched out into over 20 different departments at UMass, as diverse as Physics, Computer Science and Art History.

The chemistry component of OWL spread nationwide in 2001, however, until now, no other subject has followed. The computer science OWL has now opened to other universities nationwide, including Mercer College and various community colleges.

The computer science OWL differs greatly from the other subjects.

"Programming is a matter of writing things out in code," Hart said.

Uniquely, the computer science OWL allows for students to send entire parts of computer programs, proving that they are capable of the skills necessary in learning about computer science.

"OWL is evaluation with teeth. It tells the student why they are right or wrong and gives meaningful feedback, in real-time," said Robert Moll, a creator of the computer science OWL.

The funding of OWL development comes from various outside grants, including the National Science Foundation and the U.S. Department of

UMass Police Dept. issues crime alert

The University of Massachusetts Police Department has issued a crime alert after a possibly serious crime occurred over the weekend.

Police say around 2:15 a.m. Sunday, they received reports of gun shots being fired and an armed robbery in Lot 71, just outside Curry Hicks Cage.

Officers arrived on scene within a couple of minutes. When one officer arrived he observed a man drop a .45 caliber handgun on the ground. He ordered the suspect to drop to the ground, but he began a brief pursuit instead, which lasted only a few seconds.

Police arrested Aaron Love, 23, of 32 Greenacre Sq. floor 2 in Springfield. He was charged with carrying a firearm without a license, carrying a firearm on school grounds and defacing a serial number on a firearm.

Scott Taylor, 21, of 49 Knox St. in Springfield was also arrested in the incident for outstanding warrants.

UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said an officer on patrol in the area spoke with someone who claimed to be a victim of armed robbery in Lot 71. However, police have been unable speak with other potential victims.

UMPD is asking anyone with information to call 413-577-TIPS to speak to the confidential tip line, or 413-545-0893 to speak with a police detective.

The incident occurred outside the annual "Jeans and Tee Shirt Dance" at the Cage. Archbald says the event has caused disturbances in the past few years.

Police believe the incident Sunday morning may have been gang related.

UMass professor to address arsenic crisis

This semester, The Environmental Institute (TEI) at the University of Massachusetts is hosting an environmental lecture series on topics related to the global environment and health.

The interdisciplinary series seeks to draw students and faculty across colleges and disciplines together around a critical environment theme each semester.

The first lecture, "The arsenic crisis in Bangladesh," will take place Sept. 29 at 3:30 p.m., in the Bernie Dallas room of the Goodell building at UMass.

Dr. Charles Harvey, associate professor from Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) will discuss the arsenic crisis in Bangladesh. Harvey is a researcher in the Civil and Environmental Department at MIT, his talk will focus on the mobility and transport of arsenic in groundwater, the impact of irrigation wells and the overall effects on public health.

Arsenic poisoning is a world wide problem and the World Bank describes the problem as one of the world's primary environmental challenges. The World Health Organization (WHO) refers to it as the largest mass poisoning of a population in history.

Health effects are characterized by sores on the chest, skin, lung and bladder. In addition, pancreatic cancer has been linked to presence of arsenic in drinking water.

Most Bangladeshis continue to drink arsenic contaminated water. In 1998, the World Bank agreed to provide $52.4 million to help develop a method of controlling arsenic. Harvey has published many papers related on this topic and some research results on effects of arsenic will be covered.

The lecture series is free and open to public.

A reception follows the lecture.

New Orleans police chief gives resignation

BY JULIA SILVERMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS — Police Superintendent Eddie Compass resigned Tuesday after four turbulent weeks in which the police force was wracked by desertions and disorganization in Hurricane Katrina's aftermath.

"I served this department for 26 years and have taken it through some of the toughest times of its history. Every man in a leadership position must know when it's time to hand over the reins," Compass said at a news conference. "I'll be going on in another direction that God has for me."

As the city slipped into anarchy during the first few days after Katrina, the 1,700-member police department itself suffered a crisis. Many officers deserted their posts, and some were accused of joining in the looting that broke out. Two officers Compass described as friends committed suicide.

Neither Compass nor Mayor Ray Nagin would say whether Compass was pressured to resign.

"It's a sad day in the city of New Orleans when a hero makes a decision like this," said Nagin, who appointed Compass in mid-2002. "He leaves the department in pretty good shape and with a significant amount of leadership."

Nagin named Assistant Superintendent Warren Riley as acting superintendent.

Lt. David Benelli, president of the union for rank-and-file New Orleans officers, said he was shocked by the resignation.

"We've been through a horrendous time," Benelli said. "We've watched the city we love be destroyed. That is pressure you can't believe."

Benelli would not criticize Compass.

"You can talk about lack of organization, but we have been through two hurricanes, there was no communications, problems everywhere," he said. "I think the fact that we did not lose control of the city is a testament to his leadership."

But in fact, chaos reigned in New Orleans as Katrina's floodwaters rose. Gunfire and other lawlessness broke out around the city. Rescue workers reported being shot at.

Ronnie Jones, a former Louisiana State Police officer and a criminal justice instructor at Tulane and Southeastern Universities, said communication and transportation problems after the storm forced commanders on the ground to operate without any direction from above.

"In the midst of that, I think any chief would have had trouble dealing with things," Jones said. "In a crisis you have to coordinate forces. I don't think he had the resources, the radios, the communications to do that."

Earlier in the day Tuesday, the department said that about 250 police officers — roughly 15 percent of the force — could face discipline for leaving their posts without permission during Katrina and its aftermath.

Each case will be investigated to determine whether the officer was truly a deserter or had legitimate reasons to be absent, Riley said.

"Everything will be done on a case-by-case basis. The worst thing we could do is take disciplinary action against someone who was stranded in the storm or whose child is missing," Riley said.

Sally Forman, a spokeswoman for the mayor, said it is not clear whether the deserters can be fired. She said the city is still looking into the civil service regulations.

"If they are deserters and deserted their post for no other reason than they were scared, then I don't see any need for them to come back," Benelli said.

Textbook prices inflated by 'bundling'

BY CHRISTINE CLARK
THE GUARDIAN (UC-SAN DIEGO)

LA JOLLA, Calif.— A national report released by the Government Accountability Office in July concluded that the price of textbooks has risen at twice the rate of inflation in the last two decades, largely due to of the sales tactics of publishers.

Frequent new editions and the grouping of textbooks with supplemental material — a process known as "bundling" — have contributed to the increased cost of textbooks, according to the report.

The report stated that rising costs associated with product design, including CD-ROMs and other supplements, is the most significant factor in textbook pricing. It revealed that textbook prices have increased an average of 6 percent a year, nearly tripling since December 1986. In addition, the report found that textbooks sold overseas were less expensive when compared to textbooks sold domestically.

Rep. David Wu (D-Ore.), a member of the House education committee, requested a GAO investigation after he received complaints from constituents about high textbook prices, according to spokeswoman Gillian Schoene.

"As a result of the report, we have some hard data that supports that bundling has led to the increased cost of textbooks," Schoene said. "Students are sometimes having to spend [up] to $900 and it is hurting their ability to take certain classes. Students are trying to get around buying textbooks by buying some, but not others. [This campaign] falls within [Wu's] greater efforts to make higher education accessible."

Although the report concluded that publishers are partly responsible for the rising cost of textbooks, it also lists several other reasons for the price increases, including a parallel rise in college tuition.

However, publishers say they are selling new materials to accompany textbooks in order to meet the demands of professors, according to Association of American Publishers Executive Director Bruce Hildebrand.

Hildebrand also said that all the supplemental materials created by publishers are designed to enhance the educational experience.

"The tests you take online, the overhead sheets the professor uses, all of those materials — God didn't make them, publishers did," Hildebrand said. "All of those materials are produced by publishers in order to facilitate the needs of higher education."

But California Public Interest Research Group, which has been fighting against the rise of textbook prices, said that the report supports its campaign.

"A CALPIRG survey found that half of all textbooks now come 'bundled,' or shrink-wrapped with additional instructional materials, such as CD-ROMs and workbooks," CALPIRG Program Director Dave Rosenfeld stated in an e-mail. "Some publishers tell professors the CD-ROMs and workbooks are free. The reality is the bundled items can dramatically increase the cost of a textbook."

The Gas Gauge

In an effort to help aid students cope with the skyrocketing gas prices, the Daily Collegian seeks to find the best prices for gas across the Amherst and Hadley area. Here is a listing of what we found:

Gas Prices as of 9/27/05:

2.86 ... Cumberland Farms, Route 9, Hadley
2.87 ... Cumberland Farms 389 College St.
2.89 ... Sunoco Route 9—Stop and shop strip
2.89 ... Shell Route 9—stop and shop strip
2.89 ... Citgo Route 9, by Dunkin Donuts
2.93 ... Exxon Route 9, Shop and Stop Strip
2.94 ... Mobil Route 9, Stop & Shop strip

A representative from the Mobil Station on Route 9 was quick to give her explanation of having the highest prices in town. "We all buy at different prices—everybody buys their gas from different places. A lot of the stations around are distributor, which means they have there own tankers and some have refineries. But for [the individually owned stations], we buy directly, and whatever prices they charge us we take into account and then we have to make a profit."

"We normally go down at least a nickel on Wednesdays. We've been doing it as a service to our customers for years," said the representative who asked to remain anonymous.

FCC proposes new fines for violating obscenity standards

By Elaine Fabian
The Daily Iowan (U.Iowa)

IOWA CITY — In a perpetual battle that pits freedom of speech against federal regulations, the U.S. Senate may boost the fines for violating obscenity standards — a step that some think is going too far.

A proposed fine that is more than 18 times the current penalty may push already low-funded college stations into more financial trouble, while possibly teetering into unconstitutional grounds.

The Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act, which was introduced at the beginning of this year, would increase the maximum fine for broadcasting obscenity from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. from $27,000 to $500,000, if approved.

But the bill may violate the First Amendment, because it may force some stations to regulate their content excessively to stay in business, said Marcelo Mena, the KRUI Radio music director.

KRUI has to examine more songs for offensive content than the average Top 40 station, so it is more difficult to find violations before going on air, he said. Also, small stations such as KRUI would go bankrupt if hit with such a large fine.

"It is a slippery slope towards monopoly," University of Iowa graduate student Mena said. "It puts college radios more at risk than top 40 stations."

The proposed Senate act is a response to several broadcast brouhahas — such as the 2003 Super Bowl halftime show involving pop stars Janet Jackson and Justin Timberlake and shock-jock radio host Howard Stern's constant use of vulgarity — and an increased pressure from the public to have more pressure on the FCC.

More than two million complaints were filed with the FCC in 2003, skyrocketing from only 111 complaints in 2000, according to the bill.

Though satellite stations have been an outlet for broadcasters with routine FCC violations — thus reducing the number of infractions overall — the government does not need more strict fines, said Dick Stadlen, operations manager for Cumulus Media, which owns radio stations in Cedar Rapids and Waterloo.

"It's like using an elephant gun when a fly swatter would be OK," he added. "I would be hard-pressed to find an incident where someone violated the decency standards. It's like [the government is] showboating for something."

Despite the number of complaints, media officials said they believe the broadcast industry is doing a good job of watching what it airs. Stations regulate themselves by catering to their audiences, Stadlen said.

"If stations broadcast something that audiences aren't comfortable with, people aren't going to listen to it," he said. "Then advertisers will turn away from the station, and it will probably go out of business."

After a review and a few minor changes, the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation sent the bill back to the full Senate with minor changes, where it awaits action.

Daily Gazette sold

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — The Daily Hampshire Gazette, the oldest continually published newspaper in Massachusetts, is being sold to the Concord, N.H.-based Newspapers of New England.

The sale was announced Tuesday by Gazette publisher Peter DeRose, whose family has owned the newspaper since 1929. The purchase price was not disclosed.

The transaction, which is expected to be completed by January, also includes the sale of the weekly Amherst Bulletin, the Gazette's smaller sister paper.

The privately owned Newspapers of New England publishes the Concord Monitor in New Hampshire. It also owns the Recorder in Greenfield, located about 20 miles north of the Gazette's Northampton newsroom. NNE also publishes another daily and one weekly newspaper in New Hampshire.

"I am looking forward to working closely with this group of community-oriented newspapers which we have long respected," DeRose said in a news release. "Combining our resources with theirs will help the Gazette and the Bulletin to continue improving services to both print and online readers and to our advertisers."

OWL, free of charge

Education. According to Hart's news release, "A $480,000 National Science Foundation grant supported the development of the computer science OWL."

OWL is a free program for UMass students; however, when brought to other schools, this convenient technology was accompanied by a cost. The Center for Educational Software Development has marketed its product to Thomson Higher Education, who then coupled the program with their textbooks sold at other universities.

In an effort to persuade students to purchase old rather than new textbooks, Thomson has set the price of the OWL software at $12 when purchased with the book, but $27 to $35 when purchased separately.

"Students yearn for the times when there was lots of TAs," said Hart, "but as times have become tighter, the number of TAs and graders has begun shrinking." He considers OWLS the solution to this problem, and maintains that although "doing online homework isn't as personal," it is "more time on task."

Former FEMA director is mocked by lawmakers

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—An angry Michael Brown blamed the Louisiana governor, the New Orleans mayor and even the Bush White House that appointed him for the dismal response to Hurricane Katrina in a fiery appearance Tuesday before Congress. In response, lawmakers alternately lambasted and mocked the former FEMA director.

House members' scathing treatment of Brown, in a hearing stretching nearly six and a half hours, underscored how he has become an emblem of the deaths, lingering floods and stranded survivors after the Aug. 29 storm.

Well aware of President Bush's sunken poll ratings, legislators of both parties tried to distance themselves from the federal preparations for Katrina, as well as from the storm's aftermath.

Brown admitted making mistakes during the storm and subsequent flooding that devastated large swaths of the Gulf Coast. But he accused New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, both Democrats, of fostering chaos by failing to order a mandatory evacuation more than a day before Katrina hit.

"My biggest mistake was not recognizing by Saturday that Louisiana was dysfunctional," Brown told a special panel set up by House Republican leaders to investigate the catastrophe, which killed more than 1,000 people across Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"I very strongly personally regret that I was unable to persuade Governor Blanco and Mayor Nagin to sit down, get over their differences and work together. I just couldn't pull that off."

Brown also said he warned Bush, White House chief of staff Andrew Card and deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin that "this is going to be a bad one" in e-mails and phone conversations leading up to the storm. Under pointed questioning, he said some needs outlined to the White House, Pentagon and Homeland Security Department were not answered in "the timeline that we requested."

Blanco vehemently denied that she waited until the eve of the storm to order an evacuation of New Orleans. She said her order came on the morning of Aug. 27 — two days before the storm — resulting in 1.3 million people evacuating the city.

"Such falsehoods and misleading statements, made under oath before Congress, are shocking," Blanco said in a statement.

Nagin said in New Orleans, "I think it's too early to get into name-blame and all that stuff. ... I think the feds, local, state, all across the board, did not have the processes to deal with a storm of this magnitude."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "It's important that Congress move forward and do a thorough investigation of what went wrong and what went right and look at lessons learned."

Republican and Democratic lawmakers alike gave harsh assessments of Brown's explanations and said they were glad he no longer headed the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Brown resigned Sept. 12 after being relieved of his onsite command of the response effort three days earlier.

He had held the post for more than two years after joining FEMA in 2001.

"I'm happy you left," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn. "Because those kind of, you know, look in the lights like a deer tells me that you weren't capable to do the job."

"You get an F-minus in my book," said Rep. Gene Taylor, D-Miss.

At several points, Brown turned red in the face and slapped the table in front of him.

"So I guess you want me to be the superhero, to step in there and take everyone out of New Orleans," Brown said.

"What I wanted you to do is do your job and coordinate," Shays retorted.

Brown, who remains on FEMA's payroll for two more weeks before he leaves his post, rejected accusations that he was inexperienced for a job during which he oversaw 150 presidentially declared disasters. Prior to joining FEMA, he was an attorney, held local government posts and headed the International Arabian Horse Association.

Former Federal Emergecy Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael Brown testifies before a special congressional panal investigating the agency's response to Hurricane Katrina.

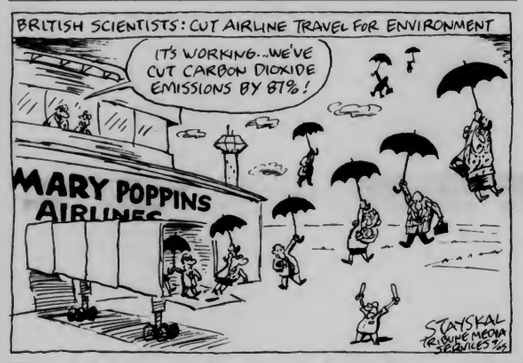
Mass. Governor out of line with anti-Dem. comments

Governor of Massachusetts W. Mitt Romney has certainly made a name for himself being a Republican Governor in a primarily Democratic state. After the 2004 Presidential Elections, Senator John Kerry absolutely portrayed the state of Massachusetts in such a way that showed the entire country just how Democratic they are. However, Romney, according to an article that appeared in The Republican on Sept. 27, he is giving the state away. "Being a conservative Republican in Massachusetts," according to Romney "is a bit like being a cattle rancher at a vegetarian convention."

As of the 2004 Presidential Elections, 61 percent of Massachusetts residents who voted were Democrats. Whether that is of your political persuasion or not, it is not wise to omit those citizens who make of the majority of the state. Romney is making Democrats the butt of his jokes in a state where their money goes towards his paycheck.

Looking past the stupidity of the governor's comments, his timing couldn't have been worse. If he had any hopes in upcoming gubernatorial elections or even "a possible presidential run in 2008," according to the Republican, they have just been thrown out the window.

President George W. Bush currently has approval ratings at an all-time low as a result of his actions regarding the Hurricane Katrina aftermath. However, before that, there were still a good number of people in the country who strongly disapproved of his politics, most of them Democrats. Even though he did win, he won the election by a hair. A good leader should acknowledge that information and use it to their advantage.



Romney is doing just the opposite. He is acting like the kid who gets involved in the school club for extra credit from the teacher and then bashes the club members behind their backs. Right now, the administration is Republican. It seems that Romney is banking on them and playing into their hands so they will be able to back him when it comes time for the presidential election.

One very important lesson Governor Romney should learn is not to burn your bridges. He has been the Governor of Massachusetts since 2003 and is contracted to remain there until 2007. He still has two more years to go; two more years that can either be very pleasant and productive or very frustrating and unbearable. His cockiness, one can only hope, won't compromise is ability to govern this state.

Whatever your view of Mitt Romney is, his actions and comments he's made all across this nation are of the same maturity level as a 10 year old. Whether you believe he is doing a good job as Governor of Massachusetts or you believe he should get out of office, there is no reason for him to act the way he has been.

Whether he likes it or not, he holds a very important position in this state's government and he cannot treat that seat with the same disrespect that he has been treating Massachusetts' citizens with over the past week.

Fox News: fair and balanced?

I love Fox News. Their incredibly fair and balanced approach to broadcast journalism deserves endless amounts of praise.

Nick Belanger

I love Bill O'Reilly for writing a book entitled "The O'Reilly Factor for Kids." Thank you, Mr. O'Reilly. You truly are the man to teach today's youth about cheating, sex, drugs, alcohol, advertising, smoking, music, money, relationships with parents, teachers and siblings, death, politics and God. Kids need a role model, and who better to make sure young Americans grow up as straight laced conservatives then O'Reilly? The last thing this country needs is another crazy liberal.

The straight shooting, no spin zone format of "The O'Reilly Factor" has really done a fantastic job of making average Americans vote against their best economic interest. Well done sir, well done. Perhaps I could go on all day "thanking" Bill O'Reilly for his blatant right-winged agenda and bias, but it is not O'Reilly that makes Fox News so wonderfully right-winged, it is not a network's anchors or personalities that defines its political position, rather the attitude, actions and policies of the corporation as a whole.

Thankfully for all of us, Sinclair Broadcast Group, which owns a large number of media outlets, including 60 Fox stations nationwide donated $63,234 to the republicans in the 2004 election cycle. They donated nothing to those crazy democrats in 2004. Additionally, 89 percent of Sinclair's $2.3 million dollars in political donations since 1996 has gone to republicans. But despite the corporate bias, Fox News, a prestigious and trustworthy network, remains fair and balanced. That is good news considering Fox claims they are America's number one news network.

Alright, I think I can stop with all the sarcasm now. What I am saying probably is not news to all of you, but for those who actually watch Fox News and buy into the "fair and balanced" slogan (which is nicely displayed on the Web site) please read on.

Sinclair Broadcast Group has a broad and powerful influence that stretches coast to coast reaching millions and millions of Americans, (millions and millions of registered voters). In an interview with Don Imus, Fox anchor Brit Hume said this of the republican success in the mid-term elections.

... plant yourself in front of Fox News for a few hours. I bet when you turn off the tube you'll be singing God Bless America, hoisting an American flag and running off to buy your younger siblings a copy of Bill O'Reilly's book.

"It was because of our coverage that it happened … People watch us and take their electoral cues from us. No one should doubt the influence of Fox News in these matters."

Believe it or not there was a time when the media was forced to be responsible, leave political agenda aside and simply report the news. For years the Federal Communications Commission regulated media with what was called the fairness doctrine, which forced networks to have comparable representation from multiple points of view. News reporting and opinion had to be clearly distinguished. These regulations were abolished over 15 years ago; the FCC justifies lifting old regulations by saying that the marketplace has changed, cable television and the Internet provides the public with a diversity of news sources, thereby eliminating the need for public guidelines. The FCC is also eliminating regulations that prohibit corporations buying one another, which means the consolidation of the mass media.

Five corporations own a majority of U.S. media; News Corp and AOL Time Warner, Viacom, Disney and AT&T. There was once a time where newspapers and television stations were independently owned and operated, but the corporate giants have bought out and merged so many times that we are now left with five companies controlling this country's mass media.

So what's the product? Well flip through a few of those 24 hour news stations for a little while. Or better yet just plant yourself in front of Fox News for a few hours. I bet when you turn off the tube you'll be singing God Bless America, hoisting an American flag and running off to buy your younger siblings a copy of Bill O'Reilly's book. I know every time I see that cheesy American flag graphic flashing across the bottom of the screen, right next to the current terror alert color, (I think we're at yellow right now) my red, white and blue heart swells with patriotism.

But maybe, just maybe if we all watch Fox or any news station a little more objectively we can see through the corporate watered down garbage that we're being fed 24/7. Maybe we can start to ask why … why aren't we getting more information, why aren't we getting objective non-biased reporting. And perhaps we should all start asking what … what we are not being told.

Words you can't reclaim

What's up my niggaz and bitches? I suppose that is a pretty vulgar and derogatory way of opening my column. Then again, that all depends on who I am. If I am a white man in a cowboy hat, these terms would be inappropriate for me to open with. Actually, as a Persian girl it's still probably inappropriate for me to open my column like this, depending on who is reading the column.

Sanam Hakim

There are some people who think the word "nigga" is only OK for black people to use to other black people and some who think it's OK for any minority to use it. Regardless, if I am Clipse with the Neptunes or Redman accompanying Christina Aguilera, it is appropriate for me to open my song with "niggaz and bitches." I suppose it makes sense, right? You've got Redman "reclaiming" the word "nigga" for black Americans and Christina Aguilera reclaiming the word "bitches" for female Americans, therefore it's OK.

Similarly, this same concept would be applicable to the word "redneck." If I began my article giving a shout out to all my UMass Rednecks, given that I am not white or from the working class, my word choice would be insulting. However, when I was at the Tim McGraw concert last week, it was OK for him to ask "Are there any rednecks in here tonight?" as the whole room cheered hysterically. I suppose he is just "reclaiming" the word for the white, Southern working class.

The idea of "reclaiming" a word is pretty common these days. Basically, reclaiming a word is the process of taking a slur and using it in a "good way" to help restore the sense of pride and honor in the word that was taken away.

The first example is that of black Americans, particularly in the media, who use the word "nigga" as a light and friendly word to describe friendship or companionship within the race, to try to take the "heat" off the word, essentially. The term "nigger" in the United States is popularly thought by historians to be the Southern pronunciation of the word "negro," which comes from the Latin word "niger," meaning "black." It was used frequently as a demeaning term by oppressive racists referring to their slaves.

What I wonder is why a word like this needs to be reclaimed. In my opinion, the pride comes from the root of the word, which is "negro:" black. The term "nigger" was used specifically by Southern whites toward slaves and is associated with images of death and hatred. Why is it that every time I turn on the radio, I hear "I'm a nigga, you're a nigga, nigga this, nigga that?" To me, the word "nigger" or even "nigga" should never be used. Aside from this column, I have never used the word, as it is not only touchy, it is vulgar.

The fine print is so small, that it doesn't even make sense. You can use the word if you're talking to your friends, but some of your friends get offended by it, and some of your friends don't mind if other people use the word, even if they're not black, but you can't say it in front of elders, except for some of the elders who don't care. Some people think Asians, Latinos, Middle Easterners, even occasionally white people like Slim Shady are included in this "niggaz" category, but some think it's just for black people. Why worry about all the fine print and risk offending people? Pride comes in the roots, not the word. Why not just avoid the word?

The idea of "reclaiming" a word is pretty common these days. Basically, reclaiming a word is the process of taking a slur and using it in a "good" way to help restore the sense of pride and honor in the word that was taken away.

Similarly, working class white Americans use the word "redneck," particularly in the media, to build a sense of pride. The term "redneck" in the United States is historically thought to come from 17th century Virginia as a word used to describe the white working class in the South. The actual "red neck" was used to describe the sun burned necks of these poor white people, who worked long hours outdoors. In the past, a "redneck" listened to country music, was poor, racist, religious, drank cheap beer and had a mullet.

In songs you hear today, particularly country music, a pride is built, yet preaches the same theme: I'm poor, but I love God, I love my country, I love my wife and I love beer. I am a proud blue collared, redneck worker. It's amazing to have a sense of pride in who you are, but why do it with a word that's designed to look down on you? The word was created specifically as an insult. It was never a good word that became bad. It was bad from the start.

Next is the word "bitch". Apparently, there is a movement to try to "reclaim" the word bitch for women everywhere, brought along by a newer second wave of feminism in the 1990's. The term "bitch" began to be a popular slur in the early 20th century to describe aggressive and controlling women. Now the term has blossomed into a word with many definitions, and is in the process of being "reclaimed" by the feminist movement. Why would anyone be OK with using the word "bitch" so frequently? In my opinion, I think the reason that it's being used even more is because even women are using it. Missy Elliot tells us that we "won't find a bitch that's even better" and Meredith Brooks tells us that we're not ashamed to be bitches. We're not bitches and the term was only used to insult us. Why would we accustom ourselves to hearing it all the time, make it a "good word" and begin to be proud of being bitches?

The concept of "reclaiming" a word is around us more frequently than we notice, in much lighter contexts. The word "liberal," for example is generally associated with intoxicated hippies with no knowledge of politics or any desire for anything but protesting. The liberal party is trying desperately to "reclaim" the word for what it originally was: an intellectual political group with views less conservative than traditional political groups.

Similarly, the word "feminist" was originally a word for women who demanded social equality, but now has become a term describing manly women that want men eliminated from the planet, while modern feminists try desperately to "reclaim" the word for what it was originally.

These words are good words with a few negative stereotypes attached to them and people began using them as insults. The point is that originally, these words used to describe something good. Words like "nigger" or "redneck" or "bitch" or "fag" were never words that were originally "good". They are words that were created solely out of hatred and it is not our responsibility to add fine print and use them in a different context. It is not our responsibility to convince black people that they actually are "niggaz," but that it's a good thing; to convince white working class Americans that they are rednecks, but that it's a good thing; to convince women that they are bitches, but that it's a good thing; to convince homosexuals that they are fags, but that it's a good thing.

It is our responsibility to make sure when Tim McGraw asks if there are any rednecks in the house, no one cheers. It's our responsibility to stare blankly if DMX asks "where my niggaz at?" It is our responsibility to make sure our children know these words, the history of where they come from and to make sure they don't ever use them, even if they mean it in a nice way.

Sex 'education?'

During the three-day orientation in the middle of the summer, incoming University of Massachusetts freshmen attended a presentation in the Campus Center auditorium performed by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players. A substantial part of the presentation focused on "safe" sex and how to use a condom correctly. This was a shameless act by the performers and an embarrassing display of incompetence by the UMass administration that oversees these events.

Greg Collins

We are told it is inevitable that many students will engage in sexual activity so UMass felt the need to exhibit "realist" thinking in explaining how to put on a condom. There are two types of "real" life education. One is using the public forum to expose, publicize and encourage the practice of potentially harmful human behavior, like irresponsible sex. The other is within the private realm. The choice to have sex is a monumental one for both parties involved.

If you are a woman at UMass and want to get an abortion, are you going to wait for another performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players dissecting and analyzing how to safely abort the fetus of and unborn child?

How do you go about getting educated if you are unaware how to use a condom or are unaware of the possible ramifications of sex? The same way you go about making other important decisions in your life. If you are a woman at UMass and want to get an abortion, are you going to wait for another performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players dissecting and analyzing how to safely abort the fetus of an unborn child? Or do you use the private realm to go about doing this, such as consulting your physician and reading articles and books about the social, medical and ethical implications of abortion?

The "realist" way of thinking would presume that it is inevitable that many women will be faced with the choice whether or not to abort the fetus, so it is necessary to use the public forum to educate them on the issue. In contrast, real "real" life education is taking the private initiative to inform oneself about the complexities of the decision you are going to make without depending on public bureaucracies to do so themselves. This means asking responsible friends who have had sex whether or not you should go ahead and engage in sexual activity. This means that if you do not know how to put on a condom, you go to a reputable Web site source or read a medical dictionary and find out the correct way to use one. This means that, however awkward it may be, you talk with your parents about sex.

It is the same principle regarding issues not related to sex and abortion. The next time you want to buy a car, are you going to thoroughly research the strengths and weaknesses of not just the car but how using it will affect you, like the amount of money you will have to use for gas and how many other people will be depending on you for rides? Or are you merely going to listen to the car dealer laud the benefits of the vehicle?

If UMass wants to engage in more "realist" education within the public forum, then next summer for orientation they should not merely show how to use condoms. They should also carefully explain the proper ways – the safe ways – to smoke a bong, since, by "realist" educational standards, it is inevitable that many students at UMass will smoke. How about revealing the best way to recover from a hangover?

Everybody knows the potential ramifications of irresponsible sexual activity. The point is that publicly explaining how to avoid irresponsible sex removes the private responsibility from the individuals engaging in such an activity.

Failures and tragedy in Iraq

"[W]e had prisoners that were stacked in pyramids … We had prisoners that were forced to do extremely stressful exercises for at least two hours at a time … There was a case where a prisoner had cold water dumped on him and then he was left outside in the night … There was a case where a soldier took a baseball bat and struck a detainee on the leg hard."

Andrew Freeman

These statements by Capt. Ian Fishback of the 82nd Airborne describe abuse of Iraqi prisoners by American soldiers in Iraq. These incidents occurred between Sept. 2003 and April 2004 at Camp Mercury outside of the city of Falluja. The captain had spent around 17 months trying to get his superiors in the army to confront the issue, but most of them believed the abuse was within acceptable behavior, or that he should keep quiet about it for the sake of the unit's honor. Then he informed two senators of the abuse, as well as Human Rights Watch, which compiled a report based on his testimony and that of two sergeants. Only with the threat of political and media exposure did the army open an investigation.

I believed that the president would take the task of war seriously, that it earnestly wanted to succeed. But as has been clear over the last five years, the administration does not care about Iraq, and it does not care about America

To me, this story represents everything that has gone wrong in Iraq. As someone who originally supported the war, I feel aghast at how badly it has turned out. The country is extremely unstable, with rampant crime and frequent acts of terrorism, and sectarian and ethnic divisions threaten to engulf the nation in civil war. Reconstruction is a cruel joke – the Washington Post reported on July 4, 2004 that only $366 million had been spent of the $18.4 billion Congress appropriated to rebuild Iraq. The nascent Iraqi army is almost entirely dependent on our support, with only three of the 81 divisions able to operate independently as of May 18, 2005, according to the Washington Post. Add to these problems the torture of Iraqi detainees, which ruins our image in the eyes of ordinary Iraqis, and victory seems unachievable.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. Three years ago, when Bush began proclaiming the need for an invasion of Iraq, I argued in favor of it. My justification was that America's power should be used to improve the world, and sometimes the only way that can be accomplished is through the use of force. I believe that dictators like Saddam Hussein, guilty of genocide among many other crimes, should be removed. I thought that this administration had the skill to handle that and the process of building a better Iraq. But I was wrong.

I was wrong to believe that war – the most dangerous political decision – could be carried out effectively by the Bush administration. The signs were there – ever larger tax cuts, a hands-off occupation of Afghanistan, rampant dishonesty – but I failed to put the pieces together. I believed that the president would take the task of war seriously, that it earnestly wanted to succeed. But as has been clear over the last five years, the administration does not care about Iraq, and it does not care about America.

Bush lives in a bubble; a world of fantasy. When Hurricane Katrina struck, his aides struggled to direct his attention to the crisis, ultimately having to compile a DVD of TV footage just so that he would watch the suffering unfolding in Louisiana. Ron Suskind was derided as part of the "reality-based community" by a Bush aide. While members of this community looked on, the aide purportedly said, historical actors like Bush would change the world. But Bush is too secure in his bubble of faith to see the crises that have spun out of these changes.

It is clear that I should not have trusted Bush on Iraq. However, I am still torn about the best approach to the current situation. If we withdraw, there is the possibility of greater violence, as Sunni extremists now assaulting our troops would turn their guns on the Shiites and Kurds that dominate the provisional government. Our soldiers would be safe, but Iraq could be devastated by civil war.

On the other hand, our presence in Iraq undermines the legitimacy of the current government, since it may be perceived as a pawn of the American occupiers. Our failures to restore order, electricity and employment and the crimes of our troops, from Abu Ghraib to Camp Mercury, limit our credibility in Iraq. I believe we are approaching the point where our occupation will be more detrimental to Iraq than positive. The war in Iraq has become a tragedy for everyone for the sufferings visited upon its citizens, for the loss of life, for the inhumanity it has unlocked in our soldiers. I want this tragedy to end, but I don't know how it can.

Take the roads less viewed

Imagine seats made of foliage and decorated with floral blooms, hammocks strung together between trees, made of vines and stuffed generously with feathers donated by local fauna. Picture pure, unadulterated streams running nearby on their way down from a rocky peak where there is only crisp air to breathe. Wildlife prances about: squirrels make friends with their predators, just like in a Disney cartoon.

Noor Hashem

Now, in your mind's eye, complete this image of veritable Eden or utopia with equally picturesque inhabitants.

These people don't have world wars or animal cruelty. The depletion and pollution of the world's natural resources is no concern; as it turns out, all their machinery runs on peace, love, dreams and fairy dust. All the inhabitants are hard workers in the market system, ensuring that everyone lives prosperously but also in relation to success they garner for themselves.

Now look up from the paper and look around.

Whether unfortunately or not, we are not in this primitive utopia I have described. Instead, reality dictates our world.

In our reality, issues are a complex amalgamate of social elements. People prioritize different elements of an issue when forming their opinions. They take into consideration practical, ethical or financially centered contexts of the issue.

It seems, after a while, that readers are left to sort out a chaos of opinions, each idea stating individual preferences with declining levels of significance beyond the writer.

Consequently, written work seems to have polarized into two rather distinct camps: the mainstream, reliable material on one hand, and the unconventional, shady material on the other.

And much like the way you can find out how good a kisser you are in fashion magazine quizzes, an individual is defined by which camp he prefers reading.

The point in diversity is not agreeing with every viewpoint, but gaining a diverse knowledge of opinions. The key then is to strengthen your own ideas by reconsidering - and sometimes revising - what you had previously thought. Review, strengthen, repeat.

What's worse? Words such as "liberal," "moderate" and "conservative" have been tagged to these camps, as if validity and reliability were somehow governed by the opinion itself.

Free your mind. I say this not as a hippie, which is the first association you might make with such a statement. I say it as a complex interaction of liberal, moderate and conservative to the complex mix of readers.

In order to strive toward some semblance of higher wisdom, we must all consider the different standpoints that exist. It is most often the atypical columns that spark the best conclusions, whether or not the final conclusion a reader comes to agrees with the catalyzing column.

The point in diversity is not agreeing with every viewpoint, but gaining a diverse knowledge of opinions. The key then is to strengthen your own ideas by reconsidering – and sometimes revising – what you had previously thought. Review, strengthen, repeat.

In that spirit, it is imperative for our philosophical growth that all well argued and substantiated views be heard, no matter how off the beaten path or unpopular they seem to be.

Of course, this is not easy to manage. Such cases bring the matter of taste to the forefront of our quest for diverse opinions. In this regard, we must take our humor serious sly: a good opinion is like a good joke. There is a sticky line that divides the risqué from the vulgar. It is a line that must be carefully heeded.

In the end, these reads will most likely not lead to utopia. But at least they will make us better acquainted, involved and knowledgeable in our lovely dystopia.

My relationship with Amherst

"So this is Amherst, Massachusetts." I remember thinking when I toured UMass in high school. Being from Philadelphia, not only had I never heard of Amherst, but before submitting an application to the University, I didn't know there was more to Massachusetts besides Boston. We won't mention how today my grandmother still asks me how life is going in Boston when I return from school for a visit, even after numerous explanations that I live across the state from the capitol.

Mike Anmuth

After seeing Amherst once, deciding against it, and seeing it twice during my nationwide college tour (hereafter known as, "How I spent my summer vacation," or, more appropriately, "How I spent my junior year of college,") I ended up here for various reasons, in a new location which was totally, completely different from life growing up in a city. This, I decided, was going to be a brand new adventure where convenience was not quite a way of life, but rather something that I had taken for granted for many years before arriving.

What a fine place, I thought. Nothing has that new experience feeling like driving past farms and cow pastures after getting out of class, or seeing sheep while driving down Route 116. This was the first time I lived even relatively near livestock, and despite the fact that I didn't technically live anywhere near a farm, I still enjoyed dazzling my friends from home with stories about how you could actually see the stars in the night sky. Perhaps I had been missing something surrounded by lampposts and stoplights, convenience stores and everything rather close by; this was certainly different but it seemed like it would be rather enjoyable.

Now, I give you this heartwarming story because this is the kind of tale that I usually hear from people who, like me, were born and raised in cities or suburbs and end up in Amherst to go to college. This doesn't preclude Five College students, either, who live in similar situations, whether it be in Northampton, the rest of Amherst or South Hadley. As city and suburban kids, we get to our college towns and it's like culture shock. We have to adapt, or else we go crazy from boredom, as stories about being able to see stars only impress people for about three seconds.

As city and suburban kids, we get to our college towns and it's like culture shock. We have to adapt, else we go crazy from boredom, as stories about being able to see stars only impress people for about three seconds.

A fellow columnist last week wrote about how when students are limited in their activities, it drives them to drink. One could see this argument, especially if they live on campus, go to classes on this campus, party on campus and never leave campus for anything. When one gets used to country life, as I call it, they must find things to do in the framework of their town of residence. I won't bore you with the many things to do on campus, uptown or within the structure of the Five Colleges, but there are a lot of things to do, so check them out if you're disenchanted with spending another night looking out over the cornfields.

When I ended up here as a transfer student, ripe from traveling around the country and touring cities, I looked around and figured that I would need to do a lot of wandering around the area in order to find the sorts of amenities that I was used to having at home, like a large mall. But, as days and weeks wore on, I got used to Amherst, visited some local businesses, and found that I was getting quite used to the fact that I was living near livestock. The surreal feeling that I had to drive through a university every time I wanted to go somewhere started to fade, and the area and I became much better friends.

Maybe Amherst isn't your cup of tea and you're going to leave here as soon as you graduate, moving on to metropolises where you don't have to drive or bus everywhere. Maybe you really love it here and will become a permanent resident, even after you get your piece of parchment. I cannot say what my relationship to Amherst will be after I graduate, but after this much getting used to one another, I think I'll probably stay around here for a couple more years. Livestock and all.

RECKLESS RIGHT WITH-HOLDING FUNDS

If you're one of the many graduate students who did not receive funding from the cash-strapped University System of Massachusetts, you're life may be considerably more difficult in the next year, as the Radical Right in Congress prepares to eliminate subsidized federal loans to graduate students.

The same government responsible for the biggest budget in history has decided, now that it has reached the highest deficit in that million dollar traffic lights, bridges to nowhere and obscene military spending on a failed war is setting its sights on those of us who dare try and further our education at a time when global economy has decided that a Bachelor's Degree isn't enough to satisfy its demand for specialized labor. Nevermind that we are by-and-large financing our "public" educations at a considerable personal expense. A study by the American Council on Education notes that students graduating from an MA program carry an average debt of $36,000. For PhD students, that number climbs to a staggering $45,000.

Perhaps we shouldn't be surprised. The Right has longed railed against the evils of liberal academia, railing against the PhD ivory tower types that corrupt their good, conservative youth. Still you'd figure there would be some thoughtful GOP member who recognizes the value of public education. Then again, when you have all your kids nestled in private schools far away from the common folk, public education probably seems like a needless commodity.

What can we do to ensure that those of us attending graduate study will be here next year? First, contact your Representative and Senators. Tell them that there are better ways to save money than denying people access to public higher education. Then join with the numerous progressive groups on campus who are putting pressure on the state to up its obligation to higher education. Don't let the reckless Right destroy our future.

MAKE YOUR VOTE COUNT

The news article on Sept. 27 about Take Back UMass ("SGA election brings about new platform.") did an excellent job discussing the ideological platform of Take Back UMass. It should be important to every student that our tuition costs are frozen, our student organizations are respected and our Student Government Association funds are distributed according to the desires of UMass students.

Unfortunately, what the article failed to address were the criticisms of the Take Back UMass movement, criticisms that are worth considering if the SGA wants to do what is best for the campus.

First, the current system awards SGA funding to the loudest student groups on campus, not those that necessarily best serve overall student interests. If we want to see an honest, fair and reasonable distribution of student money on campus, we need to remove the influence of special interest groups from the SGA. The only voice that should echo in the SGA meetings is the voice of the entire student body, not only those with the political skill to negotiate the Senate's favor.

Second, the SGA must be honest in its dealings with the administration. Unlike what the boycott of classes organized by Take Back UMass and the Graduate Student Union did last year, the SGA needs to engage the administration in trying to serve the student body. It is clear that Gargano's "Students First" initiative has failed to do what it has promised, perhaps with cooperation between the administration and the SGA. "Students First" can become the slogan of the entire university.

Finally, the SGA needs to stop in-fighting over petty issues. Everyone has the best interests of the student body in mind and open honest debate is the best way to do what is right for our campus. Intimidation, misrepresentation and soundbite phrases to cloud the real issues are not just unethical, but it is unfair to the students that the SGA is meant to represent.

Take Back UMass has honest goals and ambitions, but it is by no means a perfect approach to a complicated problem. Only with open discussion, honesty and accountability will we be able to improve campus life for students. I urge all students to vote on Wednesday, but vote consciously. Remember the name that you check on the ballot. Demand that they represent your interests. Only then will the fight to "Take Back UMass" really be successful.

TIM BURTON MARRIES LIVING AND DEAD IN 'CORPSE BRIDE'

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Tim Burton never ceases to amaze me in finding beauty in the darkest and gravest of atmospheres. True, set design is his specialty and he has always taken a liking to subjects of a gothic nature, but such qualities have brought him fascinating failures along with his spellbinding successes.

"Corpse Bride" is his newest attempt at gorgeous set design and dark humor. Its stop-action animation with the appearance of clay-like figures as characters will have all Burton fans watching critically with meticulous comparisons to Burton's "The Nightmare Before Christmas." Those are very big shoes to fill, but alas, "Corpse Bride" triumphs and emerges as its equal.

Bear in mind, as much alike as they seem, "Nightmare" is vastly different from "Corpse Bride." "The Nightmare Before Christmas" gave us a world illuminated with ghoulish colors and Halloween designs. As dark as it was, that was a world full of eerie colors. "Corpse Bride" is so very gray and dark. The only light that shines comes from the moon to light the dilapidated trees and dark forests, the daunting buildings and the solemn faces. The greens, yellows and blues make their appearance only in the land of the dead, as if some grand escape from the prison above.

To look past the set design into the story, usually Burton's weakest aspect, one wouldn't expect to find more than diabolical humor about murder, ghosts and the horrors of the night. To my great surprise, I found a heartfelt story about loveable characters that inspire our deepest sympathies, even the dead ones.

Victor (Johnny Depp), a son of a wealthy fish merchant, is shy and nervous most of the time. On this particular day he is in a state of panic as he is having an arranged marriage to the daughter of town royalty, Victoria (Emily Watson). Victoria, also scared and delicate, wonders what could come of marriage if two people that never met marry to find they don't like one another. In a very nice scene where Victoria follows the lovely sounds of Victor playing the piano, they meet only to discover not just themselves, but love at first sight. Victor, still stumbling and nervous, bumps into tables, mispronounces his vows and drops the ring. He is careless and it seems hopeless when it comes to delivering these vows properly. He goes out into the woods to rehearse for the big day, pronounces them perfectly and places the ring on a stick protruding from the snow.

Little does he know, the stick is the finger of a corpse bride buried below. She was murdered on her wedding night, only to swear everlasting love to the next man that came and vowed to be hers. She pulls him down to the land of the dead where they will live for eternity, married. Victor tries time and again to escape back to the world of the living. Unless he does so soon, Victoria's parents will give up the search and marry her off to Lord Barkus (Richard E. Grant) an arrogant little wretch who plans to murder Victoria and steal her fortune on the night of their honeymoon.

"Tim Burton's Corpse Bride"
Directed by Tim Burton
Starring Johnny Depp, Helena Bonham Carter, Emily Watson
Warner Brothers
Rated PG
76 mins.
Grade A

Here is where the dilemma arrives. Though we would love to see Victor return to Victoria, the corpse bride, who calls herself Emily (the fabulous Helena Bonham Carter) also proves to be a warm and loving character. She is not only a perfect romantic interest for Victor, but she desires true love as much as Victoria. All the more tragic is that she was promised true love long ago and was deprived of her dream of marriage when she was callously murdered and left in the forest, and so it is not easy to abandon the corpse bride and return to the living, even for Victor.

The characters at the sides of the film such as the butler, the parents and the coach driver are hilariously eccentric. The world of the dead also sport some gloriously funny corpses, most notably the dancing and singing skeletons who perform the kind of odd musical numbers that had me perplexed at "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory." Here they work nicely; they lit the bizarre moods and they're also kind of catchy. One sequence where the land of the dead merges with the land of the living produces some of the funniest moments I've seen at the movies this year.

As for the actors, Helena Bonham Carter gives the best performance, but Johnny Depp is very interesting to watch. Though the character is drawn to resemble Depp, his identity disappears nicely into the creation of Victor. Depp is not the kind of actor wh ose voice is notably his throughout the film. This is not an egotistical voiceover like something from Robin Williams or Eddie Murphy; there is no trace of Depp, only of Victor, which is kind of nice.

Tim Burton has succeeded here with something he lacked in many movies, but most particularly in "The Nightmare Before Christmas," and that is an affectionate love story, sincere characters and, most precisely, kindness. His visuals are beautiful and the stop-action animation is exhilarating, but I appreciate the emotion above all else.

Born Chris Ward in Libertyville, Ill., the future star attended NYU Film School to study screenwriting and first fell in love with creating music in his free time. Working under the name MC Chris, Ward has made a reputation by lending his voice-acting and lyrical talents to a number of popular shows on Cartoon Network's Adult Swim, including "Space Ghost Coast to Coast," "The Brak Show," "Aqua Teen Hunger Force" and "Scalab 2021." In the years since his animated introduction, Chris's cult following has grown from a small but dedicated fan base downloading songs from his Web site to the legions of T.V. viewers that tuned in every week to hear his newest song. This success made it possible for the 30 year old to release his debut LP, "Knowing is Half the Hassle," in 2003 and the full-length "Eating's Not Cheating" in 2004. "Knowing is Half the Hassle" is available for free from Chris's Web site, mcchris.com.

MC Chris first made a splash online as the man behind the "Star Wars"-themed song "Let's Vette." Regardless of the newells value of having a song rapped from the perspective of the baddest bounty hunter in the galaxy, the track exhibits Chris's genuine talent and lyrical ability. After the song appeared during the credits of an episode of "Scalab 2021," Chris was launched into the stratosphere of dorky cult fame.

With occasional appearances as MC Pee Pants on "Aqua Teen Hunger Force" and a reoccurring role as Hesh on "Scalab," Chris displayed tremendous comedic skill in both song and voice-acting. Even after resigning from Cartoon Network and moving to the northeast in 2004 to pursue his music career, Chris's cartoon alter egos are still fan favorites.

This will be the first date of the MC Chris-helmed Revenge of the Nerds Tour. Tapped for the supporting slot of the tour is Chapel Hill, N.C.'s peculiarly named SNMNMNM. Long distance relationships sometimes are not meant to be

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

One of the girls who wrote to me last week told me this story: she met this amazing, super-hot guy over the summer and spent an even more amazing few months with him. Then she came back to UMass. With the feelings still strong, she wanted to know whether she should fight for the guy ... a guy who isn't sure if a relationship is a great idea now that they can't see each other all the time.

This girl is clearly wondering what we all wonder at some point: how do we know when to hold on and fight for what we want the most, and when to call it quits? I always believe that people should go after what they want, but as W. C. Fields said, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again. Then quit. No use being a damn fool about it." Never pursue something if your effort and energy aren't paying off.

The question of when to hold on and when to let go, specifically when it comes to distance, requires consideration of one of the largest fundamental differences between guys and girls when it comes to how we think about relationships. Girls are usually ruled by their hearts or emotions and guys are usually ruled by their heads or what's logical. Incidentally, this is why you always hear guys complaining about girls being too emotional and girls complaining about guys being insensitive.

When it comes to distance, most likely a guy will not see how it makes sense to stay together. He's thinking, "We can't see each other that often and there are other girls out there. Why be committed to someone who you can't see whenever you want?" She's thinking, "But what we have is so amazing! We should try to make it work. If it doesn't work, then we'll break up." But if girls thought about it logically, they too would realize that it wasn't meant to be, then chances are that person believes in fate or destiny to some extent. But if "it" wasn't meant to be, then why would everything to do with "it" have happened up until that point? Bam — there's a giant hole in that theory.

I'm not saying all guys will say no to distance. There are plenty of guys, as well as girls, who are in relationships with people at other schools. Not everyone cheats, and if you've found something and someone truly valuable there's no point in letting go of it, because you'll probably be thinking about or calling that person at 2 a.m. for a while to come, and eventually that person will have moved on, and you'll be miserable.

Many times people are in this situation or any situation where it looks like things aren't going to work out, and your genius friends respond with the infinite wisdom of the phrase, "It wasn't meant to be." I always think it's slightly funny when people say that, because people always say it as if that explains everything, and now, thanks to the sudden wisdom hearing "it's not meant to be" is supposed to impart, you can stop worrying. Hallelujah!

Think about it. If someone says

I don't think anything is ever "just not meant to be," unless your last names happen to be Capulet or Montague and you wander around saying things like, "Wherefore art thou Romeo?" There is always some logical aspect of why things don't work out. Even in "Romeo and Juliet," it was because people lied, went against their families and did things in secret.

A much more soothing phrase is, "it's just not meant to be right now." Nobody can predict the future, (feel free to complain if you personally know Miss Cleo and can prove otherwise;) and there are countless stories of people getting back together a year or two later. And you can bet that during the initial breakup, someone was telling the heartbroken "it wasn't meant to be." Guess what? That person was wrong, because perhaps it was (or is) meant to be, but maybe not at that (or this) time in your and your loved one's lives.

To wrap this up, I wrote back to the girl basically saying that due to guy's logic, she should be aware that there's a possibility of it not working out right now, but that she should go for it if she wants to. If you don't do what your heart wants, you're never truly happy. The worst thing to wonder is "what if?" Go for the guy or girl you want and if it doesn't work out, at least you've tried. You'll bounce back eventually, and as they say in "Meet Joe Black," "If you haven't tried, you haven't lived."

Oh, and don't blame your friends for saying, "It wasn't meant to be." They love you and probably don't really have a clue what to say.

The Kings are a hybrid of sounds, which can be heard on their new record. On "Aha Shake Heartbreak," the band sounds menacing at times, yet quiet and somber on other tracks. The guitar distortion is crisp, with biting riffs similar to those of AC/DC axe-man Angus Young. "Pistol of Fire" is such an example; the song has a heavy groove to it accompanied by a funky bass line and crashing drum set. "Day Old Blues" features a simple acoustic melody with a chorus full of spirited yodeling. Lead singer/guitarist Caleb Followill's raspy voice goes from sounding bothered to unconcerned on these pieces. It is similar to Chris Robinson of the Black Crowes. This band borrows some of its sound from Neil Young, as well.

A quartet made up of three brothers and a cousin, the Kings origins lie in Tennessee, where their religious upbringing led to their breaking out with rock music. Caleb, Nathan and Jared Folowill grew up in the midst of their parents having troubles. Their father, Leon; was a Pentecostal minister who brought them to many church events. The siblings were told they could only listen to Gospel music, and it was not until later in high school that these aspiring musicians would get a taste of rock acts such as Led Zeppelin, The Velvet Underground and Pixies.

Devin Davis plays 'Lonely' songs at 'Thursday Night Edge'

By Kevin Jusker
Collegian Correspondent

Devin Davis just may be one of the best acts you've never heard. Guitar in hand and harmonica around his neck, Davis took the Great Room stage at Mt. Holyoke College's Blanchard Campus Center last Thursday night. Davis performed as part of the college's "Thursday Night Edge" program, which brings the spotlight to local or rising acts for exposure to college rock listeners. A crowd of a few dozen came to the show, which featured local singer/songwriter Ad Frank opening.

A Chicago rocker, Davis flew out to the east coast to play a solo set of songs from his new debut album, "Lonely People of the World, Unite!" The album is a concept album of sorts, with each track offering a sketch of various lonely characters, ranging from a bird with a broken wing to a paratrooper with amnesia. Davis' studio work, which was almost entirely self-recorded, has drawn strong comparisons to the power-pop greats of the '60s and '70s like the Kinks, the Who and David Bowie, but his live show feels a bit like Neutral Milk Hotel playing along with Pink Floyd.

Normally, one might expect a solo acoustic show to have a stripped down feel, but Davis maintained all the energy and musicality of the album versions on his own. Incorporating some new gadgets into his solo show, Davis brought along various loop pedals, samplers and a Theremin. Without as much instrumentation, the show had an entirely different feel from the album cuts, but the differences made the show a completely different experience.

Beginning with the straight-forward rendition of the no-holds guitar jam "When I Turn Ninety-Nine," Davis gradually progressed into using more and more of the technology at his disposal, making complicated arrangements out of limited instrumentation. Without the horns and saxophones from his studio cuts, Davis used various harmonicas to replicate the desired effect. Moving into the power ballad "Sandie," Davis looped a few rhythm guitar parts, eventually soloing over his loops, almost like Howie Day might do it. After a few more tracks and covers of Neil Young and the Talking Heads, Davis went into the epic and complex "Transcendental Sports Anthem," where he looped guitar, harmonica and vocals, and cued various samples throughout the song, creating a mind-bending experience. He wrapped up the hour-long set with the acoustic ballad "Deserted Eyeland," reminding us that in different ways, "we all live on a deserted island," a fitting end to summarize his lonely sketches.

After the show, Davis hung around to speak to some fans. He mentioned that although he does enjoy playing solo, he much prefers to have his backup band playing along with him. The band was unable to make the trek out after a week of shows all over from New York City to Seattle. However, this was Davis' only date up in the Northeast. Being less known in New England, he said it was very difficult for the band to find bookings. Davis hopes to book as many tour dates as he can, and perhaps off in the future sit down to make album number two.

Davis' entertaining yet also meaningful lyrics make every song a winner, which, on top of catchy guitar riffs and melody lines, translated into an amazing live show. Once he gets enough exposure, Devin Davis will certainly be an artist to watch out for.

Singer/songwriter Devin Davis uses effects to put on a full sounding show even when his band is not able to make the performance.

Leon traveled all over the South, visiting other churches and bringing along the boys. At these meetings, the Followill youths would be encouraged to take up the drums and made some noise. In 1997, their lives changed dramatically with the divorce of their mother and father. After this, the brothers moved all over, taking up odd-jobs such as house-painting in Oklahoma. The desire soon came to put together a rock group after the boys arrived in Nashville and began writing and making music. Doing this, they asked their cousin, Matthew Followill, to join them on drums; while Nathan and Jared played bass and guitar.

One night in the city, the Followills came across a friend of theirs, a singer named Terry Bover who asked them to jam at his house. Bover, amazed by what he heard assisted with getting them a manager. The Kings joined with RCA and recorded an EP in 2002, "Youth and Young Manhood," their first album, came out a year later, featuring the hit single "Molly's Chambers."

In the U.K., this band has a greater following; for example, when "Aha Shake Heartbreak" was released, it placed number three on the British charts. However, Kings may get more worldwide attention now due to their tour with U2.

Los Angeles-based indie rock openers The Like released their album "Are You Thinking What I'm Thinking?" earlier this month.

Expect to see the Kings cover most of the material off of their new album, particularly songs like "The Bucket," "King of the Rodeo" and "Slow Night, So Long." It should be a loud and quiet night, filled with the craziness of this unpredictable rock act.

Kings of Leon will also be playing this Friday at the Hampton Casino Ballroom on Hampton Beach in N.H. at 8 p.m.

'Geisha' uses comedy to address stereotypes

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Correspondent

"The Geisha Next Door," written and performed by up and coming writer/actress Miki Yamashita, premiered Sept. 23 and 24 at 8 p.m. in the Rooke Theater at Mount Holyoke College. The one-woman show, originally directed by musical theater artist Mira Kingsley, features a magnetic array of delightful personas and creative dialogue, all displayed through Yamashita's comedic impersonations.

Yamashita's unique comedy act focuses on the traditional American stereotype of Japanese artists in society and draws on their assumed characteristics that the entertainment industry believes should exist — what Yamashita refers to as "Stereotype-Casting."

As though her tightly wrapped ornamented hair, cherry glazed lips and emerald paper fan don't depict enough her point about the sex-goddess way of the East, Yamashita emphasizes her depiction of the typical "Geisha" by reading to the audience from a dictionary: "'Geisha: A Japanese girl or woman who is trained to sing, dance and talk amusingly,' well that sounds an awful lot like me!"

After being trained in the art of these trades at the New England Conservatory of Music, Yamashita parallels her own experiences working as an actress in New York and musical theater to qualities of the Asian "Geisha." She manages to cast a stark reality upon the difficulties of overcoming this image in a show business that is relentless about exploiting it.

Yamashita describes her experience while working for a year with the Walt Disney Company and mimics the quirky characters she encountered along the way. Mickey Mouse seemed to be a personal favorite of the audiences when Yamashita, in her Geisha goddess ensemble and all, bubbled up her face and raised her voice to the classic Mickey pitch while impersonating her former boss at Disney Theme parks — Mickey himself. These animated performances do her sarcasm and perky humor justice by making a point about the constraints of stereotypes in show business.

The show features an array of Yamashita's vocal talent as she busts out the chorus of a '90s pop hit by Whitney Houston, her childhood vocal inspiration. Skits from her vocal training at the Conservatory feature lovely pieces of classical singing, as well, that go to show Yamashita's talent deserves the recognition of a New York Times review that praised her "beautiful voice and an effortless delivery."

With a running time of about an hour and fifteen minutes, the show has a rather modest set display, but fantastic improvisations with costumes and a few props. The subtle and infrequent lighting changes and the scarcity of set design work to emphasize Yamashita's one-woman act. Her eccentric expressions and dramatic motions are the unique essence of the production, and make it easy to describe "The Geisha Next Door" as something in between a stand-up comedy show and a spunky "Vagina Monologue" with flare.

The show has not played at Mount Holyoke before, but with the local buzz about it on campus, the show received a large turnout of students, faculty and community members.

Yamashita grew up in South Hadley, Mass., but maintains dual citizenship in the United States and Japan. She studied drama at Yale, produced for television at NYU and currently is a Perkins scholar at Mount Holyoke College, where she is majoring in English. She expects to graduate in spring 2006.

Yamashita most recently starred as herself in a comedy pilot show for the Oxygen Network. Some other principle roles on television include "Law and Order," "As the World Turns" and "One Life to Live." Her theater roles include Connie on the national tour of "Chorus Line," Maria in "West Side Story" and Tuptiin in "The King and I."

Vinny gets the call

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — The desperate New York Jets brought back 41-year-old Vinny Testaverde on Tuesday after starting quarterback Chad Pennington and his backup Jay Fiedler were lost for the season with shoulder injuries.

In turning to Testaverde, who played for the Jets from 1998-2003, the team hopes he can back up untested third-stringer Brooks Bollinger, who is scheduled to start Sunday against the Baltimore Ravens.

"I'm excited, happy, nervous, anxious, all those feelings about playing for the Jets again," Testaverde said. "If I didn't have high expectations, I wouldn't come back here."

Pennington and Fiedler were on the same flight to Alabama on Tuesday to see Dr. James Andrews, the noted orthopedist who repaired Pennington's rotator cuff in February.

"I don't anticipate either of them being back this year," coach Herman Edwards said.

Pennington re-injured his right shoulder in the third quarter of Sunday's 26-20 overtime loss to Jacksonville. Fiedler replaced Pennington, then went down early in the fourth period.

Edwards emphasized that Pennington's tear, revealed in an MRI exam Monday, damaged a different portion of his shoulder this time.

"It's tough. I anticipate he will be out for the season," Edwards said. "I've never been in the situation where you lose the No. 1 and 2 quarterbacks in a span of seven plays."

Edwards feels particularly bad for Pennington because of what the quarterback went through earlier this year after playing injured for much of 2004.

"It is harder for me because we know all the work he has put into it," Edwards said. "The doctors had him on a schedule that got him back this season. What do you say to a guy about that?

"He'll do what he has to do to come back. But it is tough. He's a little down."

Testaverde led the Jets to the 1998 AFC title game and was the starter before Pennington replaced him in 2002. He was with Dallas last year, but was not with any NFL team in 2005 - until he called Edwards on Monday, worked out Tuesday and was signed for the rest of the season.

"Vinny's a guy who has been here," Edwards said. "He's a good fit for us as far as he is in his comfort zone here, he knows me, we had a great relationship. He can throw the ball. He can get up at 3 in the morning and still throw an out (pattern) as well as anybody."

The Jets expected to sign a third quarterback later Tuesday. After the Jacksonville game, Pennington said the pain was similar to last season, when he initially hurt his shoulder.

"It's frustrating and demoralizing," Pennington said. "I worked really hard to get back to playing, putting in all the extra hours in over time, and trying to come back to be out there on the field. When something like that happens, it really tests you. It tests your willpower, your mind and your confidence."

Pennington's future might be in jeopardy after his career got off to such a promising start.

In 2002, Pennington replaced the ineffective Testaverde following a 1-3 start and led the Jets to the playoffs. Pennington led the NFL with a 104.2 passer rating and was on the fast track to revitalize a snakebitten franchise.

Then the injuries started. In 2003, he broke his wrist in the preseason and missed the first six regular-season games.

Nonetheless, the Jets gave him a $64 million contract before last season started, banking their future on him.

He hurt his shoulder in November, missed three games, but returned to lead the Jets back into the playoffs. Pennington played with the rotator cuff torn, and the team revealed the extent of the injury once the season ended.

The Jets put Pennington on a fast track to be ready for the 2005 opener, even though he would be seven months removed from surgery and a stranger to the offense being installed by new coordinator Mike Heimerdinger.

Pennington looked shaky in all three games. He fumbled six times against Kansas City, and struggled mightily against Miami and Jacksonville. His balls floated, and many lacked velocity. In three games, the Jets scored 37 points on offense and Pennington was 49-of-83 for 530 yards with two touchdowns and three interceptions.

Edwards said the team doesn't second-guess starting the season with Pennington.

"We followed what the doctors told us to do and that is what coaches do," Edwards said Tuesday. "I was answering that question in the spring, and in the summer it got to be why Chad was not throwing the ball? Because the doctors said he should not.

"We did it correctly, by the numbers."

Edwards also had no regrets about allowing Pennington to go back into the game when Fiedler was hurt.

"No, not at all," he said. "He threw the ball 11 times, the two longest passes were 10 yards." Fiedler was acquired this season to give Pennington an experienced backup. Fiedler took all the snaps during offseason training activities and he shared much of the preseason work. That won't do much good now.

Stocco his own worst critic

By Jeff Potrykus
Knight Ridder

MADISON, Wis. — The sometimes intrusive but always revealing TV camera found John Stocco seated on the Wisconsin bench in the final seconds of the Badgers' victory over Michigan on Saturday.

Stocco, who seconds earlier had scored the most important touchdown since he started wearing shoulder pads, turned toward the camera, peered out from behind the facemask for no more than a second and then turned his attention back toward the field, seemingly oblivious to the nation's eyes staring over his right shoulder.

Why the blasé response?

"I think I was just disappointed in myself," Stocco explained this week. "Because I felt like I could have played much better. It was a great feeling but it was more of a relief because I should have played a lot better."

Stocco's raw numbers in the 23-20 victory over Michigan didn't match some of his better individual efforts.

Awed by the buzz inside the stadium, Stocco got off to a slow start and completed just three of his first eight attempts for 22 yards. He finally found a rhythm in the second quarter and finished 15 for 32 (46.9 percent) for 147 yards with an interception and three sacks.

His lone interception cost Wisconsin an opportunity to pad a 16-13 lead, yet two series later Stocco followed his blockers up the middle for the winning touchdown, a 4-yard run on a draw to cap a 52-yard drive.

"I thought he managed the game well," coach Barry Alvarez said. "And bottom line: He won the game. . . . That is a pretty good defense. Not a pretty good defense, that's a very good defense. They don't give you anything easy. You have to earn everything you get.

"John did what he had to do to win. . . . He got the ball where it needed to be and got it in the end zone. We got more than they did and that's all that counts."

You might be surprised to learn that Stocco's passing numbers are more robust through four games this season than they were at the same point in 2004. Here is a look at those numbers:

He has completed 58.3 percent of his passes, compared with 48.4 percent last season.

He has passed for 581 yards, a slight increase of 20 yards overall.

He has completed passes to six receivers, down from his mark of 11 receivers last season.

The reasons for the drop in the third category are twofold.

Brian Calhoun has given UW an effective receiving option coming out of the backfield and is tied for the team lead in catches with 13. Tight end Owen Daniels has 11 catches, six more than at this juncture last season.

He is averaging 11.9 yards per completion and 6.9 yards per attempt. Through four games last season, those numbers were 12.1 yards per completion but only 5.9 yards per attempt.

Stocco thinks he is capable of much more and his frustration level is beginning to rise.

"I feel more comfortable and I think at times I've been playing better," he said. "But the thing that is really frustrating for me is that I know how good I can be. And at times I've showed flashes of that."

One stretch came during Wisconsin's final offensive possession of the first half, which ended with a 35-yard field goal by Taylor Mehlhaff.

Stocco threw an incomplete pass on the second play of the drive but then hit Jonathan Orr for 12 yards, Calhoun for 8, Daniels for 15 and Brandon White for 18 to move the ball to the Michigan 17.

"Every throw I made was right on," he said. "Every read was right on."

The next three throws were incomplete, however, and the drive stalled.

During the broadcast, ESPN analyst Mike Gottfried noted that Stocco's footwork continued to be inconsistent.

Wisconsin quarterback John Stocco celebrates following his fourth quarter, gamewinning touchdown against Michigan on Saturday.

after practice yesterday. "We had a tendency against Harvard to have too many passes, too many touches in our defensive half. We need to get it down to three passes and then shoot and score."

Dating back to their last win on Sept. 18 against Navy, UMass has been outscored 4-2. Their last goal occurred at the 61:22 mark in the game against Navy. That translates into a scoreless drought of 208:38.

"We need to get the ball in the attacking half to create chances," Koch said. "In a funny way it's not necessarily our offense as much as it is our defense getting the ball to the offense. That's what we've been working on [this week]."

Koch is looking to his standout players to come forward and turn the team's slow start around.

"Oral Bullen is coming off an injury so he needs to step it up a little bit," Koch said. "Matty Lemire has been working hard and I think it's just a matter of time before he snaps out of it."

After the game Wednesday UMass will travel out to Loudonville, N.Y. to take on Siena on Saturday.

Quite the catch

Although the team is sitting at the .500 mark with a season record of 2-2, the Towson Tigers have plenty to work with. On Saturday, in a 41-56 loss to Northeastern at Parsons Field, Towson wide receiver Andrae Brown put on a record-breaking show. Brown caught nine passes for 222 yards and five touchdowns, with three of those scores pulling the tigers out of a 41-7 hole in the third quarter. Brown, a junior, was named the A-10 offensive player of the week for his scoring frenzy, and his five TDs set a new Towson record. On the season, Brown now has 418 yards on 24 receptions and six trips to the end zone. He also is third overall in the A-10 in receiving yards per game with an average of 104.5.

Five alive

With only three games in the books, Maine's junior strong safety Daren Stone has made the best of his time. After snagging two interceptions in the Black Bear's close 26-21 loss against Richmond on Saturday Sept. 17, Stone upped his season total to a whopping five picks. The total was reached over a span of three contests, because Stone registered two INTs in Maine's 28-0 shutout of William Penn and one in the team's 25-7 loss against Nebraska on Sept. 3. Along with his A-10 high five INTs, Stone has also made nine total tackles and broke up one pass. A native of Lockport, N.Y., Stone now has nine career interceptions as a Black Bear.

cuited process," he said.

Fehr said the sides disagree "on what the first penalty should be and the first penalty range."

"We always thought there was a need for a review," he said. "You don't have a cookie-cutter approach. The better approach if you can is to gauge the individual facts and circumstances."

Fehr said that while Selig publicly called for 50-game suspensions for first offenders, management negotiators proposed it be a range of 50-60 games, giving players the right to ask an arbitrator to lower it to 40 games.

Rob Manfred, executive vice president of labor relations in the commissioner's office, did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

"Twenty games are not enough," baseball spokesman Rich Levin said. "Also, the union's proposal is not three strikes and you're out. It is three strikes and maybe you're out."

Baseball began testing for steroids in 2003, but players were not identified by name. Because more than 5 percent of tests were positive, penalties began in 2004 under rules that were scheduled to run through 2006. Players agreed in January to reopen the agreement, and agreed to suspensions for first-time offenders starting in 2005.

"I think it's great," Detroit's Brandon Inge said of the union's response. "I'm glad they're cleaning up the sport. I don't like it that anything can be tainted with an illegal substance. It's just going to make the playing field a little more level."

Fehr said that during recent negotiations with management, the union agreed to have:

–every player tested at the start of spring training and at least one additional time.

–the possibility that a first-time offender's suspension could rise up to 30 games if there were aggravating factors, or be lowered to as few as 10 games if an arbitrator finds mitigating circumstances.

–the penalty for a second positive steroid test increase from 30 days to 75 games, with the possibility an arbitrator could increase it to as many as 100 games or lower it to as few as 50 games.

–the commissioner impose "such discipline as you believe appropriate, including a permanent ban" for a third positive test "provided that it is consistent with just cause and subject to arbitral review."

–first-time offenders for amphetamine use receive treatment, with discipline starting with a second offense.

–much of the drug program's administration moved to a "jointly selected independent expert" from the current management-union joint committee.

–the provision calling for the program to be halted in the event of a government investigation be narrowed.

Some congressmen have criticized baseball for not adopting the standard of the World Anti-Doping Agency, which in most cases calls for two-year suspensions for first offenses and lifetime bans for second positives.

Last week, the president of Little League Baseball wrote to Selig and Fehr, urging them to adopt a tougher stance on steroids.

"We all must accept the fact that children are affected by the actions of major leaguers," Stephen Keener said in a letter dated Sept. 22. "In the vast majority of cases, professional athletes provide fine role models. But, as we have seen, a few highly publicized cases can cause the public to perceive a stain on the National Pastime."

UM looks to get rolling

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The wheels are quickly falling off the Massachusetts' men's soccer team's season.

With their 2-0 loss to Harvard on Sunday the Minutemen dropped their record to 3-5 and are currently in the midst of a two game losing streak.

Today the Minutemen try to turn around their recent misfortunes as they take on Boston University (2-4-1 0-0-1 America East) at Rudd Field at 3 p.m.

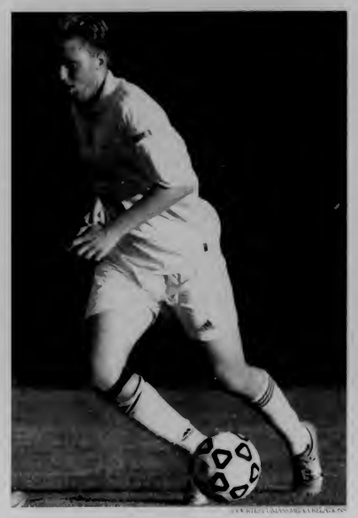
Harvard's shutout of the Minutemen was the third time this season and second time in a row that UMass has been unable to get one by the opposing goalie. On Sept. 13 they were blanked by Hartford 1-0 and on Sept. 21 they were shutout by New Hampshire by a 2-0 score.

On Sunday the Crimson tallied a goal in each half of play. They put the Minutemen in an early hole when Jeremy Tchou scored just 6:36 into the contest. The insurance goal was chipped in at the 76:14 mark of the second half. Harvard brothers Nicholas and Anthony Tornaritis teamed up to seal the win for the Crimson.

Despite their poor record the Terriers have been enjoying some recent success. Over the weekend they tied Maine 1-1 to open up their conference schedule and defeated Rhode Island 2-1 on Sept. 20th, the team in which UMass will open its conference schedule against on Oct. 9.

Playing a big role for the Terriers against the Black Bears was freshman Neil Hlavaty. The rookie scored the equalizing goal at the 26:00 mark of the first half.

Hlavaty was awarded America East Rookie of the Week honors for his success against both Maine and URI. To go along with his goal against Maine, Hlavaty recorded an assist on Sedrick Chin's game clinching goal against the Rams.



The freshman leads the Terriers with five points and two goals. He is also tied for the team lead with 10 shots. Hlavaty is also one of only two BU players to have started all seven games this season.

On the other side of the ball, the Maroon and White are in a drought that could prove very costly as the conference schedule quickly approaches.

The last two games the offense has been nonexistent for the Minutemen. Against UNH and Harvard they have been outscored by a total of 4-0. They were able to get 16 shots, none of which reached the back of the net.

"We're not putting the ball in the back of the net," UMass coach Sam Koch said

Wildcats are the top team

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

2005 has meant a lot around the Atlantic 10 conference. Whether it has been the top-ranked teams in the nation or record-breaking performances, the first three weeks of football have been more than most have asked for.

Sitting on top

Since redshirt sophomore quarterback took over the reins of the Wildcat offense in 2004, UNH has made a run for the top. On Monday, the team made it there when it was ranked as the No. 1 football team in all of I-AA by The Sports Network with 2,760 total votes. The honor came days following the team's 49-20 rout on Dartmouth, in which Santos and company racked up 547 yards of total offense and the Wildcat defense forced three turnovers and 9.5 sacks. UNH had crept up the rankings and was breathing down the neck of Western Kentucky last week at No. 2, but after I-A powerhouse Auburn took care of Western Kentucky on Saturday, beating them 37-14, the Wildcats jumped onto its pedestal. Santos, who is a Walter Payton Award Nominee for the second year in a row, has continued his prolific passing career, and has completed 79-of-112 passes for 1025 yards, seven touchdowns and four interceptions this season. His favorite target when on the field is junior wide receiver David Ball, another Payton Award nominee, who has grabbed 20 passes this season for a total of 353 yards and four touchdowns. Including the second half of the 2004 season, UNH has won nine of its last 10 games, with the only loss coming in the quarterfinals of the 2004 NCAA playoffs, when the Wildcats were clawed by Montana 47-17. Monday marked the first No. 1 ranking in the history of the school's program.

Running up the score

Leading the A-10 in rushing, all-purpose and scoring, sophomore tailback Omar Cuff has been the cornerstone of the Delaware offense this season. Cuff posted his career-best in rushing yards on Saturday after carrying the ball for 177 yards and three touchdowns during the Blue Hen's 35-23 beating of Holy Cross. In 2005, Cuff has registered 394 rushing yards on 67 carries, averaging 5.9 yards per carry and totaling seven touchdowns. Cuff has contributed on the receiving end as well, catching seven balls for 80 yards and three TDs. On Sept. 12, Cuff was named The Sports Network Offensive Player of the Week for his five-touchdown day in a 34-33 win over Lehigh on Sept. 10. As a team, Delaware is seeing much success as well, as it recently was ranked by The Sports Network as the No. 5 I-AA team in the nation by accumulating 2,401 total votes.

Wakefield pulls through

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Tim Wakefield pitched the Boston Red Sox back into a share of first place - and saved a little bit for next time, too.

The knuckleballer helped Boston pull into a tie for the AL East lead on Tuesday with a 3-1 victory over the Toronto Blue Jays in the opening game of a day-night doubleheader.

Then he left, still strong after seven innings, so he would be fresh for a crucial start on three days' rest against the New York Yankees.

"I probably could have finished the game, but I don't think that's a smart move," he said after holding the Blue Jays to one unearned run on three hits. "It's a pennant race. Every game is pretty much a must-win."

The Red Sox were tied with the Yankees heading into the nightcap of the split-admission doubleheader, a result of Monday's rainout. The Yankees were scheduled to play the plummeting Orioles, losers of nine straight, in Baltimore.

David Ortiz drove in two runs to give him a major league-leading 142 RBIs and help the defending World Series champions win for the fourth time in a row and their fifth in six tries.

The victory guaranteed that the AL East title will be up for grabs when New York comes to Fenway Park for a three-game, season-ending series this weekend.

Wakefield (16-11) was scheduled to pitch the regular-season finale on Sunday, but Monday's rainout pushed Curt Schilling back until Tuesday's nightcap, when he was to face Gustavo Chacin. The Red Sox decided that the knuckleballer was better equipped to come back on short rest than Schilling, who has struggled all season as he recovers from ankle surgery.

So out came Wakefield.

"You never want to look past anything," Boston manager Terry Francona said. "But it's a little bit of an extraordinary circumstance."

Boston, the Yankees and Cleveland were knotted up in the AL wild-card race with 92-64 records.

Wakefield allowed walked one and hit a batter while striking out six to win for the eighth time in 10 decisions. Jonathan Papelbon followed him in the eighth, using a mid-90s fastball and the late afternoon shadows to escape a first-and-third, one-out jam.

First baseman John Olerud raced into the Fenway shadows to run down Vernon Wells' popup, then Papelbon blew a fastball past former Red Sox infielder Shea Hillenbrand for strike three to end the inning.

"That's tough," designated hitter Frank Catalanotto said. "The toughest part was the shadows. We all came back saying we couldn't see the ball. It was tough picking it up. When you go from a slow knuckleball to a guy throwing 95 and you add in the shadow, it's tough."

Mike Timlin pitched the ninth for his 12th save in 19 chances and his 79th appearance of the season - one short of the franchise record.

David Bush (5-11) allowed three runs on six hits in six innings, striking out five and walking two. He ran into trouble in the first when Johnny Damon led off with a single and Edgar Renteria doubled him to third.

Ortiz grounded out to second to make it 1-0, then Manny Ramirez singled to score Renteria.

Frank Menechino singled in the fifth and took second on Ramirez's error in left field. The runner moved to third on Aaron Hill's fly ball and scored on Doug Mirabelli's passed ball.

Ortiz doubled to score Renteria in the fifth and make it 3-1.

NOTES: The Red Sox face three consecutive left-handed starters, starting with Chacin. Lefty starters are 5-10 with a 6.59 ERA at Fenway this year. ... Because of Monday's rainout, Schilling will start the regular-season finale against Mike Mussina instead of Saturday's game against the Yankees. Wakefield will start on three days' rest on Saturday and face Randy Johnson, David Wells and Chien-Ming Wang will pitch Friday's series opener. ... Wakefield's previous two starts were no-decisions, including a nine-inning stint that Boston won on a walkoff hit-by-pitch in the 10th.

Tim Wakefield helped pull out a 3-1 win over the Toronto Blue Jays in the first half of yesterday's doubleheader. Wakefield pitched seven full innings and is now 16-11 on the season.

Harrison out for the season

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) - Patriots safety Rodney Harrison is determined to return from a season-ending knee injury and play for New England next year, his agent said Tuesday.

"If anybody can do it, Rodney Harrison can do it," Steve Feldman said. "He's optimistic. ... This is just another challenge."

The Patriots placed Harrison on injured reserve Tuesday and confirmed that he will miss the remainder of the season with a left knee injury.

Feldman said his client tore his anterior cruciate ligament, medial collateral ligament and posterior cruciate ligament in the first quarter of New England's 23-20 win over Pittsburgh on Sunday.

Harrison, 32, is expected to undergo surgery in four to six weeks, once the swelling in his knee subsides, Feldman said.

"After the surgery, we'll have a better idea (of his recovery period)," Feldman said.

Harrison has started every game since signing a free agent contract with New England in 2003 after being released by San Diego after nine years with the Chargers. He was injured when Pittsburgh wide receiver Cedrick Wilson hit his legs after being bumped by a New England player.

Feldman said his client tore his anterior cruciate ligament, medial collateral ligament and posterior cruciate ligament in the first quarter of New England's 23-20 win over Pittsburgh on Sunday.

Harrison also has six interceptions in six playoff games with New England, including two in last season's 24-21 Super Bowl win over Philadelphia.

The Patriots secondary was depleted before Harrison went down. Three injured defensive backs - cornerbacks Tyrone Poole and Randall Gay and safety James Sanders - did not play against the Steelers.

Also Tuesday, the Patriots waived linebacker Wesly Mallard. That leaves two openings on the team's 53-player roster. Mallard, 26, was signed by the Patriots as a free agent in April and played in the first two games, recording three special teams tackles. Mallard spent his first three seasons with the New York Giants.

Harsher roids penalties ahead

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK – Baseball players are willing to again toughen the sport's drug policy, offering to accept a 20-game penalty instead of 10 days for first-time steroid offenders along with tests for amphetamine use.

The proposal, outlined Monday in a letter from union head Donald Fehr to commissioner Bud Selig, fell short of what management wants.

In an April 25 letter to the union, Selig called for a 50-game suspension for an initial positive test, a 100-game ban for second-time offenders and a lifetime ban for a third violation.

Fehr's response said Selig's proposal was meant to quiet criticisms of baseball's current policy, not deter steroid use.

"We share your concern about the criticism our program has received, and, in response, the players have demonstrated, several times now, their willingness to take all reasonable measures in response," Fehr wrote.

Nine players received 10-day suspensions this year under the MLB program, with Baltimore's Rafael Palmeiro the most prominent.

"Doubling it is good," Orioles player representative Jay Gibbons said before Monday night's game against the New York Yankees. "I think 10 is a little light.

"Ten you can get away with as a team. You can do without a guy for 10 days, but 20, you're kind of hurting your ballclub, too."

Fehr's letter came ahead of Wednesday's congressional hearings on steroids in sports, the latest in a series of sessions on Capitol Hill. Selig and Fehr are expected to join the commissioners and union heads of the NFL, NBA and NHL in testifying about legislation to standardize testing and punishment.

One of the proposed bills is sponsored by Sen. Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican and former pitcher who's a member of baseball's Hall of Fame.

"It's an embarrassment. Donald Fehr has embarrassed the people he represents. He says to the American people in that letter, 'We don't care what you think: 20 games is all we think is necessary,'" Bunning said Tuesday. "He basically says, 'In your face. Twenty games, take it or leave it.' That's completely unacceptable to the Congress."

Fehr said he released the union's position because of the upcoming hearing and to ensure players are up to date before they scatter when the regular season ends Sunday. He's met separately with players on all 30 teams since April "to give everybody an opportunity to weigh in who wanted to.

"We knew we were dealing with 2006 all along. I never saw the crisis to do something in a short-cir-

Audobon Day celebrated at Memorial Hall

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Correspondent

A celebration of the second annual Audobon Day at the University of Massachusetts was held at Memorial Hall on Tuesday night.

Several authors spoke at the event, including Donald Kroodsma, UMass Professor Emeritus of Biology; Lynn Margulis, a professor in the Department of; Laurie Sanders, host of WFCR Public Radio's "Field Notes"; John Hanson Mitchell, editor of the Massachusetts Audubon Magazine, and Wally Swist, General Book Department Manager of the University Store, all shared a little of their work and their thoughts and feelings about the natural world that evening.

Swist opened the event with a few words before sharing several poems by Robert Francis, including "Ghosts of Eagles," "The Sound I Listen For" and "Waxwings." He also shared two of his own poems with the audience, although he claimed reluctance to do so. His soft and reverent tone would be contrasted by later speakers' impassioned enthusiasm and crisp PowerPoint backgrounds.

"I'd like to talk to you about magic," Kroodsma began,

SGA Senate elections conducted yesterday

KATE SACHS/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Several students line up to vote in the SGA Senate elections inside the Berkshire Dining Commons in Southwest yesterday. Current SGA members say they expect a decent turn out number.

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association completed its Senate elections for the 2005-2006 school year yesterday. Results of over 70 senate seats will be announced tomorrow.

Though official numbers are not yet in, SGA President Pavel Payano is optimistic about the turnout. He told the Daily Collegian that one polling place in the Southwest Residential Area ran out of ballots for a short time.

Payano believes many students voted because "[they] are well-informed about the issues, such as high textbook prices, the overall high cost of the school, and the strain Greeks and RSOs are under right now. Given these problems, I think students are taking their democratic right to vote seriously," he said.

The SGA said in an official statement that this year's elections were held "with complete independence, without any aid or support from the central administration."

This year's elections were held over two days instead of one, which former SGA President Eduardo Bustamante believes was a good thing.

"Obviously, you get more overall votes during the course of two days, but if students are committed to being involved, they'll get to the polls," said Bustamante.

"No serious problems were reported at the polls, according to Ambreen Rafiq, Chancellor of Elections. "I think everything went as smoothly as could be expected," she said.

"I think most of the candidates were successful in going out there and getting people involved," said Payano. "The results of the election are up to the candidates — if you can't bring someone out to vote, you don't get votes."

Amtrak train crashes in Connecticut

By Cara Rubinsky
Associated Press

Emergency workers are at the scene of a collision between a car and an Amtrak train in Waterford, Conn. Officials expected train service to be significantly affected between Boston and New York.

WATERFORD, Conn. — An Amtrak Acela train hit a car at a crossing in eastern Connecticut Wednesday morning, killing a woman and her grandson and causing major delays on the rail line between Boston and Washington.

The accident happened at 7:42 a.m. on the southbound tracks about 2 1/2 miles from New London along the Connecticut shoreline, Amtrak spokeswoman Tracy Connell said. Train service, which was halted for about six hours, resumed about 1:30 p.m., but delays were expected to last most of the day.

Waterford Police identified those killed as Patricia Metzermacher, 61, and 8-year-old Zachary Joseph Metzermacher. A granddaughter, 4-year-old Courtney Metzermacher, was airlifted to Hartford Hospital. She was later transferred to the adjacent Connecticut Children's Medical Center, where she was listed in critical condition Wednesday afternoon. The family lived on Miner Lane near the railroad crossing where the accident occurred, police said.

The train hit the car and dragged it several hundred yards down the tracks, with the engine coming to rest on top of the demolished vehicle.

None of the 116 passengers and four crew members on the train were injured, police said. Passengers remained on the train and were taken back to New London about three hours after the accident.

Waterford First Selectman Paul Eccard said counselors were sent to a local preschool and elementary school.

Witnesses told police the gates at the crossing were working when the accident occurred, Eccard said. He said police had not determined how the car got onto the tracks.

The Acela is Amtrak's high-speed express train between Boston and Washington. The train can travel up to 150 mph, but goes much slower through Connecticut.

The rail line was shut down in the area while police and Amtrak officials investigated the crash. Lt. Jeffrey Nixon of the Waterford Police Department said train service was resumed after the gates were tested.

"I'm sure we've created quite the havoc on the Northeast Corridor today," he said.

'Putting Your Degree to Work' at UMass

Dr. Peter Fiske, co-founder and CEO of Reactive Atom Plasma (RAP) Technology (RAPT) Industries will be presenting a talk and workshop titled "Putting Your Degree to Work: Practical Career Strategies for PhDs" to all graduate students and post-doctorates at the University of Massachusetts.

The workshop will cover professional development strategies for young scientists and engineers. Fiske will discuss the process of career planning, job searching, and tips on interviewing and writing resumes. Fiske will also talk about how to identify the skills students have gained during their PhD that are useful in the working world.

Fiske is the author of two books, titled, "To Boldly Go, A Career Guide for Scientists" and "Put Your Science to Work: A Take Charge Career Guide for Scientists." He has traveled to many campuses with this workshop, including the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"Having read his book, I'm sure this seminar will be useful for scientists and engineers. We hope to continue to raise awareness about the importance and the process of career planning," said Jessica McCoy, co-founder of the Graduate Education and Career Development Initiative and a forth year graduate student in the Polymer Science and Engineering department.

Prior to starting RAPT, Fiske was a researcher at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory. In 1996 Fiske received a year-long White House Fellowship and served in the Clinton Administration as Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Special Projects. In addition to his books, Fiske has co-authored a biweekly career advice column, "Tooling Up," for the American Association for the Advancement of Science's career development Web site (nextwave.sciencemag.org).

This event is presented by the GECDI organizers, who also orchestrated the recent workshop on "A Ph.D. Is Not Enough!" on Sept. 20.

Rep. DeLay indicted for finance scheme

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Texas grand jury on Wednesday indicted Rep. Tom DeLay and two political associates on charges of conspiracy in a campaign finance scheme, forcing the House majority leader to temporarily relinquish his post. A defiant DeLay insisted he was innocent and called the prosecutor a "partisan fanatic."

"I have done nothing wrong. ... I am innocent," DeLay told a Capitol Hill news conference during which he criticized the Texas prosecutor, Ronnie Earle, repeatedly. DeLay said the charges amounted to "one of the weakest and most baseless indictments in American history."

In Austin, Earle told reporters, "Our job is to prosecute abuses of power and to bring those abuses to the public." He has noted previously that he has prosecuted many Democrats in the past.

Republicans at the Capitol selected Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo., the current Republican whip — No. 3 in the leadership ranks — to fill the vacancy temporarily.

Reps. David Dreier of California, the chairman of the House Rules Committee, and Eric Cantor of Virginia, the chief deputy whip, will assist Blunt with some of the majority leader duties.

Republicans expressed their backing for DeLay, the first House leader to be indicted in office in at least a century.

"He will fight this and we give him our utmost support," said Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois following a private GOP meeting.

DeLay said he was certain the indictment would be dismissed and shrugged off the charges as a "political witch hunt" designed to drive a wedge in the Republican ranks.

Gulf Coast governors plead with Congress for more aid

By David Pace
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Gulf Coast governors pleaded with Congress on Wednesday to provide economic and tax incentives to bring back investments and jobs needed for their states to recover and rebuild after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco told the Senate Finance Committee her state lost 25 percent of its business economy when Katrina hit Aug. 29 and left New Orleans flooded. After Rita hit the western part of the state last weekend, and re-flooded parts of New Orleans, Blanco said the estimated loss increased to a third of the business economy.

"It's very important to have incentives for our workers to return, and in order to do that, we have to have incentives for business to return," Blanco said, asking specifically for business tax write-offs for new investments, low-interest bonds for business borrowing and emergency business loans.

Appearing in person before the panel, Blanco passed up an opportunity to respond to former FEMA Director Michael Brown, who on Tuesday had accused state and local officials in Louisiana of fumbling the immediate relief effort after Katrina, which left hundreds dead in New Orleans.

"We are looking forward, not backward," she said.

At a House hearing, meanwhile, lawmakers decried early signs of abuse in the awarding of billions of dollars in hurricane-related contracts, most without competitive bidding. And a Senate panel heard local officials in Louisiana, Texas and Mississippi plead for help in caring for hurricane evacuees.

Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour and Alabama Gov. Bob Riley, testifying before the finance committee via a teleconference hookup, echoed Blanco's plea for help in revitalizing their private sectors.

Barbour also requested expanded business tax write-offs, particularly for investments in new equipment, $15 billion in tax-exempt private activity bonds and the elimination of capital gains taxes for business investments in

First female suicide bomber kills six, wounds 30 in Iraq

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — A woman strapped with explosives and disguised as a man blew herself up outside an Iraqi army recruiting center in a northern town Wednesday, killing at least six people and wounding 30 in the first known attack by a female suicide bomber in the country's bloody insurgency.

Al-Qaida in Iraq claimed responsibility for the blast, saying in an Internet posting that it was carried out by "a blessed sister."

The attack in Tal Afar, where U.S. and Iraqi forces routed militants in a major offensive two weeks ago, demonstrated the difficulty of maintaining security in the towns in the large northwestern region stretching to the Syrian border, where insurgents are most active.

The woman, disguised as a man in a white dishdasha — a traditional male robe — and a kaffiyeh head scarf, slipped into a line of applicants to join the Iraqi army at the first of three checkpoints outside the center when she detonated explosives hidden under her clothes and packed with metal balls, said Maj. Jamil Mohammed Sadr in Tal Afar.

It was the first known instance that a woman has carried out a suicide bombing in Iraq.

"Today's attack seems to represent a new tactic by the insurgents to use women who are rarely searched at Tal Afar's checkpoints because of religious and social traditions that grant women special treatment," Gen. Ahmed Mohammed Khalaf, the regional police chief, said in an interview with The Associated Press.

He said women and children will now be searched there the same way that men are.

The al-Qaida in Iraq claim came in a Web posting signed by the spokesman for the organization, Abu Maysara al-Iraqi.

"A blessed sister from the Al-Baraa bin Malek martyrdom brigade carried out a heroic attack defending her faith and honor

Bodies mount in devastated Louisiana

By Melinda DesLatte
Associated Press

BATON ROUGE, La. — Hundreds of corpses from Hurricane Katrina await identification at a makeshift morgue, with only 32 bodies released to families for burial so far — a slow pace officials consider unavoidable.

"These are horrible times, and it's extremely frustrating. I wish I could speed up the process, but speeding up the process could contaminate the process. I'm sorry about that," said Dr. Louis Cataldie, who heads the body recovery process in Louisiana.

Identifying the bodies through personal items, DNA, fingerprints, dental records, pacemakers or implants has been made difficult by the poor condition of corpses left for days or weeks in contaminated water, sludge and heat, he said.

In addition, dental records in New Orleans, in many cases, are destroyed or at least inaccessible, Cataldie said. Also, animals have been feeding on the bodies, making fingerprint identification harder.

Louisiana's official death toll from Katrina rose to 896 on Wednesday. Most of the bodies have been brought to a temporary morgue set up in St. Gabriel, about 15 miles from Baton Rouge, by refrigerated trucks. More than 100 bodies remain in local parish coroners' offices.

Cataldie discounted reports that large numbers of children's bodies had been recovered. "There have been some children, but thank God, there haven't been that many," he said.

About 340 of the bodies brought to the temporary morgue so far have a "presumptive identification," meaning forensic workers believe they have matched the corpse with a missing person and have notified families in most instances. But until a match is a "positive identification," the bodies are not released to family members.

Only 32 bodies have been positively identified and released to funeral homes chosen by their families, Cataldie said.

GM strike deadline avoided in Canada

By Beth Duff Brown
Associated Press

TORONTO — The Canadian Auto Workers union reached a tentative agreement with General Motors Corp. just minutes before a strike deadline late Tuesday, averting a walkout by 17,000 members and capping weeks of heated negotiations with North America's Big Three automakers.

The three-year contract with the world's largest automaker, which comes on the heels of agreements with Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG, was reached after General Motors withdrew a demand for shorter worker breaks at its Oshawa assembly complex outside of Toronto.

GM faced a strike deadline of midnight Tuesday, one both sides wanted to avoid. The last walkout by the Canadian division of General Motors Corp. was in 1996 and lasted 22 days.

CAW president Buzz Hargrove called off the strike, but said the union and GM would continue to put the terms of the contract on paper.

A General Motors spokesman did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Hargrove estimated there would be some 1,000 fewer GM employees in Canada at the end of the three-year contract, but said most would be through voluntary retirement and attrition. He said the union had to face the grim decline in the North American market share of the Big Three automakers, which has dropped by 13 percent since 1996.

"I've always believed that you have to work with the cards you're dealt," he said. "The challenges we face didn't happen by chance;

Gulf Coast still recovering

By Leila Fadel and Anthony Spangler

PORT ARTHUR, Texas — Hurricane Rita destroyed much of the electrical system in southeast Texas, a blow that may cripple the region for months.

Without power, towns from the Gulf Coast to more than 50 miles inland can't pump water or gas, provide relief from record heat, or reopen schools, hospitals and grocery stores. As a result, thousands of Texas residents are being told they still can't return home.

A line of traffic Tuesday stretched at least half a mile back from Port Arthur on the main road, Texas 73, as residents tried to return home. When drivers made it to the front of the line, a state trooper ordered them to turn around. Only emergency personnel would be allowed into town, troopers said.

Alongside the westbound lanes out, seven or eight cars stopped as drivers pondered what to do next. Some wanted to look for other ways into town, including one woman who could see her home from the highway.

Corey Davis, 34, said he only had enough gas to make it a few more miles, perhaps to the next town, but he knew no one there to stay with. Davis had fled to Louisiana with his wife, Tamisha, and their children, 5-year-old Corey Jr. and 4-year-old Deiondre. The children were in pajamas and slippers in the back of their white jeep.

"We're going to sleep in the jeep if we have to," Corey Davis said.

In Port Arthur, more than 500 workers raised power poles and repaired feeder lines, but the main electric line into the city is beyond repair, said City Manager Steve Fitzgibbons. Until it can be replaced, electricity cannot be restored.

Gulf Coast native and anchor of ABC's Good Morning America Robin Roberts helps volunteers in her home town of Pass Christian, Miss. on Tuesday.

Once it is, hospitals and essential infrastructure, such as the sewage system, will get power first.

"If people come here and there's no food, no gasoline and the roads are blocked, they are going to be in a position where we'll have to be helping them. But we ought to be dealing with trying to get the city back on line," Fitzgibbons said.

The city won't be operational for at least 30 days, he said, adding that Port Arthur was getting scant help from the federal government.

Most of the hardest-hit areas get their power from two companies: Beaumont, Texas-based Entergy in the larger cities, and Sam Houston Electric Cooperative in many of the rural areas.

Rita largely destroyed Entergy's giant transmission lines, which carry electricity from Beaumont to Lafayette, La., said Terry Hadley at the Texas Public Utility Commission. It also ruined thousands of utility poles, wire spans and transformers of both companies. Many are in rural areas, where downed trees block access.

At least half a million Texas residents live in regions without power. In Jasper, officials said they've been told it may be two months before everyone has electric service. In Orange, Ken Kreger, the emergency management coordinator, said, "Every power line in town is down. The feeder lines in the town are down."

Kreger said he had no reliable estimate on when service would be restored. It could be up to two months, he said.

The power company brought in crews from all over the country, but with Hurricane Katrina damage in Louisiana and Mississippi, crews are pulled in many directions, he said.

Even communities that escaped most of the storm damage are struggling because of power shortages. In Livingston, about 75 miles northwest of Beaumont, utility workers have begun rerouting electricity from cities to the east. That allowed some gas stations to reopen.

But the local schools were without power, as was the local radio station.

Polk County Judge John P. Thompson, who runs emergency management efforts there, said about half the area remains without power.

He, too, said the federal government isn't providing enough help to restore essential services.

On Monday, three military helicopters were scheduled to deliver shipments of food and water. The first helicopter arrived six hours late, he said.

Governors beg for more aid

the Gulf Opportunity Zone proposed by President Bush.

Riley said some type of hurricane bond package is needed to help Alabama businesses recover. He also endorsed accelerated tax write-offs for business investments and urged Congress to step in to resolve the growing dispute over whether flood damages are covered by private hurricane insurance.

The finance committee is crafting a long-term package to help the Gulf Coast states recover and rebuild. Congress already has provided $62 billion in emergency aid, and the Louisiana congressional delegation estimated last week that it will take another $250 billion in federal aid for that state alone to recover.

At a Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs hearing, Baton Rouge, La., Mayor Melvin L. "Kip" Holden said a quarter million evacuees from Katrina have ended up in his city, more than doubling its size and stressing public services to the limit. The airport, for example, has been the second busiest in the nation for the past three weeks.

"We desperately need help from the federal government to restore families, rebuild lives, cope and heal," he said.

At the House hearing on contract abuse, lawmakers pointed in particular to the early approval of multimillion dollar contracts for emergency housing — including a $236 million deal with Carnival Cruise Lines for cruise ships that later sat mostly empty — and the Bush administration's recommendation of a $250,000 purchase limit on government credit cards despite a long history of abuse of such cards.

they happened because of the declining market share of General Motors, Ford and Chrysler and the threat of loss of jobs."

He blamed that loss on Asian imports, namely from Japan and Korea, and protectionism by Asian governments.

"Our major problem is imports and lack of ability to export into the emerging growth markets of Asia," Hargrove said. "They ship into North America at their leisure and they close their markets to anything built in Canada and the United States."

Another major sticking point between the CAW and General Motors was removed earlier in the day when GM pulled its proposal to trim two minutes from the work breaks of assembly workers at its two car plants and one truck plant in Oshawa, east of Toronto. Those employees will continue to get two 10-minute breaks and 25 minutes for lunch.

The CAW already has deals with Ford and DaimlerChrysler, and GM has accepted the wage and benefit framework of those agreements. Under the CAW's so-called pattern bargaining with North America's top three automakers, the union reaches financial terms with one company, then demands the other two accept the same deal.

The first agreement, with Ford, allowed for wage improvements of roughly 1.3 percent in the first year of the deal, followed by 1 percent gains in years two and three.

It was accepted by a majority of workers on Sept. 18 and a similar agreement was ratified by DaimlerChrysler employees over the weekend.

The DaimlerChrysler deal announced Sunday shaves 1,000 union positions from the company's Ontario plants over the next three years, but no current employees will lose their jobs as positions will be cut through early retirement and attrition.

Detroit-based GM had argued that the pension package agreed to in the other deals would cost it more because the company has more than twice as many retirees than the other two automakers, plus more workers eligible for retirement within the next three years. There are nearly 20,000 retirees at GM and up to 5,000 eligible to retire within the next three years.

On Monday, Fitch Ratings lowered its assessment of General Motors debt further into junk status, saying the automaker has made little progress in reducing costs and is vulnerable to high gasoline prices.

The decision makes it costlier for GM to refinance debt or borrow more. The automaker has $136 billion of senior debt and more than $100 billion in other debt, Fitch said.

on a gathering of volunteers for the apostate forces at a center for recruiting apostates in Tal Afar," the statement said.

"May God accept our sister among the martyrs," it said.

The town of Baquoba suffered its second suicide car bomb in two days.

An attacker slammed his vehicle into a police patrol in central Baquuba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing one person and wounding 14, said Dr. Ahmed Mohammed at Baquoba General Hospital.

On Tuesday, a bomber strapped with explosives blew himself up at a police recruitment center in Baquuba, killing nine Iraqis.

In Wednesday's attack in Tal Afar, 95 miles east of the Syrian border, all the dead and wounded were army recruits, Sadr said.

The blast highlighted the difficulty of maintaining security in the large northwestern region stretching to the border, where insurgents are most active.

Iraqi authorities claimed nearly 200 suspected militants were killed and 315 were captured in the Sept. 8-12 offensive in Tal Afar. But U.S. and Iraqi troops discovered later that many had slipped away, some through a network of tunnels.

Most of the forces that participated in the offensive have withdrawn, although U.S. troops maintain a base and outposts in Tal Afar, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad.

"Due to the security vacuum after the withdrawal of (Iraqi) police commandos from Tal Afar, the terrorists came back again," said Abbas al-Bayati, a parliament member and an ethnic Turkman — a community with a large presence there.

The blast was similar to an attack a day earlier in Baquuba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, where a man strapped with explosives blew himself up in a police recruiting center, killing nine.

A U.S. soldier was killed and another wounded by a roadside bomb at the town of Safwan on Iraq's border with Kuwait on Wednesday, the military said. It also announced that a Marine near the western city of Fallujah was killed by non-hostile gunfire Monday.

The deaths brought to 1,920 the number of U.S. troops who have died since the Iraq war began in 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Soon after the Tal Afar offensive, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born, Sunni Arab leader of the al-Qaida in Iraq insurgent group, declared all-out war on Iraq's majority Shiites.

On Tuesday, Iraqi and U.S. forces announced they had killed al-Zarqawi's deputy, Abdullah Abu Azzam, in a weekend raid on a high-rise apartment building in Baghdad. The coalition called Abu Azzam the mastermind of an escalation in suicide bombings that have killed nearly 700 people in Baghdad since April and said he was the financial controller for foreign fighters who entered Iraq to join the insurgency.

Al-Qaida in Iraq issued an Internet statement denying Abu Azzam was its deputy leader, calling him "one of al-Qaida's many soldiers" and "the leader of one its battalions operating in Baghdad." The statement confirmed the Baghdad raid but said it was not certain whether he was killed.

Government spokesman Laith Kubba warned that insurgents likely would carry out revenge attacks for Abu Azzam's death. He said the militant "was supervising on a daily basis almost all the attacks that happened (in Baghdad) ... He was fully responsible for preparing and sending the car bombs that killed hundreds of innocent Iraqis."

At least 74 people have been killed this week.

In southern Iraq, police found the badly decomposed bodies of 22 Iraqi men shot to death and dumped in a field, many of them bound and blindfolded, police Lt. Othman al-Lami said.

He said the victims appeared to have been killed more than a month ago and their identities were not immediately known.

trying to relate to his audience his thrill when he "put on a pair of head phones and used a powerful microphone to listen to the songs of birds." He brought his audience into the minds of the birds he studied for over 30 years, explaining that these songs weren't at all for our pleasure, but that they were designed to impress female songbirds. Kroodsma made the most of the audio-visual elements, displaying sonograms of bird songs and then playing them at various speeds so that his audience could appreciate the subtle detail that birds themselves appreciate.

Mitchell related the story of his book, "Looking For Mr. Gilbert" — not the plot, but rather his building fascination with the story of a southern African American and a wealthy Boston Brahman and their relationship over twenty years. For Mitchell, the book was the labor of years; whenever he had time, he would look into records and archives to find out who Robert Gilbert was. Even F. Scott Fitzgerald's "Tender is the Night," which contained a reference to Gilbert, helped inspire Mitchell to turn his research into his latest book.

Emily Dickinson was invoked many times as Margulis laid out her belief that man is not above nature, but rather part of it. She used sources from Kierkegaard to Eugene Ceman to illustrate that man is a part of nature, living in the same 12 kilometers of the biosphere as every other living thing. She enthusiastically dove into the thoughts and words of many thinkers and poets, and rounded out her presentation with a video on the union of a fungus and a bacteria to produce a nitrogen fixing hybrid only found in parts of Eastern Europe. It was her reading of Dickinson, though, that left the greatest impression.

Sanders finished off the evening by staying local and tying in elements from the previous presenters with her photo presentation of the Pioneer Valley's geological history, which encompassed everything from dinosaurs to the highways that tie our modern world so tightly together. She spoke of the tremendous amount of diversity that could be found in the wildlife of the area, from the swamps and wetlands to the Holyoke range with its igneous characteristics. Like the other speakers, Sanders shared the sense of splendor that the natural world imparted to her.

The evening ended after 9:30 p.m. with a book signing and a few questions, and the presenters' feeling of amazement found its way out to the audience.

Swist remarked that attendance was down from the previous year, but that he would work to make sure more people had the chance to participate next year. Despite a cut in the number of presenters, the event ran longer than expected, which was in part due to some technical difficulties, another item that Swist plans to address for the next event.

Students not well informed about SGA candidates

The Student Government Association held its Senate elections today in the dining commons and the Campus Center. Results have not yet been released, but whatever the outcome is, it will hardly matter to the majority of UMass students. The SGA Senate elections are poorly run every year, and that is one of the reasons the SGA does not accurately represent the thoughts and ideas of the student body.

The biggest flaw in the conduct of SGA elections is how uninformed the student body is about the candidates. The majority of campaigning the candidates do is in the Campus Center and in dormitories. However, on a campus like UMass with over 19,000 undergraduate students to reach out to, going door-to-door is highly ineffective.

Getting your name out there to students, and more importantly, making it stick with some sort of idea of who you are and what you're about, is very hard to do on this campus. As it stands now, candidates who do go door-to-door have to do so at night when the majority of students are actually home. However, because of the amount of students, the schedule of the candidate (who is also a student and has work to do) and the geographical layout of the campus, it takes a while for one candidate to reach every student in his or her respective area.

Also, each candidate has to go and make a mini-speech to college students who are doing work, hanging out with friends or have better things to occupy their time. The little pitch candidates make is ultimately ineffective, and makes people view them as door-to-door salesmen more than as SGA Senate candidates representing student interests. Additionally, by the time candidates make their speech and move on to the next student, a good amount of time has passed — about five minutes. Therefore, they will not reach certain students until 11 or 11:30 p.m. Depending on the student and how early their class is the next day, they may not necessarily appreciate the intrusion.

A better way to go about reaching the students on all the issues would be to post candidates and their positions on certain platforms on the SGA's Web site. While there is a Web site, not many students currently know about it, and it isn't adequate in terms of representing the candidates (or the current members, for that matter). In order to increase Web site hits, simple flyers with the URL posted on them can be dispensed in the Campus Center or Student Union so that the students can actually research for themselves who they would like to represent them.

Allowing students to make their own decisions is the basis of what the SGA stands for. This can happen if the SGA improves communication with students so that they can make an informed decision. Expecting to grab students while they're walking into the DC for lunch and have them vote for a candidate is unrealistic.

Is Israel in our thoughts?

Bonnie Solomon

We are all so focused on the war in Iraq and the tragedies of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, even though both truly deserve our thoughts, that we have forgotten the rest of the world.

We have forgotten the poverty in third-world countries. We have forgotten that there were horrible bombings in London not even two months ago. We have been so caught up in the blame game that we have forgotten what is going on elsewhere.

We have also forgotten about the budget cuts in many school systems. My old high school, for example, lost thousands of dollars due to budget cuts. Now students have to pay high fees to play sports, have lost many art supplies and many qualified teachers were laid off.

And we have been neglecting our environment. People don't realize the effects of pollution or the growing hole in the ozone layer. Nor are they that concerned with recycling. What's throwing away one bottle going to do?

Most of all, we have forgotten what is going on in Israel. I myself admit that I have been so caught up in thinking about New Orleans and rising gas prices and the everyday worries of a college student that I have forgotten the place that means the most to me and in my heart is my home. I have been to Israel twice: once for my Bat-Mitzvah, and two summers ago on a month-long youth trip. When I was there, my soul felt at peace, and I felt at home. But now that I'm here, and I have homework and worries and stress and boredom, I forget how much Israel means to me. So I took out my photo album of my trip and beamed as I was paging through it. I looked at pictures of the Western Wall, the Dead Sea, the mountains and valleys of the Golan Heights and of me just hanging out with random Israelis.

Everyone asks me, "Weren't you afraid of getting shot?" "So you weren't scared at all?" "Wasn't it dangerous?" To all of these, I answered "no." To my surprise, I actually felt safer walking the streets of Jerusalem than I do walking around Southwest late at night on weekends. Yes, we did go through Palestinian territories. Yes, I could have been shot very easily by snipers. Yes, I cringed when I saw bullet holes and dents in walls. But most of all I felt my heart go out to these people.

Even though there was no bloodshed or gunfire, it was so painful to see my people being forced out of a synagogue and into trucks to take them away from their homes only to have Palestinians move into them.

There is so much negative media aimed at Israel. People are so torn as to who to believe. Sometimes I don't even know who is telling the truth when it comes to news from Israel. So now that I've joined the Student Alliance for Israel (SAFI), I feel more motivated to really keep up with the news from Israel. SAFI tries to bring Israel into a positive light on campus and host Israeli activities. Israel Culture Night under the Stars on Wednesday evening was one event.

The news that has affected me most is the pullout from the Gaza Strip. Many people, including Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and President Bush, thought that pulling out of Gaza would facilitate the peace process between the Israelis and the Palestinians. The entire day that the news covered the evacuations, I was sitting on my couch at home watching attentively and crying. Even though there was no bloodshed or gunfire, it was so painful to see my people being forced out of a synagogue and into trucks to take them away from their homes only to have Palestinians move into them.

I do not believe that the evacuation will ease relations between the two sides at all. Already there have been signs of anti-Israel propaganda on the Palestinian side; as soon as the Israeli settlers moved out, there were Palestinians celebrating in the uninhabited streets of Gaza. They were burning Israeli flags, singing anti-Jewish/Israel songs and burning synagogues. Most recently, Hamas accidentally blew up its own van during an anti-Israel rally, wounding its own people and then blaming the disaster on Israel. They then used that as an excuse to fire over 30 rockets at an Israeli town. I'm just worried that rather than moving towards peace, Israel is just giving and giving for nothing in return — and eventually there will be nothing left.

The Fenway 'fate'-ful

Matt Brochu

The 2005 Major League Baseball regular season will end just as it began – with all eyes focused upon the World Champion Red Sox and the New York Yankees. In retrospect, many will say that in a marketing sense, these two series were a particularly brilliant set of bookends orchestrated by the scheduling wizards at MLB. This cliffhanger-less season finale, however, is not just another instance of convenience, coincidence or the continuous overexposure of this rivalry on a national level.

There's something else at work here: fate. And if you didn't see this coming from the beginning, well, you have about as much foresight as the guy who sees a chick dancing on a frat table in a skirt with no thong and thinks to himself, "That, right there, is girlfriend material."

Yes, I used the "F" word in reference to a meaningless kids' game played by men with too much money and too few children fathered inside of wedlock. You heard it here first. The omnipotent force in whom you invest your spirituality does not dedicate His/Her/Its time to the important task of keeping the world's children safe by instilling in them the most important rule: Don't go chasing waterfalls. Instead, He/She/It hangs out on some Dorito-covered couch in the sky, wasting entire Saturday afternoons interfering with groundballs headed for Edgar Renteria's glove and adjusting the purpleness of Alex Rodriguez's lips. Sure, your beliefs may seem trivial now, but don't lose faith. He/She/It hates Tim McCarver just as much as you do.

I've said it before and I'll say it again – generally, I don't believe in fate. Much like that new show where Geena Davis plays the President of the United States, the concept itself just doesn't agree with me. Sure, I believe there could be a female president, especially if this female president has proven that she can catch a baseball while doing the splits, but you want me to believe that the Red States couldn't keep Geena Davis out of office? Did Rosie Perez not run? Clearly not, because anyone who knows six foods that begin with the letter Q would be unstoppable in a presidential debate.

And just as Geena's portrayal of our Commander-in-Chief bothers me, so does the thought that things are "meant to happen" the way they do. In fact, I don't even like people who believe in fate. A belief in fate makes a sorority chick write, "Everything happens for a reason" in her AIM profile after she catches her boyfriend traveling to Poundtown (Population: 2) with another girl. A belief in fate makes Kanye West say, "God didn't allow me to survive my car accident for no reason ... I know that God is speaking through me." Really? That was actually the Lord Himself rapping through Kanye in "The New Workout Plan" when he says, "Give head. Stop, breathe. Get up. Check yo' weave?" I had no idea that God doesn't show love to chickenheads. I guess I do now.

Sure, I believe there could be a female president, especially if this female president has proven that she can catch a baseball while doing the splits, but you want me to believe that the Red States couldn't keep Geena Davis out of office?

In this case, though – for baseball, for the Red Sox, for Big Papi – I'll make an exception. As of tonight (my deadline being Tuesday at midnight), 157 games have been played. That's 1,413 innings, 22,765 pitches, 2,355 drunken "Bum bum bum(s)" during "Sweet Caroline" and roughly six trillion waves by jackasses holding cell phones. Yet after all of this, in spite of the Yankees' injuries and Beantown's Bullpen Blowups, in spite of Giambi's Jared-from-Subway weight loss and Manny being Manny, in spite of Bellhorn's slew of Boston strikeouts and Bellhorn's collection of Bomber whiffs, these two teams stubbornly remain neck and neck. But not for long.

You see, winning the World Series last October was a lot like waking up to find out that your parents have disappeared (temporarily) – no rules, no bedtimes and no worries. As a result, the majority of the Red Sox have behaved a lot like Macaulay Culkin in "Home Alone" throughout the season. Schilling kept ordering cheese pizzas and eating ice cream nonstop. Johnny decided to elevate his celebrity status from "C" level (think Mario Lopez) to "B" level (think that dude who broke Danny's face on "Real World: Austin"). And Foulke decided to try his hand at sledding down the stairs through the front door, resulting in a nagging knee injury. But the popular consensus seemed to be that our boys earned it, and most importantly, the Yankees didn't seem to pose a substantial threat to take it from them. Until now.

Well, this weekend, the Wet Bandits (A-Rod and Jeter) are planning to waltz into Fenway Park and take what is rightfully ours. Three days. Three games. Two teams. One fate. Nothing left in the tank. Everything left on the field.

This is our house. We have to defend it. Play ball.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A REVIEW OF THE FIGHT DUD

Last week I witnessed the downfall of humanity, a triumphant degradation of the human spirit. Working on a paper in my room, I suddenly heard a roar of cheering and the pounding of flesh on flesh. Eager to pause in my work, I rushed down to the Orchard Hill Bowl in search of the commotion's source. I arrived to find a chanting mob, partly made up of bewildered onlookers, but mostly consisting of beefy boys. The crowd was approaching 500 people, and the balconies were filled with viewers shouting obscenities and ripping shrill cries. In the center of attention was a pair of dolts who were smashing their fists into each others' faces.

I almost felt like I was watching the movie "Fight Club." This scene, however, was devoid of communist ideals or any sense of purpose at all. Here the value was placed on gashes, bruises and apparently the absence of any style whatsoever. Ordinarily I would snub such senseless violence immediately. This event, on the other hand, roped me in. I was seized by the ingenuity of such thoroughly purposeless thrashing. It fascinated me. I was stunned by its spontaneity and unsure how to react to the most dimwitted thing I had ever seen. Should I shun the madness or spur it on?

I chose to do what any red-blooded American male should have done: I scoured the crowds for a girl who would fight me. In a crazed frenzy I decided to up the ante, cross the line and punch girls instead of boys - Just kidding, but I suppose that does shed some light on the force driving the event: moronic masculinity. This guy on guy combat was a pathetic display of primitive machismo. I later found out the only girl to make a challenge was left unopposed by a crowd of sleeveless guys.

The riot of guttural noises and gladiator stunts lasted about 20 minutes before being broken up by four armed policemen. Overall, I think Ill rate the University's new Fight Dud with a big sarcastic "awesome." Welcome to UMass, where the age of the Neanderthal has just begun.

AN APOLOGY TO UMASS

A year after the "UMass Red Sox Riots," I realize that apologies and praise are both due. While everyone celebrated Boston's first World Series in over 80 years, hundreds of state and campus police officers went to work, protecting the campus and its students. Preventing damages in residential and academic areas of the campus, the hundreds of thousands of dollars spent on their overtime effort was a small price to pay. Though I did not participate in any of the riots, it has been made clear to me that they were extremely dangerous: T-shirts and toilet paper aflame throughout Southwest, girls exposing themselves atop the shoulders of crowd members, and "Go Sox" chants so loud that even on the 20th floor of Kennedy no soul could find peace.

I apologize for any additional stress I put on the UMass Police Department on the night of Oct. 20, 2004. My inappropriate conduct added to your work load in ways that were simply unnecessary. Know that as you prepare for the upcoming Sox postseason that my thoughts and love are with every one of you, because after all, you are the unsung heroes. I will never see any of you officers ever again, ever, ever, but thank you for everything you do.

'The Aristocrats' should be enjoyed in moderation

BY PETER FRISMAN

There appears to be a growing trend of Puritanism in this country. It seems that profanity and bawdy humor are not only considered passé by popular culture, but frowned upon. A certain incident in 2001 may have spurred the United States' notion that the mining of some sensitive, politically incorrect topics for humor is offensive and downright immoral.

'The Aristocrats'
Directed by Paul Provenza
Thinkfilm
Rated R
85 mins.
Grade B

Paul Provenza's "The Aristocrats" plays out like an opportunity for the countless comedians shown in the film to vent their frustration over the past several years, finally being able to release the pent-up material society prevented them from delivering.

"The Aristocrats" is a documentary about a certain joke — a joke which is beyond a doubt the most obscene joke in history. There is no one version of the joke; the specific content is composed by the comic. Only the outline remains the same. A man, sometimes along with his family, walks into a talent agency and either performs or describes a new act: He and his family partake in many revolting acts, usually but not always including zoophilia, coprophilia, and incest. At the end of the act or its description, the talent agent is, of course, stunned, and asks for the title of the act. The man replies, "The Aristocrats."

Scores of comedians and humorists, far too many to list, offer to the camera their version of the joke, memories of the joke's history, and offer insights on the joke's humor. Some of the tellings of the joke are far more memorable than others, particularly when the comic offers a novel form of its presentation (such as the mime who offers graphic depictions of incest and bestiality, and then his gesture for "aristocrat"). September 11 is analyzed with regards to its impact on the joke and questionable humor in general, as well as how Gilbert Gottfried's telling of the joke at a roast of Hugh Hefner succeeded so well. Besides his impeccable timing and delivery, it was still a time when comics felt the need for censorship themselves and acted accordingly, and Gottfried smashed the rules and went for broke, not caring who he offended — an attitude that was naturally in keeping with the spirit of the joke.

The film is more open than the usual documentary. Instead of putting up panes of glass between themselves and the audience, the comics seem to invite the viewer into the screen and laugh along with them. The film is aloof, laid-back, and unprofessional. Provenza apparently knows not to take himself

'Battlefield' looking dull on PS2

War is a game, so it's completely logical to make the leap from the battlefield to the virtual battlefield of the online world. Why blow up a retarded computer-controlled drone when, instead, you can blow up a retarded human-controlled drone?

Online combat is nothing new, and in the PC world, the Battlefield series is king. Battlefield 1942 was a big hit on the PC, putting players in the shoes of World War II grunts out on famous battles of the war. The game gave players the ability to hop into a slew of vehicles like tanks, jeeps and airplanes and maneuver them all over the virtual battlefield. All this was done online in team-based combat: Allies versus Axis, or in laymen's terms, red versus blue.

Battlefield 2 takes the same formula and drops you into the world of urban combat, or rather, modern warfare. Replace the historical battles of World War II with random battles in "Middle Eastern" environments and replace the Japanese and Nazis with "Middle Eastern" terrorists and you get Battlefield 2.

The game was released on the PC a few months ago and was plagued with bugs. A giant patch was put out to fix the game, and the masses flocked to patch. The game is a significant graphical improvement on the original Battlefield, and overall, the gameplay is far more fun, with up to 24 people playing online at the same time. Now, the people at Electronic Arts are bringing the game over to the console.

The graphics still look great. All the features are still present and nothing is missing. Sounds great, right? Wrong. Battlefield 2 on the consoles suffers from what almost every other first-person shoot on console suffers from: horrible aim. Let's face it, no controller can match the pinpoint accuracy of a computer mouse. Why does this keep being a problem? Haven't we proven this to be true over and over again? The SOCOM series of games knows this fact and made the game playable in both first-person and over-the-shoulder prospective. This made aiming and executing complex shots much easier. When Star Wars: Battlefront was released on the console, it, too, had an over-the-shoulder view, which Battlefield 2 is lacking.

However, this is just a preview. I was only able to play one level in the demo. Let's hope EA fixes this little problem when the game ships later this fall. Otherwise, wait for SOCOM III to come out. If you really want to play Battlefield 2, though, rent it before you buy. Otherwise, get the PC version if you have a decent

Indie acts rock for research

BY KELLY KRAEMER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Crowd attendance failed to reflect the performers' talent at a Sept. 23 benefit concert for cancer research.

The concert, which was held at the Pioneer Arts Center in Easthampton, was headlined by some of the most promising Indie female artists in conjunction with the Indie Music For Life non-profit organization. Denise Barbarita, Vicki Blankenship, and University of Massachusetts Amherst alumni Jess Yoakum proved that the rise of the female soulstress is underappreciated.

Few artists can claim their voice to be as gracious and commanding as Denise Barbarita. As the first act, she stole the show following the standards set by such singer/songwriters like Ani DiFranco, Sheryl Crow, and at times even Fiona Apple. The New York-based vocalist has been involved in music since she was a child, and cites her music to be "a cross between Tori Amos and The Pretenders." Her performance proved to be just that, as her stage presence produced a different mood in every song. In songs like "Hush, Hush" where she sings "Hush, hush, just shut up, take control of your life," Barbarita's voice is imposing and she sings with a desperation that appeals to the listener. Her fervor for music was matched by her passion to raise awareness and money for cancer research. "I believe in the cause, and if you're touring anyway, why not tour to be something bigger than yourself?" she said.

The much sweeter, power lyricist Jess Yoakum embraced that passion of Denise and elegantly lured the audience to her heavy vocals. The UMass Amherst alumni got her bachelor's degree in Latin American Studies while doing music on the side. Now employed by Berklee College of Music, Yoakum is still indecisive about her career as a musician. She is a fan of the Indigo Girls, Paul Simon, and "old-school" female power-houses like Aretha Franklin and Joni Mitchell, but relates her music as "Patty Griffin meets The Sundays," which may be more accurate than not. Her lyrics were as piercing as her voice, as shown in songs like "The Leaving Song," "Escape Route," and the particularly powerful "Emily's Song," which explores her view of her sister's childhood. Jess's lyrics are self-demanding and pressing, yet she is truly humble. "It's hard to write about life experiences without getting self-absorbed," she said. One of her favorite parts of being a musician is being able to play benefit concerts, and as a local artist, she enjoys playing in the region. "Venture out: there is so much to do in this region. [The region] is such a rich area artswise that you miss out on a lot of opportunities if you don't," she said.

Like Yoakum, there is something about Vicki Blankenship's personality that seems to produce generosity in everything that she does. As a victim of cancer herself, she has toured many times along the East Coast and given the proceeds to the American Cancer Society. Blankenship disapproved when she learned that much of the money being raised was fed into therapy and care centers for patients rather than to research. Blankenship began her own non-profit organization now known as Indie Music for Life. Her music is her passion, and her giving personality unfolded itself the minute Blankenship took the stage. Her opening song, "1 in 8," a tribute to the fact that one in eight Americans will die from cancer, compelled the audience to the cause. Her rich country and bluegrass background was evident in the second song. "My two greatest influences were my great grandfather and my grandfather," she said. Both of them started Blankenship's musical career early, and ended up dying from cancer.

The concert delivered three musically different acts, each fulfilling the Indie Music For Life slogan, "fighting for cancer one song at a time." They played an exceptional show, each creating their own mood and urgency for the cause. The saying "everyone knows someone who has had cancer" failed to be represented in the concert's attendance, however. It was a concert with heart that should have captivated more people that it did.

'Aristocrats'

...ously when filming a documentary about a joke.

The Aristocrats" is somewhat of a paradox of a film. I enjoyed it, and I found it very entertaining, but I certainly wish that no movies like this hit theaters for a very long time. Part of the reason this film succeeds is that it breaks the norms. (You probably won't find many mainstream Hollywood films containing jokes about families gaily frolicking in their own excrement.) This trend of going against the mainstream is copied, the value of the original "Aristocrats" is equal will be nulled, as the rebellion will itself become mainstream. I recommend you see "The Aristocrats" at least a few months after your viewing of a different ribald movie, so your sensibilities will have had enough time to regenerate and can be shredded apart again in full force. This film is pure self-indulgence; the cinematic equivalent of death by chocolate and should definitely be enjoyed in moderation.

"The Aristocrats" is far too silly a film to be taken seriously as a documentary, but the filmmakers seem to have accepted this fact and strive towards making the film a form of entertainment in its own right. There is no sense of structure or a solid message. But of course this film has no need for such flourishes. In the face of the restrictive morals currently being imposed upon American citizens, humorists seem to use "The Aristocrats" as a method of no-holds-barred scream therapy, as is showcased in this movie. The audience would do well to accept the movie's implicit invitation to join in the cacophony.

A day of peace, music, and hookah by the pond

By Allie Roth
Collegian Correspondent

About 500 UMass students gathered next to the Campus Pond between 4 and 8 p.m. last Thursday for Jewstock: A Day of Peace and Music.

Jewstock was a free concert sponsored by Hillel, Chabad House, the Office of Jewish Affairs, and the Jewish Student Union, and featured the musical stylings of DJ Gibbs, Busted Vacuum, Cold Duck Complex, and UMass's own Doc Ellis. The event also featured kosher pickles donated by Cain's Pickles of South Deerfield, cans of soda donated by Coca Cola, and a traditional hookah for all to enjoy.

Jewstock was, notably, the first time all four Jewish organizations have worked together to plan one event. JSU President and Jewstock creator Chad Rubin wants this to be the first of many events for which Jewish community leaders will collaborate. He believes that with the JSU acting as an intermediary between Chabad, Hillel, and the Office of Jewish Affairs, a goal of ultimate cohesion can be realized.

"These organizations rarely work together and often have different agendas. Jewstock acted to unite these organizations, because the bottom line is that we are all the same religion, Jewish, and all part of the same community here at UMass," Rubin said.

Furthermore, he wanted to show that people who are different can exist together in a unified way. "I wanted to create a cohesive and harmonic atmosphere, much like the one at the original Woodstock in 1969," Rubin said. "I hoped that all people, not just Jewish students, would come out and enjoy the powerful force of music as a uniting factor."

All of the bands featured were non-denominational local acts who support the cause of community-wide cohesion. First up was DJ Gibbs, who spun some tunes as people gathered on the lawn. Next was Busted Vacuum, a band from Belchertown, Mass. They played a set of covers and originals, ending with an instrumental jam that highlighted the band's ability to improvise in a semi-structured fashion.

The most anticipated act came up next. New England's own Cold Duck Complex. In 2004, this band won the Valley Advocate's Best Hip-Hop Award. They have also made several appearances on MTVU, and their album "Figureheads" (released in 2003) reached #11 on the CMJ music charts.

Their sound can be described as sort of rap and sort of rock, but with a keyboard. The solos between the bassist and the keyboardist created a unique sound that was at times semi-reminiscent of a traditional jazz record. Some of their songs carried political undertones or had pop culture references, such as "Getting busy like George Michael at rest stops." Another song described drunken night relationships, and the feelings that come the following morning. No matter what your musical preference, Cold Duck Complex had something to offer. Whether it was the jammabl, interludes, the piano solos, or the often-clever rhyming lyrics, Cold Duck Complex came across as a likeable everyman sort of band.

Closing out the evening was Doc Ellis, a band comprised of UMass students. They played a set of jam band style tunes that highlighted quality instrument-playing skills. It was an impressive ending to a day of peace through music.

Next up for JSU will be a New York Bagel Night, featuring the good lox and bagels that are often lacking on campus. Go to the JSU website, http://umassjsu.tk, for more information and to learn about other upcoming events.

Podcasting 101

By Jacqueline Ronan and Carlos Cruz
Collegian Staff

With every new wave of technological industry breakthroughs there almost always is a point when said technology becomes available to the public. This is especially true in the field of communications. The computer has been the focal tool of this movement. With digital video cameras, editing software and built-in DVD burners, anybody can make and distribute his or her own movie. With online servers and graphic and web designing software, anybody can run their own website. With audio editing/mixing software and built in CD burners, anybody can record and distribute their own album. Websites like "myspace.com" even let you post the music you have created.

And now radio, the somewhat forgotten and underappreciated medium, has begun to make itself available to everyone ... sort of. Since there are only so many radio waves out there, it just isn't possible for anybody to have their own show — hence the creation of podcasting. Using a play on the words of "broadcast" and "iPod", a podcast is a self-published audio program that can be downloaded over the Internet. The "radio" program is then uploaded onto a website in the form of MP3s or other alternative formats, and listeners download the file to their computer or MP3 player.

There are many pros to this. First off, you can listen to a podcast whenever you want to. Because all this content is downloadable and no one copyrights it, you are encouraged to copy it and listen to it on your way to work, between classes, or on a road trip. Second, the podcasts out there are theme specific. Subjects range from the mundane to the downright weird. This means that if you want to listen to someone talk about updates and developments in the pork industry, there is a podcast out there for you.

Some might argue, however, that this isn't exactly a great thing. When you give Joe Schmo a chance to voice his opinions on anything, you get interesting results. You see, what's great about Podcasting is anybody can share his or her views and opinions; the bad thing about Podcasting is anybody can share his or her views and opinions. And this doesn't necessarily mean the opposite to your political and moral views. There is no one moderating this, no censorship agency controlling what is said and done.

This allows the podcaster total freedom to say and discusses whatever he or she feels. All programs are free. The creator of the one of the most popular podcasts (This Week in Tech), Leo Laporte, admits that there is no business model for this. Larger podcasts like TWIT rely solely on donations to stay afloat. No ads are run during the program and no money is required to listen.

But with any cool underground movement (much like breakdancing and grunge music), big corporations have to catch wise and ruin it. The big names in broadcasting have already claimed a piece of the podcasting land. Fox, ABC, NBC and CBS have all launched podcasts selling out their programming. One of the more ridiculous podcasts produced by the networks is the Fox Foxcast, which isn't really a podcast so much as some guy recapping the network's big shows, including "Family Guy," "The Simpsons," and even "So You Think You Can Dance."

For the time being, podcasting is pretty much a medium of this generation. Most older folks aren't figuring this one out. If your mom doesn't know how to type in Microsoft Word, she isn't going to figure out a podcast — which is a shame, because there are a ton of arts and crafts podcasts out there.

This may be flash in the pan, but most signs point to this being a lot bigger. The more popular podcasts have listeners in the millions. Some have already evolved into video podcasts. There is even an awards show for these things. The Podcast Awards are a sort of people's choice for the podcast "industry" that is held yearly. Listeners are asked to vote for the best podcasts out there. If you wish to get into all this podcasting stuff, check out the Podcast Awards website (www.podcastawards.com). Perhaps we'll be downloading you someday!

The lullaby of Broadway '42nd Street' dazzled the Mullins Center Sunday

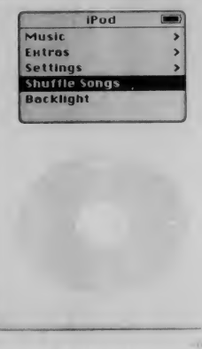
By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

It's hard to go to a place you've been to so many times and see it set up differently. When I initially heard last year that there was a Broadway series coming to Amherst, I assumed the performances would be in the Concert Hall at the Fine Arts Center. Much to my surprise, all the shows were going to be at the Mullins Center. How, I wondered, could an arena used mainly for hockey, basketball and concerts be conducive to live theater? I was a skeptic that any performance could successfully be pulled off in Mullins, and I was, much to my surprise and delight, proven wrong.

The freshman production of the "Broadway in Amherst" series kicked up its heels this past Sunday night at the Mullins Center with "42nd Street." Centered around chorus girl Peggy Sawyer and her rise to leading lady, "42nd Street" is a classic song-and-dance musical filled with showstopping numbers, exciting choreography and dazzling sets and costumes. This production of "42nd Street" was produced and presented by Big League Theatricals and is based on the Tony Award-winning 2001 Broadway production.

Ron Smith headed the cast as no-nonsense director Julian Marsh, and Natalie Buster played the icy diva Dorothy Brock. Both played their parts with ease and conviction, and had strong voices. Maureen Veronica Illmensee and Tom Frye were hysterical as writers Maggie Jones and Bert Barry, and Illmensee had a superb voice to back up her comedic chops.

Cast as the hopeful Peggy Sawyer was Melody Davi, and she gave a phenomenal, tour-de-force performance. Her Peggy was sweet and naïve, and she proved that she could sing and dance up a storm. She is definitely a talent to watch, thanks to her star-making turn in this production. Cody Walker was also outstanding as the suave and sophisticated tenor Billy Lawlor. His performance as the tap dancing and singing leading man was nothing short of phenomenal.



The real stars of the show, however, were the "kids in the chorus." These hoofers danced up a storm for the better part of two and a half hours, and by the time the final curtain came down they hadn't even broken a sweat. They took the challenging choreography given to them by Rick Conant (who recreated Randy Skinner's Tony-nominated work for the road) and stepped up to the challenge willingly. They poured their heart and soul into this dance-heavy show, and it was evident from the audience; they executed the dancing flawlessly, and the end result was nothing short of awe-inspiring.

Not all was well in the heart of old New York, however, and it was mostly on the technical end. There were major sound issues — at times the orchestra was louder than the actors, and an actor's microphone shorted in the middle of the scene more than once. Towards the back of the Mullins Center, it was also difficult to hear both the performers and the orchestra at times. This was not the first performance of this show, and a sound check was probably done before the performance, so these mishaps were unacceptable, especially for a professional production.

The scenic design also could have been improved. There were dazzling sets in the New York production that evoked strong images of 1930s New York and added a little bit more pizzazz to the overall feel of the show. Granted, the production needs to be built to fit the various house sizes across the country, but the show relied on a plain red drop a few too many times to serve as a background.

"42nd Street" has a paper-thin story line, but the reason it works so well and has audience appeal is because it hits the high notes in all the right places. The major musical numbers in the show are marvelous, and they keep coming, one showstopper after another, right from the opening curtain and the "Audition." The highlight of the evening comes at the end of the show, during the title number, when a massive staircase appears on stage, and the entire ensemble performs a stunning tap routine on the giant, lit staircase in glitzy costumes. One can't help but sit and stare in awe at the dancers before them, giving it their all and performing a fantastic finale to a show full of outstanding performances.

The audience was on its feet cheering as soon as the show ended, and the company received a thunderous ovation at their curtain call. Smiles abounded outside Mullins Center after the show ended, a clear indication that "42nd Street" had provided a thoroughly entertaining evening for all. After such a phenomenal first performance "Broadway in Amherst" is sure to be a success, so get your tickets now for "Miss Saigon" in October and "Cats" in April.

now. However, that's the opposite case.

You don't say...

I have a special place in my heart for Andy Roddick, but I'm a big fan of all things U.S.A. I root for anyone donning the Red, White and Blue.

Moving on, let's talk about this Capital One Mascot Challenge. You were selected from a pretty competitive field, and I hear you were recently out on the west coast shooting some promos. How'd that go for you?

It was one of the best experiences of my life. Myself and the other 11 mascots have been all over the country promoting this competition, and everyone's been working real hard at it. We went out to Vancouver doing some filming all over the city, and then we went to Los Angeles to do a "Wheel of Fortune" kind of promo.

Did you buy any vowels?

Unfortunately, no. I can't talk.

What a shame.

Indeed.

Now, I'm going to name off a few of your competitors in this year's challenge. What I want you to do is a little word association. In other words, tell me the first thing that comes to your mind. Ready?

Bring it.

Aubie...

Kooky.

Joe Bruin...

California guy.

Sebastian...

Cool guy.

Big Jay...

Arrogant.

Smokey...

Seems pretty chill.

Cocky...

A little full of himself.

Herbie Husker...

Psycho. Just look at his smile.

Now, speaking of Herbie Husker, you're up against him as of this week, and as of this interview [Sept. 24, three hours before kickoff], you're behind him by 300 votes. That kind of paints a picture of you as an underdog. What are you going to do to rise to the occasion?

I have a lot of dedicated fans behind me. When this competition started out, we weren't in session yet, and the other schools were, so there was an obvious advantage. Each week I'm getting more and more votes, and as you'll see, I'll eventually be the leading vote-getter every week.

Tell me about the ladies. Is there a Miss Minuteman?

There is not. In past female relationships, they've always told me that I'm too into sports. I guess that's the demise of all my relationships. Besides, I have no time for relationships.

So why should people vote for you, Sam?

Clearly, I'm the best mascot out there. Just remember, if it weren't for the Minuteman, we'd all have British accents.

And finally, what are your expectations for the upcoming sports season?

A very good year. This will be the year we finally bring home another Commissioner's Cup.

Thank you for your time, Sam.

The pleasure is all mine. Thanks for having me. Go UMass!

The University of Massachusetts mascot, Sam the Minuteman, has lost all three of his matchups with other mascots during the Challenge.

That has something to do with junior strong safety James Ihedigbo's solid numbers, as he leads the A-10 with 5.5 sacks and 8.5 tackles for loss. Sophomore linebacker Jason Hatchell has been a solid presence to this point, too, registering 38 total tackles, tying him for third in the conference in just his first full season of duty at the position.

OFFENSE: B

Without question, the biggest gridiron story around the Pioneer Valley has been the emergence of redshirt freshman quarterback Liam Coen, who took over for senior Tim Day during the second half of the Maroon and White's 17-14 loss at Colgate on Sept. 10.

The rookie signal caller has improved during each of his three appearances on the field and has taken over the starting job in the process. He has been on the field for just under 10 quarters, but he has marched the offense to nine touchdown drives.

His most vital characteristic is his ability to hold onto the football and make smart plays while doing so. His first collegiate drive ended with an interception, but in the 27 drives since then, the Minutemen have turned the ball over zero times and outscored their opponents 68-6.

If Coen can continue with his statistical production – 52-of-79 for 696 yards and three touchdowns – the combination of UMass' offense and defense will be a very overwhelming obstacle for coaches to game plan for.

Complimenting Coen has been J.J. Moore, who is tied for the A-10 lead with 26 receptions, and Brandon London. The duo has totaled 57 receptions for 617 yards and three scores.

Coen isn't doing it by himself, though, as the two-headed running back combination of Steve Baylark and R.J. Cobbs has been very difficult to contain. Baylark has bulldozed his way for 390 yards and two touchdowns while the speedier, more versatile Cobbs – who has also lined up at receiver, thrown a pass, returned kicks, played cornerback and even performed selected punting duties during touchdown celebrations – has rushed for 118 yards and three touchdowns.

SPECIAL TEAMS: C

The good news is that junior punter Christian Koegel has remained consistent and continued his ways of last year. He leads the conference with an average of 44.1 yards per punt, and five of his 16 punts have been downed inside the 20-yard line.

The bad news is that freshman kicker Armando Cuko has struggled since his stellar play during training camp. He has missed his last four field goal attempts and is just 9-of-11 kicking extra points.

Senior Steve Costello has been flashy returning punts, breaking a few for big gains, including one that went for a touchdown against Rhode Island before being called back for a penalty.

Cobbs has also been a threat returning kicks, averaging 24.6 yards a return to help his average of 75 all-purpose yards per game.

OVERALL GRADE: B

The loss to Colgate shouldn't have happened, but no one will talk about it if the Minutemen can take down defending national champion James Madison on Oct. 15 and new No. 1 New Hampshire on Oct. 22, both games coming at home.

was the Yankees' ace who was bypassed by manager Bucky Harris in the showdown against the Red Sox the year before. Bob Porterfield lost the game, the Yankees were eliminated and Harris was fired. New manager Casey Stengel was not going to make the same mistake.

The Yankees scored a run in the first inning when Rizzuto led off with a triple into the left-field corner. Henrich's infield out delivered the run.

The Yankees' 1-0 lead stood up into the eighth inning. Then Joe McCarthy lifted Kinder for a pinch-hitter, enraging the starter. The move backfired. New York scored four more, the first on a home run by Henrich, the last three on a bases-loaded double by Coleman that eluded the dive of Al Zarilla in right field. It was not a hard-hit ball but, as players like to say, it looked like a line drive in the boxscore.

"It was a double," Coleman said. "I was thrown out at third. I wanted to draw the throw from the plate. I just kept going. I didn't want them to throw anybody out at the plate, so I just kept going, and the guy went for me instead of the plate. But the runs scored before I got there.

"For the first time in Casey's career, he didn't pinch-hit for me. I never got to hit in the clutch. He left me up there, and I used to tease Williams about this.

"He said, 'It was the worst hit I've ever seen,'" Coleman said. "I said, 'Ted, let me tell you something, you were out in the outfield at Yankee Stadium, it was bright and you were looking into the shadows.

What you saw was the cover of the ball fall. The core is still in orbit.'"

Red Sox infielder Johnny Pesky remembered it well. "Coleman was protecting the plate," Pesky said. "He hit a ball off the end of his bat over Bobby Doerr's head. You couldn't have thrown the ball out there any better."

Three outs away from elimination, Boston rallied in the ninth. Williams walked with one out and Stephens singled. Doerr hit a ball that eluded DiMaggio in center field and went for a triple. His aching body had betrayed him for the last time. With the pennant on the line, DiMaggio would not let that happen again. He took himself out of the game, trotted resolutely to the dugout, refusing to let his ailments interfere with the Yankees' quest anymore.

That cut the deficit down to one as the Minutemen seemed to settle down after the initial Terrier flurry. UMass controlled much of the action from that point on, keeping the ball in the BU end and getting it into the goal box on numerous occasions.

But UMass' poor start and difficult finish were too much to overcome.

"After the first 10 minutes, we played much better," Koch said. "The last six minutes we didn't play very well. Why? I don't know. Were we tired? Were we just scrambling, trying to get that tying goal? I don't know.

"In between those two periods of time, I thought we played pretty well," he added. "Each game we're trying to get better, and I thought we certainly played better today than we played in the last game. That's a good thing. The bad thing is society wants W's, and we got an L."

Bullen didn't start the game for UMass, making his first appearance in the 30th minute, and wasn't much of a factor in the loss. The captain has been pointless – and the team winless – since his return from injury.

KAREN WINGERD/COLLEGIAN

UMass freshman forward Mike DeSantis has one game-winning goal this year, but the Minutemen fell short of a win against BU yesterday.

With co-captain Craig Canavan out with a neck injury for the remainder of the season, Bullen will have to shoulder the burden for his team on his field.

In his best Vince Lombardi impression, Bullen offered his take on the UMass win drought.

"I think today, it was a much better showing from us," he said, echoing Koch. "We just ran out of time. We need to find a rhythm. Right now we just don't have a rhythm, we're just running out there and playing. We're hustling; we just need to get everything together."

Kwylan Jaggassar and senior back Jaime Bawden were selected to play for the Junior National teams of Trinidad and Tobago and Canada, respectively.

The event took place in March in San Juan, Puerto Rico. Canada finished fourth in the standings, being edged out by Chile for the bronze medal, while Trinidad and Tobago finished ninth.

Jaggassar, from Longdenville, Trinidad and Tobago, has started all 10 games this season and leads the Minutewomen in shots (22) and shots on goal (14). She has three points so far, with a goal and an assist.

Bawden, from Penticton, British Columbia, played for the Canadian Junior National team for the second year in a row. This year for the Minutewomen, Bawden has started all 10 games, recording one assist and a defensive save.

These two players, as well as senior midfielder Patricia Borneo, who played for Trinidad and Tobago in 2004, will try translating their international experience into NCAA Division I success.

PLAYER OF THE WEEK

This week the Atlantic 10 announced that Megan Glielmi, a senior forward for West Chester University, had earned player of the week honors with one of the highest single-game outputs in school history. On Friday, Glielmi scored four goals against Colgate, leading the Golden Rams to a 6-2 victory. The four goals, including a hat trick in the second half, marked the second-highest single-game total, and third-highest points total (eight), in school history.

Curry involved in DNA issue

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

CHICAGO – Until last spring, Eddy Curry was just another cautionary tale about kids drafted before their time.

The Chicago Bulls plucked the 6-foot-11 manchild out of high school in 2001, and he played his first three seasons more flabby than feared. But Curry showed up for the final year of his rookie contract 40 pounds lighter, converted some of that enormous potential into production, and made the Bulls think they might yet see a return on their considerable investment.

Then, before a March 30 game at Charlotte, Curry's heart skipped a few beats.

And then, a few more.

Nearly six months later, after a diagnosis of benign arrhythmia sent the 22-year-old scurrying to cardiologists from coast to coast and cost him the rest of the season, Curry finds himself in a fight with Bulls management his lawyer calls "far bigger than just the sports world."

At issue is the one-year, $5 million deal Chicago offered Curry, with this proviso: before he sets foot on the court, Curry must submit to DNA testing.

"Think about what's at stake here," said Alan Milstein, Curry's attorney. "As far as DNA testing, we're just at the beginning of that universe. Pretty soon, though, we'll know whether someone is predisposed to cancer, alcoholism, obesity, baldness and who knows what else.

"Hand that information to an employer," he added, "and imagine the implications. If the NBA were to get away with it, what about everyone else in this country looking for a job."

Chicago general manager John Paxson insists the Bulls can test Curry as part of a routine physical when training camp opens next week. Milstein calls that notion "flat-out wrong," and one already rejected by the players' union during the last collective bargaining agreement.

"Besides, there are privacy laws on the books, both state and federal, so there's no way they'd win," he added. "It makes you wonder what they're really worried about."

Milstein isn't the only one asking. Miami Heat forward Antoine Walker, like Curry a Chicago native, played pickup games alongside the youngster the last three weeks, and the dispute has him shaking his head.

"He looked fine, but a lot of teams seem concerned with risks nowadays. Maybe because the investments in players have become so big," Walker said. "Maybe the Bulls want Eddy long-term, and maybe this is some kind of bargaining chip. Either way, DNA testing is taking things a little too far."

Paxson says the team's only motive is to learn whether Curry's genetic makeup leaves him susceptible to cardiomyopathy, a heart condition that, combined with arrhythmia, could prove fatal. He said the DNA test was suggested by Barry Maron, a world-renowned specialist in hypertrophic cardiomyopathy, and complained the team's stance is unfairly being portrayed as though "we have some other motive.

"The bottom line," Paxson added, "is if Eddy had not had any incident and a doctor hadn't suggested it, we wouldn't be asking for it."

Curry has already been cleared to play by several prominent cardiologists, but he can't get disability insurance for his contract should he be sidelined again – or worse – with heart problems.

"There's one guy who isn't sure," Curry told the Chicago Tribune on Tuesday, making his first comments in a while. "I can live with that because of what the other doctors say."

If this was a private medical dispute, chances are the hype would be less and the stakes lower. But because of the liability issues, Curry's high profile, and the value a healthy, motivated big man can command in the NBA marketplace, it's become an expensive, mean-spirited mess.

Besides arguing over medial opinions and the science underpinning DNA testing, both camps have recently invoked the deaths of former Celtics star Reggie Lewis and Loyola Marymount's Hank Gathers. Both suffered from hypertrophic cardiomyopathy when they collapsed and died; what the Bulls and Curry's advisers disagree over is whether he is treading the same path.

Weekend series will provide flashbacks of Sox and Yanks

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

Throughout the rich fabric of baseball history, the Boston Red Sox and New York Yankees keep showing up, their seasons frequently intertwined, their destinies often determined in head-to-head showdowns.

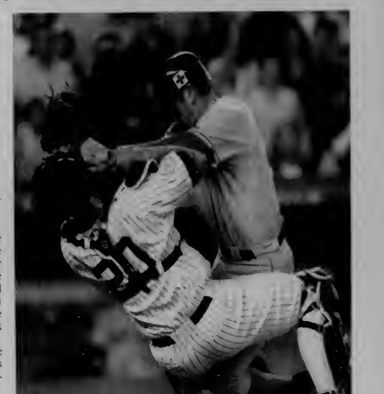
From Death Valley in Yankee Stadium to the Green Monster in Fenway Park, a litany of dramatic confrontations often has defined their seasons.

The characters change. Where once there were the Yankee Clipper and the Splendid Splinter, and later Dent and Yaz, now we have A-Rod and Big Papi. Instead of Raschi pitching against Kinder, the Yankees have the Big Unit and the Red Sox have Boomer.

It all adds up to the same thing – one final series between two old rivals to settle the season's accounts.

They'll do it again this weekend at Boston, three games to decide the AL East championship, the Yankees and Red Sox going mano-a-mano.

Perfect.



Only once before it did come down to this, the Red Sox and Yankees playing a final regular-season series for first place.

In 1949, their fates came down to the last two games of the season. Boston held a one-game lead with two to play at Yankee Stadium. The math was simple for the Red Sox: win a game and win the pennant. The challenge was a bit more daunting for the Yankees, who had no margin for error. Lose one and they were done.

A year earlier, the Yankees, Red Sox and Cleveland Indians were locked in a three-way battle for an AL pennant that was uncomplicated by divisions. With one eye on the scoreboard and how Cleveland was doing, Boston beat New York in the season's final two games. That knocked the Yankees out of the race and forced a playoff with the Indians that Cleveland won.

Now, a year later, the Indians were out of the picture. This showdown would be strictly a two-team affair. Nobody would have to watch the scoreboard this time.

The Red Sox had chased the Yankees all season, gaining the lead a weekend earlier by sweeping New York in Fenway Park. Then they went on the road for their final five games, three in Washington against the hapless Senators and the final two at Yankee Stadium. When they arrived in New York, the Red Sox were still clinging to that slender one-game lead.

Red Sox catcher and team captain Jason Varitek collides with Yankees catcher Jorge Posada at the plate during a game on Sept. 9.

The two teams were crowded with superstars.

Boston had MVP Ted Williams, who batted .343 and led the league with a career-best 43 home runs and tied teammate Vern Stephens with 159 RBIs, and a pitching staff headed by 25-game winner Mel Parnell and Ellis Kinder, who won 23.

The Yankees' Joe DiMaggio had missed the first 65 games of the season with a heel injury but hit .346 when he returned to the lineup. New York's pitching staff was anchored by 21-game winner Vic Raschi, Allie Reynolds, who won 17, and reliever Joe Page, an important bullpen presence.

Boston jumped in front in the first inning of the opener against Reynolds on a sacrifice fly by Stephens. They were back for three more runs in the third, capitalizing on five walks, three by Reynolds and two with the bases loaded against Page.

Now the Red Sox were leading 4-0 and the Yankees' season seemed to be slipping away. But New York wasn't done yet. DiMaggio, honored before the game but pale and weak from a two-week battle with viral pneumonia, doubled in the fourth and scored on a single by Hank Bauer. Johnny Lindell singled Bauer to third and Jerry Coleman's sacrifice fly brought him home. Boston's lead had been cut in half.

In the Yankees fifth, Phil Rizzuto and Tommy Henrich singled. Yogi Berra's single made it 4-3 and Henrich came home on a double play, tying the score.

It was still 4-all in the eighth when Lindell, a distinctly peripheral character on a team of All-Stars, hit a two-out home run against reliever Joe Dobson to give the Yankees the lead and ultimately the win.

With the two teams tied for first place, the pennant would come down to one last game with Kinder going against Raschi.

The matchup equaled the occasion. Kinder had a 7-2 lifetime record against New York and beaten the Yankees four times that season. Raschi

Minutemen dogged by Terriers

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

After two games of scoreless offense and a two-game losing streak – both 2-0 losses at the hands of Harvard and New Hampshire – the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-6-0) finally got on the board against Boston University yesterday at Rudd Field.

It wasn't enough, however, to beat the Terriers, who scored two goals in the first 10 minutes of action, as the Minutemen lost their sixth game of the season, 3-1.

Junior Nick Billman started in goal for UMass, replacing redshirt freshman Zack Simmons, who went down with an ankle injury in practice on Tuesday. Billman got off to a rough start, letting in goals at both the 3:29 and the 7:03 marks in the first half.

Both should have been deflating for the Minutemen, as they hadn't seen victory — or the back of the net, for that matter — in two straight games. However, the consensus was that the UMass play was much improved since its match against Harvard on Sunday.

"I think we did real well in the effort to try to come back," senior captain Oral Bullen said. "I didn't think the two goals put our heads down too much."

The game could have easily gotten away from Bullen and company, as the two BU scores were tallied quickly and, it seemed, effortlessly.

The first of the Terrier goals came when BU's Neil Hlavaty, an irreverent player whose taunting prompted yellow cards from sophomores Doug Rappaport and Kenneth Cook later in the game, broke free down the left side of the field and turned the corner toward the net.

He fired a pass toward the middle of the goal box that Sedrick Chin put in the top-right corner of the net past the diving Billman.

The next BU strike came just 3:24 later, as a shot from a BU forward hit the crossbar and bounced backwards in front of the net. Billman jumped to try to catch the ball before it hit the crossbar and stumbled into the goal, leaving the Terrier's Roland Erichman with an open net. He headed the ball in and gave BU the quick 2-0 lead.

After a 3-5 start, UMass coach Sam Koch was working on offensive adjustments with the team, such as limiting turnovers and not dribbling too much. Yesterday's match was an opportunity to improve on these aspects of the game, but they barely had time to think before the Terriers had two goals and they were staring their sixth loss in the face.

"We were behind the eight ball to start," Koch said. "We gave up that early goal. The second goal was a mistake, and the third goal was a mistake. We're trying to get the ball into dangerous positions, and instead we're dribbling. They stuff us and ram it down our throats.

"The good thing is that we correct those mistakes and we prevent the other teams from having those kinds of chances and it's a different ball game," he added. "There were a lot of positives by our negatives. It's not like they outplayed us; we outplayed ourselves, and that's a good thing."

The other silver lining was the Minutemen's ability to score, which had eluded them for awhile.

UMass' first goal in 195 minutes of action came in the 30th minute of the first half when Cook headed a pass from freshman Prince Ofosu past the BU keeper. The sequence began with a corner kick from the left side by sophomore Matt Lemire, whose pass was headed and eventually found Ofosu at the other side of the net.

UMass sophomore midfielder Douglas Rappaport has contributed two assists through nine games this season, but he was held scoreless during yesterday's 3-1 loss to the hands of Boston University at Rudd Field.

Preliminary grades are in: UMass passes

Jeff Howe

Dull moments have been few and far between so far for the Massachusetts football team in 2005.

Whether UMass is in the midst of a quarterback controversy, causing a record-breaking three safeties, or turning the ball over eight times in 35 minutes, there has been a lot to talk about inside the locker room at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

And with a third of its schedule in the books, the Minutemen (3-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) are heading into their lone off-week-end of the season.

Though there is one more blemish on their record than they probably expected after their first four games, optimism is still thick in the air that has thinned out since the passing of summer.

Even still, with seven games remaining on the team's dinner plate, the Minutemen cannot afford to lose any more than two of those if they plan on qualifying for the NCAA Division I-AA Tournament.

Without further ado, here is a progress report through the course of the first month. To keep things moving at as unorthodox of a pace as possible, let's start with the defense, the team's backbone.

Defense: A+

Fifteen total points in four games. That's it.

The group, which is led by smothering shut-down defensive backs, relentless tackling by its linebackers and a solid push from its linemen, has kept scoreboard operators at bay by allowing a mere three field goals and just a single touchdown – on a one-yard quarterback sneak by Richmond's Stacy Tutt.

The defensive unit has been opportunistic, too, causing nine fumbles, recovering three, and intercepting six passes. The Minutemen have only allowed an impressive 93 passing yards per game — an Atlantic 10 best — along with 91.5 rushing yards per game. Oh, and their opponents have successfully converted just 16 third downs – on 61 opportunities.

UMass' biggest defensive advantage is its ability to play about 25 different players without coach Don Brown even batting an eyelash. While opposing offenses are sticking with their main corps of players, the Minutemen are constantly making substitutions, keeping players fresh for 60 minutes.

Billman takes over old job in net

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-6) was thrown another curveball before its match against Boston University (3-4-1 0-0-1 America East) yesterday at Rudd Field in Amherst.

During practice on Tuesday, freshman goalkeeper Zack Simmons went down with an ankle injury. Simmons had his ankle heavily taped and needed the use of crutches after practice.

The loss of the Minutemen's most consistent player prompted UMass coach Sam Koch to turn to junior Nick Billman to man the pipes for the Maroon and White.

Until yesterday, Billman had not seen any game action in 2005 as a result of a separated shoulder he suffered over the summer. Before the injury, he was slated to be the starting keeper this season.

The separated shoulder occurred when Billman went for a save while he was playing for his club team. He came down awkwardly on his shoulder and knew immediately it had separated from the joint.

Simmons, a walk-on, stepped in for Billman and has performed above everybody's expectations.

The freshman is among the top-five in three Atlantic 10 categories, including saves (42), saves per game (5.25), and goals against average (1.36).

Wednesday's 3-1 loss was the first regular season game action Billman had seen since UMass' 4-1 loss to Duquesne on Oct. 31 of last year.

In that game Billman allowed all four Duquesne goals on 14 shots. He registered two saves during the loss, too.

Billman denied having any pregame jitters before his first start in almost a year.

"Not really. Obviously, there are a few butterflies every time you step on the field," Billman said. "But I've done this for two years before this, so I was ready. It was good to be back out there, but I just wish we could have pulled out a win."

Last year, Billman showed a lot of promise as an up-and-coming sophomore. In 2004, he made a total of 48 saves with a .686 save percentage. He also allowed an average of 2.04 goals per game.

A 3-1 loss was not exactly what Billman or Koch had in mind for the veteran's first start of the season.

"He was under some early pressure that's pretty tough for the game," Koch said. "He's a good keeper; unfortunately, he's not going to save everything."

The Minutemen were put in an early hole as BU was able to get two shots past Billman in the first seven minutes of play. The first was scored by Sedrick Chin on a rocket from 10 yards out. Roland Erlichman headed the ball home off of a rebound for the Terriers' second goal.

On a positive note, Billman did make two saves in the game, including a crucial one in the second half that kept the score close for the Minutemen.

Billman was disappointed with the end result of his first start but remains optimistic.

"It's obviously not the way I'd have liked to start, giving up three tough goals, especially two in the first seven minutes," Billman said. "Other than that, I thought my distribution was good, and the team responded well after we got settled down."

Both player and coach were quick to disperse any thoughts that Billman may have been rushed into action before the shoulder was ready.

"The shoulder feels good, real good," Billman said. "I've been practicing for quite a while now."

Koch also felt his keeper was ready to go.

"It was of those things where Zach was hurt so we go with the guy that we feel is a good keeper," Koch said. "I've got no doubts about how well Billman can play. He's proven to us that he's a good keeper."

A-10 play looms closer

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts field hockey team will face one of its final non-conference opponents tomorrow in Syracuse, and with that in mind it is time for them to look ahead at the Atlantic 10.

As conference play looms closer, no team has separated itself as the clear-cut leader of the pack, with four teams tied for the A-10 lead with five wins. However, these wins are of only marginal importance as of Oct. 7, when the Minutewomen (3-7) take on 2004 Atlantic 10 champion No. 19 Richmond (5-4), which defeated UMass 3-1 in last year's conference championship.

Pulling ahead

Despite a marginal 5-4 record, the Richmond Spiders are ranked at No. 19 in the STX/ National Field Hockey Coaches Association Top-20 Poll, the highest ranking for an Atlantic 10 team.

The Spiders faced stiff competition early this season, as they defeated No. 18 William and Mary 2-1 in double overtime, but has since fallen to No. 19 James Madison and No. 7 Old Dominion, dropping their ranking three spots from No. 16 to 19. Their next game pits them on the road against No. 1 Wake Forest, the three-time defending national champions.

Richmond relies heavily on strong defensive play and consistent performances by senior goalkeeper Michelle Schwartz. The Spiders lead the Atlantic 10 in both goals allowed and goals allowed per game, due greatly to the play of Schwartz. However, they are only fourth in goals scored and goals per game.

The team is also led by sophomore midfielder Shannon Taylor, the conference's reining player of the week. Taylor leads the Spiders with five goals, including four game-winners, and a total of 13 points. The sophomore also scored the game-winning goal against William and Mary in double overtime.

Playing abroad

On the UMass campus, two players leading the team this year represented their home countries in the Pan American Junior Women's Field Hockey Championships, which took place in the spring. Junior back

Question-and-answer session with Sam the Minuteman

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

It's that time of year again – or then again, maybe it's not.

For the first time ever, the University of Massachusetts' own Sam the Minuteman has been named to Capital One's All-America Mascot team, and with it moves on to the 12-mascot pool called the "Capital One Mascot Challenge." In the challenge, Sam faces off against a different opponent every week, with the winner determined by the number of fan votes.

Having lost to Joe Bruin (UCLA), Smokey (Tennessee), and Herbie Husker (Nebraska) to kick off the challenge, Sam is bouncing back nicely. As of 4 p.m. yesterday, Sam was ahead of Aubie (Auburn) by over 10,000 votes. He will need it to stay afloat for when playoff time comes.

Nonetheless, it's been an interesting rise to the limelight for this loveable mascot. I had the chance to catch up with Sam at McGuirk Alumni Stadium last Saturday, speaking through an interpreter, to talk about his rise here and the Mascot Challenge itself.

Brendan Hall: So, how did you first get into being a mascot?

Sam: Well, I was around in 1972 when we had a conflict about the team name being called the "Redmen." Being ready in a minute's notice, of course, I already understood the heritage of this great Commonwealth, and I made a big push to be the mascot here. Thankfully, they chose me.

Now you're a great war hero. What was your favorite battle?

Definitely the Boston Tea Party. It was a real group effort, I tell you. We all ran onto the ship, and you know how the rest went.

And as far as UMass sporting events go, what's been your favorite so far?

The Final Four [basketball, in 1996]. It was just an absolutely amazing experience for me. The atmosphere at the Meadowlands was just incredible.

Now tell us about the commercial you did a while back with Andy Roddick. What was that whole experience like?

Well, actually, the end of the commercial changed. Originally, I was supposed to grab the racket, and the ball just falls to the ground. But after a couple takes, the producer decided that ending lacked punch. They decided to tell me to grab the ball instead. After the first take, everyone cracked up, and we went with that ending.

What's that done for you as far as exposure?

People think I hate tennis

See SAM on page 10

Sam the Minuteman admits that he had his most fun during UMass 1996 run to the Final Four, but he also says his love of sports is the main reason there is currently no Mrs. Sam the Minuteman.

Fire threatens south California

By Jeff Wilson
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A wind-whipped 17,000-acre wildfire raced across hills and canyons along the city's northwestern edge Thursday, threatening homes and forcing hundreds of people to evacuate.

Some 3,000 firefighters aided by aircraft struggled to protect ridge top houses along the Los Angeles-Ventura county line, a rugged, brushy landscape west of Los Angeles' San Fernando Valley. Officials said the blaze was 5 percent contained as it burned toward such communities as Thousand Oaks, Simi Valley, Calabasas and Agoura.

Numerous homes were evacuated in nine areas, and the Red Cross reported 500 people were staying at five of its shelters.

At least one home and five other structures were lost, but 2,000 buildings had been saved by firefighters, Los Angeles County Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky said.

"We are guardedly optimistic, if the weather cooperates, if the public cooperates," Yaroslavsky said. "This may end well for all of us, but weather is unpredictable in these parts and everyone needs to be on guard."

Temperatures were in the high 90s and conditions were dry. Some gusts were reported on the fire lines, but there was no reappearance of the strong winds from the interior that fanned a small brush fire into a conflagration on Wednesday.

The cause of the fire was not immediately known. Historically, some fires in the region have turned and burned through the Santa Monica Mountains to Malibu and the Pacific Ocean. Authorities said residents took evacuation orders seriously in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"I wasn't going to get stupid about it. There was only one way out, and it was getting real hot," said Jeff Johns, 48.

About 45 evacuees gathered at Canoga Park High School in the San Fernando Valley, where the Red Cross had set up cots and provided meals.

"Our house is still OK, but, oh, God, it's not a good feeling," said Phil Goldenberg, 53, who was at the school's gym with his wife and son.

Amherst college opens Josephine exhibit

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

The mysterious Empress Josephine, wife to the famous Emperor Napoleon, is captured in Bernard Chevallier's new exhibit in Amherst College, "The Empress Josephine: Art and Royal Identity."

Yesterday, Amherst College's Mead Art Museum officially opened its fall exhibition entitled "The Empress Josephine: Art and Royal Identity," an event dedicated to the art of Josephine, wife of Napoleon. To a crowd of about 60 people including Francois Gauthier, the consul general of France in Boston, an hour long lecture was given by Bernard Chevallier, director of the Rueil-Malmaison Museum in France.

Entertaining the audience, Chevallier presented the attendees with 43 slides and a discussion of Malmaison, the art Josephine collected and other interests the empress had. This would include the 580 shoes Josephine bought in 1809.

Malmaison was home to Josephine and Napoleon until their divorce in 1809, and after Josephine lived there alone. It was sold 12 years after her death, and in 1904, this chateau was turned into a museum.

"At the time, it was only 30 minutes from Paris," Chevallier said. "Now it's one hour because of traffic."

The exhibition was driven by Carol Solomon Keifer, who spent several years researching, obtaining money and finding the appropriate art for this show which includes 90 pieces of art, 30 of which came from Malmaison.

According to Chevallier, this is the first time such a wide range of art from the United States, Canada and Europe have "been in such a place."

"There have been many exhibitions devoted to the subject of Napoleon," Keifer said. "And so I thought it would be interesting to focus more on Josephine."

But, the exhibit does more than just highlight the empress. "What's interesting in this exhibition is that it's focused on just a part of her life," Chevallier said. "It is not a biographical exhibition. This exhibition shows what role she had in the arts."

Recently, according to Chevallier and Keifer, much attention has been focused on rethinking who this empress was. Josephine has long been known for the great love story she shared with Napoleon, but now scholars are reexamining the role she also played in Napoleon's political affairs and collecting for the sciences.

In a separate interview, Chevallier elaborated on Josephine's collections. "More than 200 plants grew up at Malmaison for the first time in Europe. They came from South Africa, from North America, from everywhere in the world."

According to Chevallier, she also collected animals, including black swans and kangaroos from

Activist ends use of mines

Nobel Peace Prize laureate and human rights activist Jody Williams told a Campus Center auditorium audience yesterday afternoon that "emotion without action is irrelevant."

The University of Massachusetts Center for Public Policy and Administration (CPPA) organized the event and awarded Williams with the center's annual public service award.

The CPPA is non-partisan and describes its mission as improving public policy decisions and governance through education and research.

Last year's award recipient was former Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis.

Williams, 54, who is the chief spokesperson for the International Campaign to Ban Landmines, which she founded in 1992, spoke of her experiences and the nature of activism, stressing the importance of individual efforts toward a cause.

"If everyone found a way to volunteer a little bit or to give back a little bit, what a world we'd have," she said.

The ICBL won a victory in 1997 when, with the cooperation of national governments, non-governmental organizations, the United Nations and the Red Cross, an international treaty banning antipersonnel landmines was signed by 122 countries in two days. Currently, 147 countries are a party to the treaty.

"It's the first time that a conventional weapon that every single fighting force has used for 100 years has been banned, and we banned it," she said.

The ICBL estimates that there are between 15,000 and 20,000 landmine related casual ties every year. Many victims are not killed by the weapons but are left without limbs and with other disfigurements.

Countries with considerable landmine problems include Cambodia, Afghanistan, India and Iraq, among others.

Nobel Peace Prize winner, Jody Williams condemned United States funding of El Salvador's ongoing civil war in the 1980's.

Williams explained to the crowd how she came to activism a decade after her college graduation. After getting involved during the 1980s with a group who condemned United States funding of El Salvador's ongoing civil war, her activist spark — though she didn't consciously label herself as an activist — was kindled. She recalled being surprised when labeled by the term for the first time 11 years later.

Gambling, a weakness for college students

By Chase Mitchell
The Auburn Plainsman

AUBURN, Ala. — Like a growing number of college students, Auburn University sophomore Nathan Krauss loves nothing more than sitting down with a few of his closest friends to play the hottest card game in the nation, Texas Hold 'Em poker.

The pre-dentistry major said he usually plays low-stakes games with his buddies, but sometimes they organize tournaments, where as many as 20 people show up to play for pots as high as $300.

Krauss and his friends play Hold 'Em as much as possible — when they're not busy with school, that is.

"It's been a little rough, just because classes and homework and stuff have been getting in the way," he said. "But over the summer we played every day."

Sometimes their games stretch into the early morning hours, but Krauss said the lack of sleep hasn't affected his grades.

"I don't let it," he said. "We've all stayed up too late playing poker, but we balance it out."

Krauss said he enjoys the game because it's fast and easy. He was introduced to it in high school, and now he likes watching professional poker players win big money on TV. Luckily for him, there are plenty of shows to choose from.

A seemingly endless stream of high-rated programs, such as ESPN's "World Series of Poker," the Travel Channel's "World Poker Tour," Bravo's "Celebrity Poker Challenge" and the prime-time drama "TILT" have saturated the airwaves in recent years, giving viewers a closer look at the world of Texas Hold 'Em and pushing it into the pop-culture spotlight.

Barry Burkhart, professor and chair of the psychology department, said he thinks the game's constant glamorization is partly responsible for getting college students hooked.

Roberts sworn in as Supreme Court Chief Justice

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — John Glover Roberts Jr. won confirmation as the 17th chief justice of the United States on Thursday, charged by the Senate with the responsibility of leading the Supreme Court through turbulent social issues for generations to come.

He was being sworn in at the White House later in the day by Justice John Paul Stevens, the court's senior member and acting chief justice since the death of William H. Rehnquist.

The Senate voted 78-22 to confirm Roberts — a 50-year-old U.S. appeals judge from the Washington suburb of Chevy Chase, Md. — as Rehnquist's successor. All 55 of the Senate's majority Republicans, and half of the Democrats, voted for Roberts.

Underscoring the rarity of a chief justice's confirmation, senators answered the roll by standing one by one at their desks as their names were called, instead of voting and leaving the chamber.

"Chief Justice Roberts is someone that the American people will be proud of for many years to come," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said after the vote.

Roberts is the first new Supreme Court justice since 1994. Before becoming a federal judge, he was one of the nation's best appellate lawyers, arguing 39 cases.

He won 25 of those cases.

President Bush joined Roberts, former Sen. Fred Thompson and White House staff in the Roosevelt Room to watch the vote. After the 50th vote was cast, McClellan said Roberts "nodded and expressed his appreciation in a very humble way. And the president shook his hand and congratulated him."

After lunch with the president, Roberts was being sworn in quickly so he could take his seat for the new court session Monday. All Supreme Court justices except Antonin Scalia were expected to be at the White House ceremony, along with Bush and several Cabinet members and senators.

Under Roberts, justices will tackle issues like assisted suicide, campaign finance law and abortion this year, with questions about religion, same-sex marriage, the government's war on terrorism and human cloning looming in the future.

"With the confirmation of John Roberts, the Supreme Court will embark upon a new era in its history, the Roberts era," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "And for many years to come, long after many of us have left public service, the Roberts court will be deliberating on some of the most difficult and fundamental questions of U.S. law."

Twenty-two Democrats opposed Roberts, saying he could turn out to be as conservative as justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the Supreme Court anchors on the right.

"At the end of the day, I have too many unanswered questions about the nominee to justify confirming him to this lifetime seat," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Anti-abortion and abortion rights activists both have their hopes pinned on Roberts, a former government lawyer in the Reagan and first Bush administrations. While Roberts is solidly conservative and his wife, Jane, volunteers for Feminists for Life, both sides were eager to see how he will vote on abortion cases.

Judge John Roberts is sworn in by Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens, as the 17th Chief Justice.

Giant squid photographed in Philippine sea

By Lisa Silverman
Associated Press

TOKYO — When a nearly 20-foot long tentacle was hauled aboard his research ship, Tsunemi Kubodera knew he had something big. Then it began sucking on his hands. But what came next excited him most — hundreds of vivid photos of a rare giant squid in its natural habitat deep undersea.

Observing a giant squid in the wild for the first time, Kubodera's team took photos of a 26-foot-long, purplish-red sea monster attacking its bait nearly 3,000 feet undersea, then struggling for more than four hours to get free. The squid pulled so hard on the line that held the shrimp bait that it severed one of its own tentacles.

"It was quite an experience to feel the still-functioning tentacle on my hand," Kubodera, a researcher with Japan's National Science Museum, said in an interview with The Associated Press. "But the photos were even better."

The mysterious giant squids, formally called Architeuthis, have for centuries been the stuff of legend, appearing in the myths of ancient Greece or attacking a submarine in Jules Verne's "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea." But they had previously been seen only when they were caught in fishing nets or washed ashore dead or dying — never alive in their natural habitat. But the Japanese team, capping a three-year effort, filmed the creature in September of last year, finding what one researcher called "the holy grail" of deep sea animals.

The results were not announced until this week, when they were published in Wednesday's issue of the British journal, the Proceedings of the Royal Society B: Biological Sciences. Kyoichi Mori, of the Ogasawara Whale Watching Association, co-authored the study.

Largely because of the sheer difficulty of finding the deep-sea dwelling giant, the team's photos were cheered by researchers around the world.

"That's getting footage of a real sea monster," said Randy Kochevar, a deep sea biologist with the Monterey Bay Aquarium in California. "Nobody has been able to observe a large giant squid where it lives. There are people who said it would never be done. It's really an incredible accomplishment."

The photos — taken with strobe lights at 30 second intervals — also shed some new light on the mysterious squid's behavior.

"We think it is a much more active predator than was previously thought," Kubodera said Wednesday. "It had previously been seen as more lethargic, and not as strong."

In the pictures, the squid's tentacles can be seen stretching out toward the bait, grasping it and pulling away in a ball. It is then seen struggling to get itself free of the jig attached to the line under the remote-controlled camera. The struggle took place at a depth of between 2,000 and 3,000 feet. Kubodera said catching the squid on film was the result of 10 years of sleuthing.

He added that he had some help — from a population of sperm whales.

"We knew that they fed on the squid, and we knew when and how deep they dived," he said. "So we used them to lead us to the squid." Kubodera and his team found the squid about 10 miles off the remote island of Chichijima, which is about 600 miles southeast of Tokyo. They had been conducting expeditions in the area for about three years before they actually succeeded in making their first contact at 9:15 a.m. on Sept. 20 last year.

"We were very lucky," he said. "A lot of research went into it, but still, others have tried and not succeeded."

Giant squid are the world's largest invertebrates, and can grow to a length of 53 feet. Kubodera said the one he caught on camera was likely an adult female. He said the giant squid's tentacle would not grow back, but the squid's life was not in danger.

New Zealand's leading authority on the giant squid, marine biologist Steve O'Shea, praised the Japanese team's feat.

"Through sheer ... determination the guy has gone on and done it," said O'Shea, chief marine scientist at the Auckland University of Technology, who is not linked to the Japanese research.

O'Shea said he hopes to capture juvenile giant squid and grow them in captivity. He captured 17 of them five years ago but they died.

In photo from Japan's national science museum, a 26-foot-long Architeuthis attacks bait hung by a white rope, left 900 yards deep off the coast of Japan's Bonin Islands.

Bus operator burned in Rita investigation

By Matt Curry
Associated Press

DALLAS — The company whose bus caught fire last week, killing 23 nursing-home patients fleeing Hurricane Rita, was the subject of complaints by three people in 2002 who said its vehicles reeked of fuel and were in disrepair, according to state records.

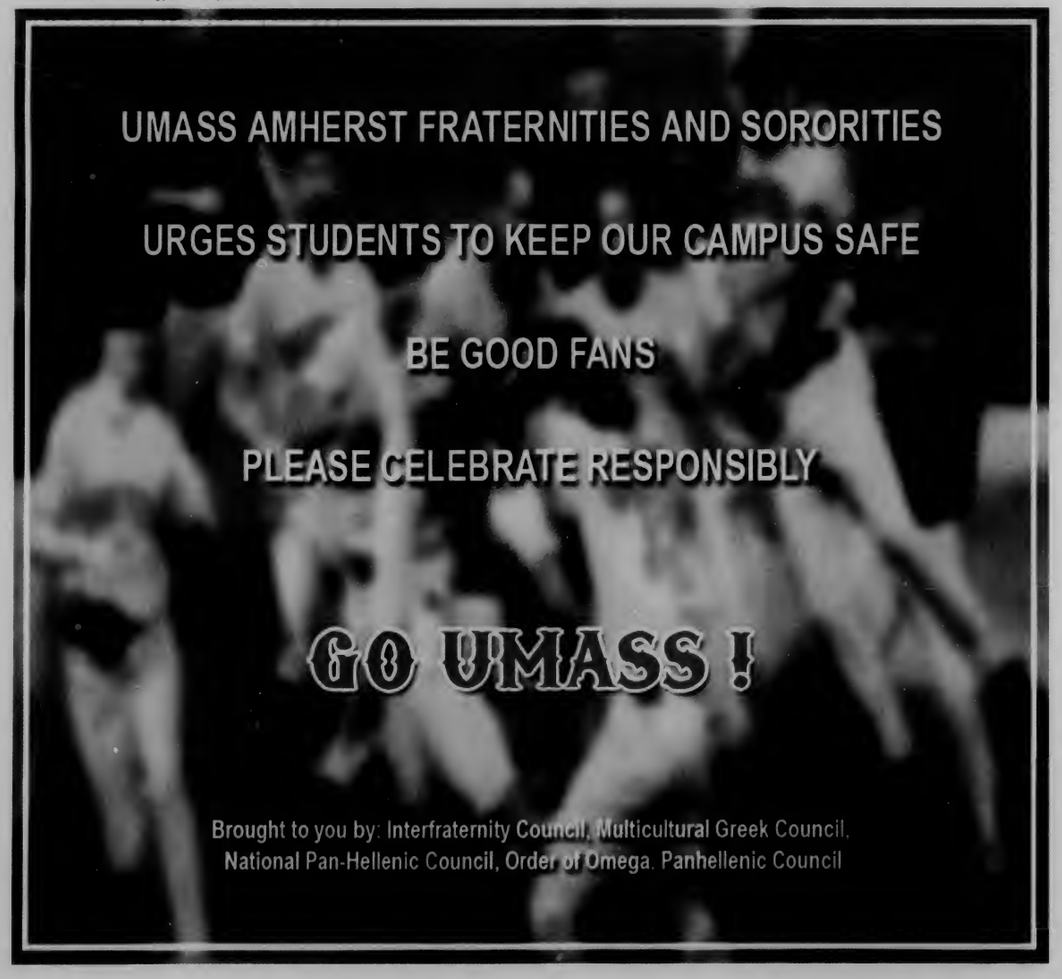
The complaints against Global Tours and Charters, now Global Limo Inc., preceded a state investigation that found several violations, including a failure to keep records of vehicle inspections and maintenance.

The state told the company to comply with regulations but did not impose any penalties against it, according to records released Wednesday by the Texas Department of Public Safety. A month after the 2002 review, Global owner James H. Maples told the state Transportation Department he had made the necessary changes.

On Sept. 23, a group of 37 nursing home residents was being moved from the Houston area because of Rita's approach when their Global bus caught fire while stuck in traffic near Dallas. A series of explosions — probably medical oxygen canisters igniting — fueled the flames and trapped most of the occupants.

Investigators have said the fire could have been caused by mechanical problems, possibly with the brakes.

The bus had been pressed into service to carry residents of the Brighton Gardens nursing home out of Rita's path. It had gone out of service in July after its registration expired, but was allowed back on the road because of a waiver signed by Gov. Rick Perry to aid relief efforts.



The National Transportation Safety Board is investigating the cause of the tragedy. Since the explosion, the Transportation Department has issued an advisory to the bus industry about the safe transport of oxygen containers.

No one answered the phone at the bus company's offices Thursday morning. Mark Cooper, an attorney for Global, did not immediately return calls.

One of the 2002 complaints was written by Donald Spotts of Weslaco and sent to the Texas attorney general and other state officials. Spotts wrote that there was a "very strong odor of diesel fumes" on a Global bus that was carrying 48 senior citizens from Weslaco to Corpus Christi. Many of the passengers were coughing and wheezing both ways on the 320-mile round trip, he wrote.

In another complaint, a man named Ross Gunning claimed one of Global's buses was "swaying all over the road." Another complainant identified as Sara Martinez wrote that most of the company's buses had oil and air leaks.

A 2002 state inspection found several violations, including failure to implement an alcohol or drug testing program, failure to retain inspection and maintenance records for the proper period of time and failure to retain evidence of a brake inspector's qualifications.

Harrasment reported in National Guard survey

By Lolita C. Baldor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Six in 10 women who have served in the National Guard and Reserves say they were sexually harassed or assaulted, but less than one-quarter reported it and many who did were encouraged to drop their complaints, a government survey says.

The survey by the Department of Veterans Affairs found that nearly half of the women who responded said the incidents occurred while they were on duty.

One in 10 said she was raped, nearly 60 percent said they were verbally harassed and the rest of the reports were for other types of incidents, according to the survey, which was released by Democratic members of Congress.

In addition, more than 27 percent of male Guard and Reserve veterans said they experienced some type of sexual harassment or assault — most often by other men.

"I am releasing the report, which I have obtained through other sources, to shine a light on a serious problem that the White House wants to hide in the shadows," said Rep. Lane Evans of Illinois, the top Democrat on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Defense Department spokesman Roger Kaplan said the survey "tells us that we were correct in placing greater emphasis on combating sexual assault and sexual harassment in the active and reserve components."

He said more recent surveys show lower rates of harassment and sexual assaults in the military.

Interviewed between August 2002 and March 2003 were men and women who had completed their service. No one in the Guard or Reserves at the time of the research was questioned.

The study surveyed those in the Guard and Reserves from 1950 to 2000; most of the 4,000 respondents served in the 1980s and 1990s.

The survey echoes oft-repeated concerns about sexual harassment and assault in the military. In a report last year, the Pentagon acknowledged problems in preventing, treating and investigating sexual assaults on military personnel.

As a result, the Defense Department instituted broad new policies this year, requiring additional training and providing for confidential reporting of assaults and harassment by victims.

"We really are hammering into everybody that unless the answer is yes, the default setting for having sexual relations is no," Kaplan said.

The report noted that 78 percent of the women and 90 percent of the men did not report the incidents, and half or less of those who did said some action was taken to correct the situation. About 58 percent of the men who reported the incident and 66 percent of the women said they were encouraged to drop the matter.

Also, less than 14 percent of the men and 28 percent of the women sought help or treatment, and only about 1 percent went to the VA for that help.

VA officials did not release the study, saying it was still in the final stages of review.

Department spokesman Scott Hogenson, explaining the nearly two-year delay in releasing the study, said officials were checking the facts.

He said the agency has $13 million for counseling services for sexual trauma victims in the budget that starts Saturday.

"We do everything we can to encourage veterans to seek the treatment they need," he said.

'Fighting Sioux' appeal denied

By Tessa Sandstrom
Dakota Student (U. of North Dakota)

University of North Dakota President Charles Kupchella's steps in the past month to reconcile differences over the "Fighting Sioux" nickname controversy have only brought him back to where he began. The National Collegiate Athletic Association staff review committee announced Wednesday that it denied Kupchella's appeal submitted nearly a month ago to have UND removed from the list of 18 nationwide schools with "hostile and abusive" nicknames.

In a statement released by Bernard Franklin, the NCAA Senior Vice-President for Governance and Membership said that though UND "maintained that its logo and nickname are used with consummate respect, the position of the namesake tribes and those affected by the hostile or abusive environment that the nickname and logo create take precedence."

The decision came only a day after a long-planned meeting between President Kupchella and the Spirit Lake Nation was cancelled, postponing efforts to discuss and come to an agreement over the Sioux logo. The NCAA took information and resolutions against the logo submitted by the Standing Rock and Sisseton-Wahpeton Sioux Tribes into consideration when reviewing the appeal. The resolution composed by all five North Dakota tribes at the United Tribes Council Summit on Sept. 8 was also reviewed. NCAA inquiries for more information from the Spirit Lake Nation, however, went unanswered.

Kupchella said Wednesday at a news conference that the university would begin working on a new appeal to be submitted to the Executive Council of the NCAA. If this appeal fails, another will go to the President's Council and if necessary, to a "court of law." Kupchella was not surprised by the decision, but was confused and disappointed after schools with nicknames like "Chippewas," "Seminoles" and "Utes" were removed from the list and not seen as hostile, while the Sioux name is.

Kupchella was critical of the NCAA's basis that these other schools had "special relationships" to the tribes and UND does not. Kupchella upholds that UND does, in fact, have a "special relationship" with North Dakota's tribes that exceeds those of the other schools combined.

"Something is what it does," said Kupchella. "It's the actions that prevail here." He refers to the attendance of over 400 Native Americans at the University of North Dakota and the number of university-sponsored Native American programs on campus.

"Taken together [the other schools] don't have close to the array of programs we have here," said Kupchella. With this taken into consideration, Kupchella said he doesn't know what "special" means.

While some feared that the NCAA's decision might thwart or end relations between the university and the tribe, Kupchella said he will still work to reschedule a meeting with the Spirit Lake Nation and continue to keep communication strong between the two groups. He said North Dakota tribes "left the door open" after the United Tribes Council Summit and that the university needs "to work with them and resolve differences." Pleased with the decision, Leigh Jeannotte, director of the American Indian Student Services saw the decision as a step forward not only for those working to change the Sioux nickname, but also for university-tribal relations.

Jeannotte said Wednesday was the first time in five years that Kupchella acknowledged the important role and involvement that the tribes have in the issue and was pleased with Kupchella's continued commitment to meet with the tribes and discuss the issue. Many supporters of the NCAA's decision, however, saw it as a different opportunity for UND. David Gipp, president of the United Tribes Technical College in Bismarck, N.D., and UND alumnus said in a statement the decision was the "correct ethical and moral decision." "It begins to right the wrongs of history," said Gipp.

Hurricane-related jobless claims rise to 279,000

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The number of people out of work because of Hurricane Katrina has reached 279,000, and many more job losses are expected because of Hurricane Rita.

The lost jobs, coupled with surging energy prices, are expected to deliver a sharp blow to overall economic growth in the second half of this year. Also of concern is the possibility that any further unexpected spikes in energy prices could prolong the economic weakness.

The Commerce Department reported Thursday that the economy was growing at a solid 3.3 percent annual rate in the April-June period, but that rate is sure to be weaker in the just-concluding July-September quarter.

"The problem is the combined effects of the disruptions from Katrina and Rita, plus the ripple effects in the economy from higher energy prices," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a consulting firm in Lexington, Mass.

Before the hurricanes sent oil prices briefly above $70 per barrel and gasoline up to $3 per gallon, analysts had forecast that economic growth in the third quarter would show an annual rate perhaps as high as 4.5 percent.

Behravesh said he now believed growth in the gross domestic product would be closer to 3 percent in the third quarter and around 2.8 percent in the fourth quarter. The GDP measures the value of all goods and services produced within the United States and is the best barometer of economic fitness.

The Congressional Budget Office said Thursday it believed the fallout from Katrina and Rita probably would be "more modest" than the CBO estimated on Sept. 6 for just Katrina.

The agency's director, Douglas Holtz-Eakin, said the CBO now believes the hurricanes will cut growth by one-half of a percentage point in the second half of this year, with most of that damage in the July through September period. By the final three months of 2005, spending on rebuilding will help to offset the economic damage, according to the CBO.

In its earlier report, the CBO said the impact on GDP growth probably would be from one-half of a percentage point to a full percentage point over the second half of the year.

As for job losses, the CBO said that the direct effect on areas hit by Katrina "now appears to be between 280,000 and 400,000 jobs." The CBO said Rita's impact on jobs "will be much smaller" and by early next year, hiring for reconstruction projects will cause the net impact on jobs nationwide from both hurricanes to be "minimal."

On Wall Street, investors shook off worries about the future to push stocks higher on Thursday. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 79.69 points to close at 10,552.78.

Behravesh and other analysts are forecasting a rebound to faster growth next year as the rebuilding gets started. They say those forecasts were based on a calming of energy prices. But that is in doubt when it comes to natural gas, where analysts predict that parts of the country could see increases this winter of as much as 70 percent.

"Natural gas prices are going to go through the roof in the next couple of months and that is going to hurt a lot of families," Behravesh said.

The Labor Department reported Thursday that job losses from Katrina climbed by an additional 60,000 last week to 279,000. Last week's Katrina-related increase compared with 108,000 two weeks ago.

Overall jobless claims declined to 356,000 last week, down from a two-year high of 435,000 the previous week.

Still, analysts said those figures probably would climb again as people forced out of work by Rita, which struck the Texas-Louisiana coast last weekend, make their way to unemployment offices.

The government will report on September unemployment on Oct. 7. Analysts are looking for the rate to rise to 5 percent from a four-year low of 4.9 percent in August. They said business payrolls could lose 250,000 jobs related to Katrina's devastation.

This decline will be partially offset by a gain of 150,000 jobs elsewhere, leaving job losses for the month around 100,000 for September.

David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York, said he looked for the weekly jobless claims figures to begin rising again as Rita-related claims are filed, but he estimated the impact from Rita would be about one-fourth that of Katrina.

"Katrina was off the scale. There are no jobs in New Orleans right now," he said. "Rita was a more normal hurricane where the jobs will come back pretty quickly."

The Commerce Department's estimate of a 3.3 percent growth rate in the second quarter was unchanged from the estimate made one month ago. An inflation gauge tied to the GDP that is closely watched by the Federal Reserve rose at a moderate rate of 1.7 percent in the second quarter, slightly higher than estimated a month ago.

String of car bombs kills at least 60 in Iraq

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Three suicide attackers exploded a string of near-simultaneous car bombs in a mainly Shiite town Thursday, killing at least 60 people and wounding 70. Elsewhere, a roadside bomb killed five U.S. soldiers fighting in a hotbed of Iraq's insurgency.

The attacks were part of a new surge of violence ahead of an Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's constitution, whose passage is crucial to prospects for starting a withdrawal of American troops. The U.S. ambassador was struggling to negotiate changes to the charter in hopes of winning Sunni Arab support.

Sunni insurgents have vowed to wreck the vote, with al-Qaida in Iraq declaring "all-out war" on the Shiite majority that dominates Iraq's government. Moderate Sunni Arab leaders called on their community to vote against the charter, saying it will fragment Iraq and leave them weak compared to Shiites and Kurds.

Also Thursday, Sunnis said U.S. troops raided the homes of two Sunni leaders, angering sect members and reinforcing their feeling of alienation in the political process.

The car bombs exploded just before sunset in downtown Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad, hitting a bank, a vegetable market and another location. Police Lt. Ghafil Hassan said.

At least 60 were killed. Most of the casualties were civilians, though among the 70 wounded were the police chief and four officers, said Dr. Khaled al-Azawi of Balad Hospital. Hassan said the toll could reach 75 dead and 100 wounded, saying there were body parts at the scene not accounted for at the hospital. A major U.S. air base is located on Balad's outskirts.

Meanwhile, in Ramadi — a center of insurgent activity 80 miles west of Baghdad — a roadside bomb exploded during combat Wednesday, killing five Americans, a Marine statement said. It was the deadliest single attack on U.S. forces since a roadside bomb killed 14 Marines in the town of Haditha on Aug. 3.

The Ramadi blast brought to 1,934 the number of U.S. service members who have died since Iraq's war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

More than 140 people — including 13 U.S. service members — have been killed in the past four days.

In Washington, the top American commander in Iraq said Thursday that the process of withdrawing U.S. troops depends greatly on the results of the referendum and elections set to take place if the constitution passes.

"The next 75 days are going to be critical," Gen. George Casey told the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee.

Sunni Arab success in rejecting the draft constitution would set back the political process for months, prolonging Iraq's political stability.

Sunnis make up only 20 percent of the population, but they could defeat the constitution because of a loophole in voting rules: If two-thirds of voters in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces vote "no," the referendum fails — even if an overall majority approves. There are four provinces where Sunni Arabs could potentially cross that margin.

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad has been shuttling between all sides, trying to secure last-minute changes to the draft, which parliament approved Sept. 18 after tough negotiations.

He has met rejections from Shiites and Kurds on some proposed changes, and some Sunni officials said the proposals were still not enough.

Further straining the process, Sunni officials said U.S. forces raided the Baghdad homes of Adnan al-Dulaimi and Harith al-Obeidi, senior officials in the Conference for Iraq's People, a prominent Sunni political group.

Al-Dulaimi, 73, said soldiers in tanks and Humvees broke into his home at 2:30 a.m., put him and his family in a guest room and searched the house, arresting four of his bodyguards and confiscating weapons he said were licensed.

"It was if they were attacking a castle, not the home of a normal person who advises Iraq's interim government and has called for reconciliation and renounced sectarianism," said al-Dulaimi, his group's secretary-general and an adviser to the Iraqi president on religious affairs.

Al-Dulaimi said the Americans were acting on a false tip that his bodyguards had links to insurgents. The U.S. military said it conducted several raids Thursday in the areas of Baghdad where the leaders live but could not identify the homes involved.

Sunni leaders complain the constitution does not emphasize Iraq's unity and Arab character. They say its federal system — which would allow Shiites in the south and Kurds in the north to form mini-states — will isolate Sunnis in a weak middle region, cheated of oil resources.

Khalilzad met with the top Kurdish leaders, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, on Wednesday and conveyed three changes sought by Sunnis, said Fuad Massoum, a Kurdish member of the constitutional commission.

Massoum said the changes concern: confirming the use of Arabic along with Kurdish in the northern Kurdistan region; adding a clause stating that "Iraq is a single nation, and the constitution guarantees its unity"; and allowing parliament to alter the constitution by a two-thirds vote rather than requiring a referendum.

Khalilzad earlier presented the same proposals to Shiite leaders, said Humam Hamoudi, the Shiite head of the constitutional committee.

Both Kurds and Shiites rejected the third proposal, Massoum and Hamoudi said. The Kurds want the second proposal rephrased to "federal nation" instead of "single nation," though they accept the first provision, Massoum said.

Even so, one of the main Sunni Arab parties, the Iraqi Islamic Party, said that acceptance of all three changes would not be enough for some Sunni leaders.

Party official Nasser al-Ani said his side had put forward 12 proposals, including changes in the federal system that Shiites and Kurds have insisted cannot be altered.

"If the American ambassador revealed only three of our 12 demands, this would not be satisfactory," he said.

A U.S. official confirmed that Khalilzad was seeking "tweaks" in about a half-dozen points in the draft "to maximize the public support." He said agreement was closest on the use of Arabic in Kurdistan and on "Iraq's identity as a nation state" but would not discuss the other points.

Australia. Josephine had a large assortment of exotic birds in the foyer of Malmaison, and also kept a pet monkey that, according to Chevallier, could cut a deck of cards with a fork and knife. The monkey and swans would later be stuffed and can be found in museums in France.

The Mead's exhibition also includes a concert, a symposium and other lectures that will be held throughout the fall. Amherst College has also collaborated with Smith College, which opens an exhibition entitled "The French Portrait" tonight.

Keifer is excited about the extensiveness of this fall's program.

"It brings people closer to the actual players in the moment," she said. "You get a greater sense of who these people were by looking at the art, and what they collected, the place that they lived ... it goes beyond Napoleon himself, so it deals with issues about women in power, what their relationship was to Napoleon, and it raises a lot of issues, too."

All events can be found on their respective Web pages. The Amherst exhibition runs until Dec. 12th.

"I am very pleased with [the exhibition]," Keifer concluded. "I hope people come and learn about Josephine. She's very a interesting historical figure."

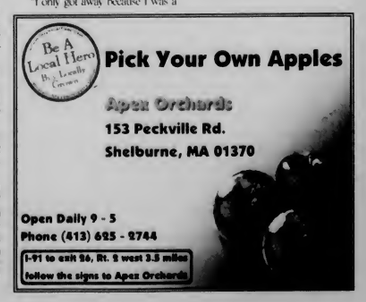
right," she said. "It took me a while but I figured it out."

Williams stressed to the audience that contrary to popular perception, the life of an activist isn't glamorous.

"I don't believe in utopia. There's nothing utopian, nothing magical, nothing mystical about trying to make the world a better place. It's thinking, planning and carrying out the plan. Anyone can do it," she said.

Williams said that "changing the world isn't always popular." She recalled being chased by a government-sent Salvadoran "death squad" during her work in South America.



"I only got away because I was a better driver than them," she said.

Openly discussing her views on U.S. policies, Williams stressed the importance of dealing with "fundamental problems that cause unrest."

"If we all don't look for solutions to these problems, we're all less secure," she said criticizing the realist method of achieving security – weapon production.

Williams finished by appealing to those who "complain but don't take action."

"I don't have time for you," she said. "I'm too busy. Real participatory democracy means you not only have the right and obligation to vote. It means you have the right and responsibility to create the better world you envision."

What comes with owning a car

John Gruenenfelder

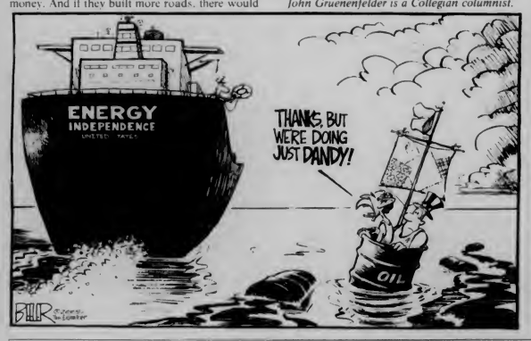
I don't like cars. I don't dislike driving itself; in fact I've driven across this country three times now. I suppose, more precisely, that I don't like our car-oriented society. The concept of personal transportation is okay. Well, except those wretched Hummers. This isn't meant to be a tirade against cars. I admit that they are incredibly useful and our society would be a pale shadow of what it is now without them. Still, I've made it my goal to go as long as I possibly can without a car. I'm attempting this experiment to save money, pollute less and just to see if I can actually do it.

I am not entirely without transportation, however, as I do own a Kymco scooter. I suppose this could be seen as violating my principles. If the idea is to pollute less and save money, though, then the scooter has succeeded wonderfully. Up until this September I lived in Tucson, Ariz. My scooter worked great there as the biggest weather concern one has to worry about is that it is just so hot (in fact, the high in Tucson on Wednesday was 103 degrees). And when it almost never rains, well, you get the idea. Living here in Amherst is a different matter. It rains a lot and the weather becomes cold. Really cold. I don't think I'll be riding around at all come this winter. Clearly, my scooter isn't the final solution.

Clearly, automobiles aren't going anywhere. Our country just isn't structured that way. The best answer is to just make what we do have better. More efficient and cleaner cars fueled with some sort of petroleum alternative.

For all their usefulness, cars take a surprisingly large portion of a person's income. With the rising gas prices, that cut is only increasing. I've watched my parents, my sister and my friend all pour significant amounts of money into keeping their cars running. When faced with that sort of tab, I'm willing to go through a lot to avoid a car.

Of course, most Americans don't feel the same way. Trying to change that mindset is just silly. Many people have no alternative, whether it's job related or simply where they live. And this isn't just an American lixation. I've seen parts of Europe's traffic situation and I can't say that they're much better. They have fewer cars and better public transportation, to be sure, but they also have fewer roads. The traffic on the roads they do have would give Los Angeles a run for its money. And if they built more roads, there would just be more traffic.



Is there a solution to this problem? Clearly, automobiles aren't going anywhere. Our country just isn't structured that way. The best answer is to just make what we do have better. More efficient and cleaner cars fueled with some sort of petroleum alternative. It's a ways off, but hydrogen fuel cell cars look like the way to go. And this idea has solid government backing, too. Remember President Bush's State of the Union speech pledge to fund hydrogen fuel cell research? I didn't think so. But it will happen regardless as higher oil prices slowly nudge people to alternative ideas.

Supporters of hydrogen power love to point out that it has zero emissions, while its detractors claim the opposite. The truth is that they are both right. The cars will have zero emissions, but all that hydrogen has to be produced somewhere and in a fashion requiring a significant amount of energy. The advantage here is that there is now only one pollution producing engine that needs to be cleaned rather than the impossible task of making millions of automobiles burn cleanly.

This new wave of cars won't come quickly, easily or cheaply. Big changes are rarely sudden, but take a good amount of time. The process could certainly be helped along by some strong leadership from the top, but so far it has not materialized. President Clinton didn't even try, not being too excited by large national projects after his ideas for health care went nowhere. President Bush certainly won't provide the necessary push as most of his wealth and power are connected to oil in some fashion. That leaves only a future president to help bring this to the forefront.

Perhaps by 2008 oil will be so ridiculously expensive that alternatives will receive much more attention. Of course, rather than idly hoping private citizens can make their wishes known and help make it an issue. Maybe when these new cars are on the road, in whatever form they ultimately take, I'll feel a little better about owning a car. But it will still be expensive no matter how you look at it.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist.

Hammer down

Gil Jenkins

I wondered the other day what the appropriate reaction and response should be to the news that Tom "The Hammer" Delay (R-Texas), Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, had been indicted on felony criminal conspiracy charges? As a staunch Democrat, I'd be disingenuous to say that at a minimum my reaction didn't contain some measure of glee, but it was how to garner a response that seemed less evident initially.

I suppose the first thing that leapt into my mind, after the glee, of course, was an old saying in politics that when your adversary is hurting him or herself, let them do so without interference.

But then I recalled I had something beating in my chest, too, and not just the calculating mind of a careful politician. I quickly realized that the time had come to ignore this old political truism. Now the opportunity was here for progressives and Democrats alike to seize the moment aggressively and assertively. Now finally it seemed the right time because of the combination of unprecedented circumstances and recent events.

It should go almost without mention that the first set of circumstances warranting this response can be explained by observing the almost daily exposed multitudes of failings and inadequacies of President Bush. On at least three major fronts – Katrina, Iraq and the economy – the governance by his administration has been shameful, bordering on criminal.

Moreover, at this time, and for the first time in our history, the senior leadership for both Houses of Congress are being formally investigated on criminal charges. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn) is being investigated for his sale of private stock right before it tanked, due to a bad earnings forecast. Sound familiar to any Martha Stewart followers?

In the House, as mentioned above, Delay has been investigated and now indicted for charges relating to illegal corporate campaign contributions funneled through his PAC back to candidates running in Texas Statewide elections. Delay is facing two years in jail if convicted. (Note: Delay has temporarily resigned post as Speaker of the House.)

As if the news couldn't get any better (or worse, depending on the perspective) Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl "Turd Blossom" Rove will soon have his fate decided as the Justice Department looks to wrap up its list of indictments related to the leaking of undercover CIA agent Valerie Plame's identity near the end of October.

Specifically my point is this; we (Democrats and progressives) need to start to draw the parallels and connections to the Republicans as a culture of corruption. However obvious these connections may be to political junkies like some of us, they need to be laid out in a thoughtful manner and hammered down to the American public. If we don't mobilize around this idea of Republicans and rampant corruption, we can forget taking back some control of our government in 2006 and beyond.

Specifically my point is this: we (Democrats and Progressives) need to start to draw the parallels and connections to the Republicans as a culture of corruption.

Let's be as disciplined wordsmiths as the right wingers are. We, too, should play the association game. Conservatives (though there is hardly anything conservative about them) have successfully marginalized Democrats and liberals, characterizing us as being, among other things, wimpy policy wonks, crazy tree huggers, latte sipping Volvo driving Northeasterners, Hollywood elites or more generally speaking just a bunch of people who lack clear values or morality.

Are there crazy tree huggers, wimpy policy wonks, latte sipping Volvo driving northeasterners and Hollywood elites in the Democratic Party? Yeah, I guess so, but I submit that there is also a much larger and growing number of pissed off lower and middle-class Americans from all over the country who love their families, worship a higher power and who are getting sick and tired of the corruption and hypocrisy coming out the Republican-controlled government these days.

These people were once stronger Democrats and can be again once we start speaking to them. There is a crack in the façade; the Republican spin cycle has been put on hold. The time is now.

In order to capitalize on this moment, we must consistently build the stronger archetypes of the modern Republican Party, however inflammatory they might be.

In my mind the most overriding archetype that should become almost mantra-like in its recitation is that Republicans are arrogant, corrupt, rich guys, who break the law in order to serve themselves and their political and corporate cohorts and who might likely be from Texas. Maybe drop that last part, but you get the idea.

You might be asking if it is fair to characterize all Republicans as being arrogant, corrupt and greedy rich guys. Probably not, but frankly that point has become almost irrelevant in today's political climate. Republicans in power overwhelmingly embody the above adjectives, and if they and their minions don't play fair, why should we? (Though we're going to avoid the pesky law breaking thing).

In addition to our wordsmithing, let's lean on our Senators and Congressmen a little harder this time around; tell them we want to hear some fire come out of their mouths. Delay, Frist and Bush are in the dunk tank, and need to be kept there by firing more baseballs on the target.

As I mentioned earlier, with no shame for redundancy, we must seize this day. We can't be the wimpy ineffectual liberals they've characterized us as. I respect and admire the great diversity of the Democratic Party and all of its wonderfully important issues and causes, but now is the time to synthesize all of our forces and passion. We must focus on the most important overriding issue, winning elections, and we won't win again until we get more realistic and savvy in our methods.

Putting everything I said away for a just moment, I am reminded of another old political truism that might have better legs than the previous one: at the end of the day all most people want is just some damn conviction from their leaders. I sure would like some, while I do admit that the criminal conviction of Delay, Frist and Rove would be equally refreshing.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

BEDTIME PLAYERS ON THE MONEY

If you read the recent column "Sex 'education?'" by Greg Collins, you may want to read on and hear what I have to say; if not then none of this will make much sense because the previous column ungracefully put down the Not Ready For Bedtime Players with basically no support at all. I am by no means speaking for the Bedtime Players, but just as someone who has seen their performance and enjoyed it, I honestly think what they do is awesome. Their show is hilarious and full of useful information and the past column had some ignorant supports as to why they disagreed with what the Bedtime Players do.

Since I have been lucky enough to enjoy the show of the Bedtime

Players, I feel I am allowed to share my experience so others are not badly influenced by the past column. I have never laughed so hard at an educational show that I actually found useful and interesting. They were definitely not trying to "publicize and encourage the practice of potentially harmful behavior, like irresponsible sex" as Greg Collins blatantly stated in his column. Not once did I feel like the Bedtime Players were encouraging us to have sex like wild bunny rabbits; I thought they did a great job using humor to promote safer sex practices, which in my opinion is healthy behavior. It is a normal part of life, and really the more people who are well-educated, the better.

The column also mentions how to go about getting "real 'real' life education." It says not to rely on public bureaucracies and to go to friends, parents and Web sites. Why not rely on the public? At least you know the information from the Bedtime Players is coming from Health Education, a department in University Health Services. Web sites can be unreliable and contradictory unless you find the right ones, going to friends for advice can be iffy and going to parents is fine and dandy but do remember that sex education was pretty much nonexistent and taboo for their generation so there is the chance that your perfect parents may be wrong. Shocking, I know. Some people may not have the type of relationship where they can rely on parents and family for things like this.

I would just like to point out several assumptions that I think poorly supported his argument, specifically where it was said that "everybody knows the potential ramifications of irresponsible sexual activity." Yes, it seems like common sense, but that is not always the case. My cousin is a freshman at another university and she told me her only fear of having sex was pregnancy.

That is really the least of her worries, so maybe people do not know as much as we would like to think. Public education is important for things like this, and it is more fun going to see some peers perform skits that will most likely make you laugh than listen to your eighth grade gym teacher lecture you about sex.

This next part here had to be my favorite, about the "'realist' education" and not only educating incoming freshman on how to use a condom, but also on the safe way to smoke a bong and how to recover from hangovers. So let's be "real" for a minute, these subjects are not analogous at all. Educating on how to properly use a condom is promoting a safer behavior as opposed to risky sexual behavior. As for safe ways to smoke a bong, one can argue that it really is not all that dangerous to begin with but I highly doubt that there will be any educational programs on pot smoking techniques for a couple of reasons.

The first being, well, it is illegal, and the last time I checked using condoms for safer sex was not against the law; and, two, it is not all that safe to be inhaling any sort of smoke into your lungs, but there are worse things.

The message I got from the Bedtime Players was promotion of safer sex to reduce risks, and they did it in a humorous way, which made it fun and also made them approachable.

COLLEGIAN'S HIDDEN AGENDA

I just read your most recent editorial page with tremendous disappointment and an air of anger. I read the sections about Mitt Romney and Fox News, both of which, as intended in an editorial section, were very biased; however, beyond that, they had no grounds of basis for any of the claims made. There's talk of Mitt Romney acting like a child, but no quotes outside of a poor analogy that doesn't translate any negative intentions. The editorial portrayed him as hateful man who has turned against the state he governs. None of this is true, he has done a lot of good things for this state, balancing the budget, for example, and giving us a surplus most states haven't a chance of seeing. This is particularly impressive given that he came into office with a deficit.

I can't disagree with the conclusions drawn about Fox News and their agenda. There's no question they have an agenda. This agenda, however, is no more apparent than that of The Collegian. Simply printing this article shows that they have no compassion for conservatives. The journalistic integrity of Fox News wasn't at question; it was their politics that were attacked. This is a travesty. You've simply lowered yourself to their level. Bill O'Reilly isn't a role model, nor should he be. Why is no one questioning anyone on the left side? Michael Moore has been known to state untrue facts and to ignore the issues when he's questioned. In "Fahrenheit 911" he spent 35 minutes taking advantage of a poor woman's emotions simply because they were in congruence with what his documentary was trying to say. That's not material that should find its way into a documentary but not in a million years would your staff criticize Michael Moore.

The article is laced with barbs against corporations and their hidden agendas. There's nothing there that isn't present in The Collegian; editorial and otherwise. You can't say articles that are anti-Bush get top billing every time, and are the most submitted. If you seek unbiased media, it does exist. Look to the Wall Street Journal or CNN in its shining moments. Unbiased media will exist when people choose to read and hear news that isn't catered to their opinion. When The Collegian makes that step, maybe I'll start reading it again.

'Berlin and friends' combine their musical talents

By Nina Foroutan
Collegian Correspondent

A concert performed by UMass professors and colleagues will be played in the Bezanson Recital Hall. The show will fill the hall with sounds from the trumpet, piano, bassoon, trombone and English horn on Sunday, Oct. 2, at 8 p.m. Along with the bevy of assorted instruments, there will also be a piece sung by one of our very own UMass professors. The vision behind this interesting concert came from Eric Berlin, a professor of trumpet at the UMass Amherst Department of Music.

Berlin, an established musician, has performed with the Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Pops Esplanade Orchestra.

'Berlin & Friends'
Bezanson
8 p.m.

Berlin wanted a chance to play alongside some of his favorite musicians at UMass. "I wanted to do something different, instead of focusing the repertoire on new works, which I usually do, I wanted to present lighter works which would allow me to choose music that I could perform with some of my remarkable UMass Amherst colleagues and friends," he said.

He chose five of his colleagues to share the spotlight with him in the concert. Stephen Walt, whose office is directly across from Berlin at UMass, will play the bassoon in the upcoming performance. The piece they will be playing is from Paul Hindermith's "Concerto for Trumpet and Bassoon." Walt, who received his bachelor's degree at UMass, is a talented professor as well as the founder of the Williamstown Chamber Concerts in Massachusetts. The uniting of the two musicians is important to Berlin because he can now sit next to his colleague rather than behind him. Berlin describes Walt as, "a dear friend whose presence in the recital touches me rather directly and is unique in its pairing of trumpet and bassoon."

Along with the trumpet and bassoon piece, Berlin will also perform with David Sporny, professor of trombone at UMass. The two will perform Boris Blacher's "Divertimento for Trumpet and Trombone." Sporny was another musician who played in the opening of the Bezanson Recital Hall in 2003. Berlin expressed his opinion of Sporny in only the best light. "I have a great deal of respect and admiration for Dave Sporny, as a musician and teacher and feel lucky to work with him."

Professor of piano, Nadine Shank, will also be included in the show. Berlin stated that Shank is "always a pleasure to work with, and this will be no exception." Shank has played piano all around the world, including England, Germany, Holland and the Virgin Islands. The pair will be playing "Rustiques for Trumpet and Piano" by Eugene Bozza.

While Berlin gets to see Stephen Walt very often, he rarely gets to see Frederic Cohen, a professor of music at UMass. Blending the two sounds of Berlin's trumpet and Cohen's English horn will "meander through the lonely and mysterious world of a city after dark," according to Berlin. The duo will play Aaron Coplan's "Quiet City."

In a fascinating twist there will be a piece sung by Professor William Hite. Hite will perform a tenor aria called "With honour let desert be crowned," written by George Frideric Handel. In addition Berlin found a piece to perform along with Hite. The piece is from the oratorio, "Judas Maccabaeus."

For all those who don't know a thing about the intricate mystifying world of music have no fear, Berlin assures us that "everyone can relate."

Tickets are $5 for students, seniors and children under age 18, and $10 for the general public.

Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box office or at the door of Bezanson Recital Hall at 7:30 p.m. on Oct. 2.

CROSS COUNTRY from page 8

was named Atlantic 10 Men's Cross Country Performer of the Week for the second time this fall after finishing fifth at the Great American Cross Country Festival.

Ciccarelli is the defending A-10 Men's Cross Country champion and should be a favorite this weekend.

"The new and returning guys will get to see other teams that are ranked in the top 25 in the nation this year," O'Brien said. "And [they] also will be able to race on an official NCAA track."

O'Brien also said that he was happy with the team's fitness and practice during its off week.

"This will be a challenge for our team," O'Brien said. "But it will also be a great learning experience for the team."

As for the Minutewomen, this looks to be another tough meet for them.

At the last race, Vermont won the overall meet with 28 points, followed by Maine with 48 and UMass coming in third with 49.

UMass was led once again by sophomore Christina Derosa, who took second place (19:07) overall to lead the Minutewomen.

Minutewomen coach Julie LaFreniere is still optimistic about this weekend's meet.

"This course is going to be one of the toughest courses this year," she said. "But with practice we should be able to pace ourselves to a good finish."

Another thing that should give the Minutewomen some trouble is the experience some of the other teams have. With the nation's top teams who have run this track before at this weekend's meet, experience might be the advantage.

Last year Tennessee won the Paul Short Invitational with 53 points and will be returning to regain its top spot. Also returning will be Villanova, which came in second with 87 and Columbia which followed up with 89 last year.

A runner for the Minutewomen to watch for is Charlotte 49ers senior Cassie Ficken who earned her second Atlantic 10 Conference weekly awards on Monday. Ficken was chosen as the Women's Performer of the Week for the second time this season.

Ficken has clocked the top two times in the Atlanti c-10 this season, including a 17:41 finish in the 5K Nike Race of Champions at the Great American Cross Country Festival this past Saturday.

Pennant races down to the wire

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

Grab the remote and settle in, America. The last weekend of the baseball season should be a sizzler, with pennant races far from over and a wild-card berth up for grabs.

Three teams are fighting for the last two spots in the American League playoffs, the tightest finale in a decade. And it's going to take a backyard brawl to knock out the loser: Yankees vs. Red Sox, White Sox vs. Indians.

"We all know what the situation is," New York Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "To think that it's come down to a handful of games to decide what 157 couldn't decide, that's great for baseball – but not too good for my stomach."

Things aren't nearly so exciting over in the National League, where Atlanta, St. Louis and San Diego have wrapped up the division titles. But the Philadelphia Phillies are still hanging around the wild-card race, trailing Houston by 2.5 games.

"It's fun, man," Philadelphia's Michael Tucker said. "All you can do at this point is play hard. This is one of those things that not a lot of people experience. You have to go out there and have fun and see what happens."

One or two races usually go down to the final weekend. But to have the teams involved in the AL races all playing each other – that's unprecedented.

According to the Elias Sports Bureau, four teams have never played each other for three spots in the final week since the wild-card era began in 1995.

"It just doesn't get any better this," the Yankees' Alex Rodriguez said. "This is the best time of my life, the most fun time in my baseball career. I don't remember a race like this since I've been around."

The Yankees, Red Sox and Indians were within one game of each other with four to play, and it takes a calculator and some graph paper to figure out the different scenarios.

Chicago clinched the AL Central by beating Detroit on Thursday afternoon, 4-2. But Cleveland was still alive in the wild-card race, tied with Boston. The Red Sox were a game behind the Yankees in the AL East, with a three-game series at Fenway Park beginning Friday.

Got all that?

"I'm not good in math," White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen said. "That's why I just say, 'Come back tomorrow and win the game.'"

While some fans don't like a schedule that loads up on games against division rivals, especially at the end of the season – "We're sick of seeing (fill in the blank)" – this weekend is the perfect argument for it.

Yankees-Red Sox is one of the best rivalries in all of sports no matter if it's April or October. They've finished 1-2 in the East the last seven years, and their feisty fan base reaches far beyond the East Coast.

The Yankees are baseball's glamour boys, loved and loathed in equal amounts for their big names and even bigger payroll. Boston remains America's lovable underdog even with their World Series title last year, a scrappy bunch that still plays with Little League enthusiasm.

If the Red Sox can't repeat last year's ALCS drama, when Boston rallied to win four straight after being three outs from being swept by the Yankees, this is the next best thing.

"It's the master plan," Boston's Johnny Damon said. "God's way."

The Red Sox were up by four games on Sept. 10, but the Yankees climbed back atop the division last week and they've been trading spots ever since. With a one-game lead going into Thursday's games, the Yankees will have to win at Fenway Park twice, at most, to clinch the East title.

According to Elias, the only time New York had a lead with four games to go and failed to win was 1904, back when the Yankees were called the Highlanders.

"Three teams in it, two make it and one will miss it. Every game is like a playoff game," said Yankees right-hander Mike Mussina, who is scheduled to start Sunday's game. "It's going to be as big as if it were a seven-game series."

The White Sox-Indians matchup doesn't quite have the drama it did last week when Chicago was on the verge of a historic collapse. The White Sox had blown all but 1 1/2 games of what had been a 15-game cushion on Aug. 1, and Cleveland looked unstoppable.

But the Indians chilled at the most inopportune time, losing three straight for the first time since the middle of August.

In the NL, Houston needed one win to clinch a tie in the wild-card race with Philadelphia. The Astros opened a four-game series with the Chicago Cubs on Thursday, while the Phillies had the night off before going to Washington for three games.

Oh, and if playoff races weren't exciting enough, there's a subplot to Yankees-Red Sox: Rodriguez and Boston's David Ortiz are the leading candidates for AL MVP.

"The focus is on the team. A nice side note behind that is, obviously, the MVP race," Rodriguez said. "Front and center right now is the Yankees vs. Boston."

David Ortiz and the Boston Red Sox host the New York Yankees for a big three-game series beginning tonight at Fenway Park.

Minutewomen look to get back on the winning track

She tallied a career-high five points last year, but has the chance to match that again this season.

"We have not faced the sweeper system this year, teams that play the long ball like them," Rudy said. "The long ball has been dangerous for us this year."

Also posing dangerous threats will be the duo of Leah Jerome and Haley Lentsch in the front. Between the two, they have netted ten goals on the season (Lentsch six, Jerome four), accounting for more than half of Fordham's goal tally on the season. Being sizeable players, they aren't afraid to take on defenders, and are excellent shooters as well.

Needless to say, the defense will need to continue minimizing their mistakes with the ball if they are to survive and, more importantly, kick off the second season with a win, not another loss.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen will square off against the St. Bonaventure Bonnies (1-7-0) who are in a bit of an uncharacteristic kind of mode at the moment.

Last season, the Bonnies were on a roll until Longmeadow native Kerry O'Malley went down for the year with a knee injury. O'Malley's injury, coupled with some problems on defense, led to a demise that saw SBU miss the 2004 A-10 Tournament (UMass overtook the sixth seed in the final week-

Sophomore midfielder Jenny Roehrig will look to help get the offense going this weekend. Roehrig has five points, on two goals and an assist.

This year, the Bonnies return their three frontrunners, Jacquee Parmenter, Heather MacDougall (preseason All-A-10, 15 goals in 2004) and a healthy O'Malley, yet for one reason or another lack a serious punch. One might think having three great forwards play together for two seasons would give a team an advantage, but it's clearly not the case, as was the scenario in a recent 7-1 thumping of the Bonnies by No. 13 Virginia.

But nothing will be taken for granted.

"I think we can prepare, it's just a matter of execution," Rudy said.

Dwight faces former teammates

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) – The San Diego Chargers' alumni meeting will be missing one key member Sunday.

Patriots safety Rodney Harrison played his first nine seasons in San Diego. When the Chargers released him in 2003, he signed with New England and wound up winning a pair of Super Bowls.

This would have been Harrison's first meeting with his old team, but he's out for the season after tearing ligaments in his left knee in last week's 23-20 win in Pittsburgh.

That was a blow for Chargers running back LaDainian Tomlinson, who likely would have bumped into Harrison several times at Gillette Stadium.

"Rodney lived across the street from me," Tomlinson said. "I used to talk to him a lot about different things. I would go over to his house, he'd come over to mine. I learned so much from the guy."

Despite Harrison's absence, Tomlinson will see some familiar faces in Patriots uniforms. New England backup quarterback Doug Flutie and receiver Tim Dwight were Chargers for the past four years before signing with the Patriots in the offseason. In Tomlinson's rookie year of 2001, Flutie started all 16 games for San Diego before giving way to Drew Brees the following season.

Because he grew up in Natick, starred at Boston College and played three seasons (1987-89) with the Patriots, Flutie feels more attachment to his current team than to his former one.

"I'm good friends with a lot of guys on the team," Flutie, 42, said of the Chargers, "but you're in this locker room and they're in that [visiting] one. When you're in the other [team's] stadium there's a little sentiment that comes with the game, but not in this case."

While Flutie has yet to see the field this season, Dwight has contributed on offense and special teams. He has three catches for 37 yards and has averaged 11 yards on nine punt returns.

Dwight's 28-yard punt return last week was the Patriots' longest since the 2002 season and helped set up a field goal against the Steelers.

"Tim has been very productive for us in the return game," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "That was a big emphasis for us in the offseason."

Flutie's contributions so far have come off the field. Quarterback Tom Brady, who lost veteran offensive coordinator Charlie Weis in the offseason, said Flutie has helped him "see the whole big picture" at times.

"You just can't match that type of experience," Brady said. "He's been in situations where he's called his own plays. He's seen a lot of types of offensive football and different schemes. He's really brought a lot of knowledge."

Flutie, who has thrown for more than 14,000 yards in 12 NFL seasons, has accepted his backup role here, as he did in San Diego once Brees arrived. Flutie said he would have retired if he hadn't landed a job with the Patriots.

"I've been in that role for four years," Flutie said. "It's better than the alternative. I'm very content right now to watch [Brady] pull the trigger and win us some football games. I'll try to be ready if I'm ever needed."

Faulk is latest injured Patriot

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) – As if losing Matt Light's blocking and Rodney Harrison's toughness weren't enough, the New England Patriots will also have to deal with the loss of pass-catching back Kevin Faulk.

Faulk, one of quarterback Tom Brady's most reliable receivers, injured his foot in Sunday's win at Pittsburgh. It was unclear Thursday how many games he would miss.

Unlike Harrison's left knee and Light's right leg, the injury didn't receive much attention at first, but losing him for an extended period will make it even harder for the Patriots to win a third straight Super Bowl.

Harrison, the team's strong safety, tore ligaments in his knee and is out for the year. Light, the left tackle, hurt his leg and is out indefinitely.

Faulk is the 10th-leading receiver in franchise history, with 217 receptions for 1,935 yards and eight touchdowns. This season, he's tied for third on the team with 13 catches.

Despite fumbling twice in Pittsburgh, Faulk was a force in the passing game with seven catches for 71 yards. He had a 23-yard gain on a screen pass and appeared to injure himself on a 17-yard pickup on the first play of the Patriots' winning drive in the final two minutes.

Brady praised Faulk for making that last reception. "Talk about making a catch under pressure," Brady said. "Not a good throw and he catches it and snaps it up and made it look easy."

As Faulk's replacement, the Patriots signed former Steelers and Raiders running back Amos Zereoue on Wednesday and could make fullback Patrick Pass a bigger part of the passing game.

Zereoue, a seventh-year pro, has averaged 40 catches a year over the last three seasons. He has also had three career 100-yard receiving games. At 5-foot-8, 205 pounds, he is almost identical in build to Faulk (5-8, 202).

"I know Kevin really well," Zereoue said. "It's unfortunate what happened to him. I think he'll bounce right back. He's a real talented back.

UM opens A-10 play

By BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Imagine, for a moment, that you are the head coach of the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

To start off a five-game homestand, your Minutewomen (3-5-1) lose three in a row, including four of their last six, and there are some glaring problems that continue to plague your team.

Despite continuing to outshoot teams, you can't convert your shots into shots on goal and, more specifically, goals. On the other side of the ball, suspect teams are getting surprise breaks that lead to scores, even in games that your women dominate for the most part.

You try to establish a better game on the left flank, but due to a few illnesses and injuries, you have question marks and are forced to stay in the middle of the field. Against teams that are organized in the back, like the ones they will face this weekend as the Atlantic 10 season commences, that won't fly.

The defense certainly hasn't been suspect. With the exception of an errant pass here or there, they have kept the women close in games they have either had trouble in or had no business being in.

That said, you have a decision to make. Do you continue to train your players, with emphasis on finishing better in the final third of the field? Or do you open up the back and bring more people forward, a move that could either prove beneficial or backfire?

This is the decision head coach Jim Rudy has to make as the Minutewomen open up their Atlantic 10 season today against the Fordham Rams (6-3-0), a team that is by no means a pushover.

When asked if he was leaning toward either decision as of press time, Rudy said, "I'm leaning towards scoring more goals."

In one sense it's a witty statement made by a witty coach, but in another sense it's the downright truth. Goals need to be scored, especially against a tall team like the Rams.

Not only are they tall, but they are the yin to UMass' yang, as they are currently in the midst of a three-game winning streak to counter the Minutewomen's three-game losing streak.

Back to the tall thing, FU sports 15 players on its roster that stand at 5 feet 7 inches or more. That includes 5-foot-10-inch defender Lindsey Glode, a read-and-react sweeper who has excelled at getting the offensive movement started from the backfield.

Koch looks for W

By ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the sports world, the month of October is most commonly associated with the baseball postseason, but for the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-6-0) it is crunch time as well, with just one match on the road against Siena tomorrow before the conference season begins.

In the last five seasons the Minutemen have become accustomed to winning in October, posting a nearly flawless record of 37-8-4. UMass coach Sam Koch has a bulletproof explanation for this impeccable statistic.

"Our guys are big foliage watchers," he said. "So when the foliage comes they get pretty excited."

If history is a guide for the present, then there are good times ahead for the Minutemen, as they open October with Siena (2-4-0) tomorrow, a team they beat 4-2 last year at Rudd Field.

"It is a game that we look forward to playing and they [Siena] are always ready to play," Koch said. "It's a tough game. They're physical. They're hard working. They are going to be fired up to play us.

"It's on their home field and we have got to be ready to play to get the result. And if we're not [ready to play] they'll beat you, simple as that."

Senior captain Oral Bullen scored two goals in last year's match-up with Siena. Bullen, as well as the rest of the team, has had trouble scoring in the last three games, tallying only one goal.

Both players and coaches insist that UMass is not being outplayed, but is making untimely mistakes – there were several against Boston University on Wednesday – which cost it the game.

The Minutemen play Rhode Island on Oct. 9, beginning the Atlantic 10 matchups and raising the stakes for a struggling UMass squad.

"[Siena] is the next game we play right now so it's a jump start for the rest of the season," Koch said. "This is another game and we have to recover from the last one and start going the right direction."

The term "much-needed win" is thrown around often in sports, and despite being three games below .500, Koch insists that tomorrow is another tune-up, not putting much emphasis on the win column.

"Is it a much-needed win? No. It's not a conference game," he said. "A needed win is Rhode Island. But is [Siena] a game where we have to sort some things out and get a little bit closer to playing at peak form? Absolutely."

Mental mistakes have come early and often for UMass recently, and the goal is to cut down on the costly errors. Koch is careful to make the distinction between the controllable and uncontrollable; mental opposed to physical mistakes.

"It is clear that we have to be a little sharper," he said. "Two of the four mistakes that led up to that second goal [against BU] were mental mistakes and those are the things we have to clean up. Those are easy to clean up. With the physical mistakes, if the guy is bigger and faster than you then there's not much you can do about it.

"On the second goal it was a comedy of errors: there were four guys making mistakes and if one of them eliminates the mistake then they don't get the chance."

And to improve on offense?

"Make simple decisions," Koch said, "something that we did a better job of against BU."

Siena is coming off a close match against a 7-3 Vermont team, as it gave the Catamounts a run for their money in the waning minutes. It was a scoreless contest for 50 minutes until Vermont took a two-goal lead.

Siena responded with a late game rally but it wasn't enough as the Saints dropped the game 3-2.

Shea's squad to face the 'Cuse

By DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts field hockey team will try to end its three-game losing streak on the road when the Minutewomen face the Syracuse Orange (4-6) tonight at 7 p.m. at Coyne Field.

The Minutewomen (3-7) are coming off a 2-1 loss to No. 15 Connecticut on Saturday. Tonight will be the last game before conference p lay begins on Friday, Oct. 7 against the No. 16 Richmond Spiders.

UMass will attempt to get back on the winning track tonight against a Syracuse team that has been shut-out in their last two contests. With the Minutewomen having scored only one goal in the past three games, coach Patty Shea believes her team has to go into Syracuse with high expectations, especially at this point of the season.

"We have to go into Syracuse, and we have to expect to win," Shea said. "It's our last competition before we get to our conference. This is where you have to lay it all on the line because you have to see what your capability is."

UMass has been solid on defense as of late, allowing only two goals or less in the past seven games, but Shea said the team needs to capitalize more on other teams' blunders in order to get the offense going.

"When we force the other teams to make mistakes, we have to make them pay," Shea said. "Other teams do that to us, but we haven't been aggressive and passionate enough in that area to make other teams pay for those mistakes."

Syracuse looks to get back on the winning track as well, coming off two losses to No. 13 Louisville and No. 7 Penn State.

The Orange have an 8-5-1 advantage over UMass in the all-time series. Syracuse has won its last six meetings against the Minutewomen, including a 4-1 victory last year in Amherst. The last time UMass defeated Syracuse was in 1998, in a 3-0 victory at home.

The Orange will be ready to go tonight, as a win will give their coach Kathleen Parker her 300th career win. Parker is in her 28th season, and a win will make her only the sixth active NCAA Division I field hockey coach to achieve this feat.

The Minutewomen will have their work cut out for them against Syracuse freshman goalkeeper Heather Hess. Hess is tied for 18th in the nation in total saves with 62 on the season.

The Maroon and White will also have to play strong defense against Syracuse's leading scorers, Paige Sullivan and Ashley Fry. Sullivan leads the Orange in points with 14, while Fry is right behind her with 13. The two have combined for 12 of Syracuse's 18 goals this season, with Fry setting a career high with six of her own.

UMass senior Jaime Bawden believes focusing only on Syracuse's leading scorers will not be the key to victory.

"Every forward has an equal opportunity to get into the circle," Bawden said. "We need to keep the ball out of the circle and keep the tackles outside."

Bawden also knows that her team has to put the pressure on upfield as well.

"We know we need the ball," Bawden said. "We need to get a win. We have to keep the forwards moving in the midfield and dominate the upfield. We have to get the ball there and get our shots off. We're just not taking enough shots, and when we do, we need to get them on net."

Big meet for UMass

By AMIR NORMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Tomorrow, the Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams will be going to Lehigh University to compete in the Paul Short Invitational.

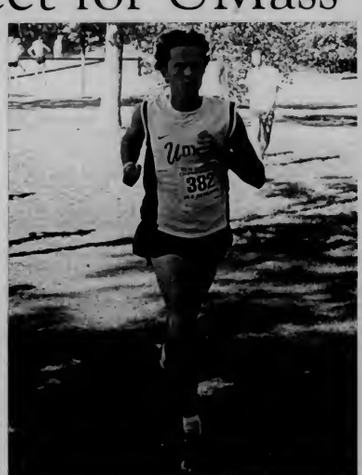
This is one of the biggest meets of the season for both UMass teams. There are over 57 teams participating at the invitational.

This will also be the first time the Minutemen and Minutewomen will be facing A-10 rivals St. Bonaventure, Saint Joseph's, Duquesne, George Washington, La Salle, Rhode Island and Richmond.

They will also be facing Charlotte, a newcomer to the A-10. Charlotte is currently in first place in the men's standings and second in the women's.

Two weeks ago, the Minutemen won their meet against Vermont and Maine. Sophomore Nils Fischer took second and led the Minutemen for the second race this season, finishing the eight kilometer course in 26:52.

"He is a great runner, but he still has room for improvement," UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said.



At last years invitational, Georgetown won the meet with 103 points, followed by Villanova at 108 and Auburn coming in third with 129.

Freshman Jesse Regnier also had a good race two weeks ago against Vermont and Maine; however this weekend he will be competing against Charlotte freshman Adu Dentamo. Dentamo was chosen as the A-10 Cross Country Rookie of the Week for the second time in the last three weeks.

Dentamo was 33rd overall in a deep eight kilometer Nike Race of Champions field at the Great American Festival this past Saturday, helping Charlotte to a fifth-place finish in the 12-team field.

Another challenger for the Minutemen is University of Richmond senior John Ciccarelli, who

Minutewomen release schedule

By ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team has released its 2005-2006 schedule and it features 12 home games including Field Trip Day on Jan. 13 against Rhode Island – a game that will be televised on Atlantic 10 Television.

The Minutewomen start with a preseason game against Simon Fraser on Nov. 4 at the Mullins Center, and then have a two-week break before the regular season begins with a game against Delaware on Jan. 18 in Newark.

Two days later UMass will return home to face Holy Cross in its first home game of the season.

The Maroon and White faced three ranked teams last season – Boston College, Temple and Maryland – and will play BC, which was ranked No. 20 last season, in Chestnut Hill on Dec. 8. UMass lost by 15 to the Eagles last year, dropping the contest 62-47.

UMass will face Temple later in the season during the A-10 season, playing the Owls on the road in Pennsylvania.

The Minutewomen have several lengthy home stands and road trips, the first home stand beginning just five games into the season with Hartford on Nov. 26 and ending with Hofstra five days later.

On Jan. 4 UMass travels to New Hampshire to begin a five-game road trip, with games at New Hampshire, BC, Syracuse, Brown and either Georgia Tech or Alabama, depending on the outcome of the Georgia Tech Holiday Invitational.

"We are going to be playing a very challenging schedule once again this season," UMass coach Mamie Dacko said after the release of the schedule in early September. "This schedule will give us some great early-season tests as we prepare for the Atlantic 10 season.

"We are looking forward to playing teams from some of the best conferences in the nation including the Atlantic Coast Conference and the Big East. We are also going to be matching up against some regional rivals.

"The A-10 portion of the schedule is broken up nicely. We will not have to go on any long road trips and have the luxury of playing four of the final six games at home."

Fire destroys loads of clothing at local laundromat

By DAN O'BRIEN

AMHERST — Several items of clothing were destroyed in a laundromat fire last night, just outside the University of Massachusetts campus.

The Amherst fire department received a call at 7:48 p.m. of a fire in a dryer at the Laundry Club on 6 University Drive, according to Amherst Fire Chief Keith Hoyle.

Hoyle said approximately 10 people were inside the building when the fire started. Most of the people inside were UMass students and at least one was a UMass employee.

No injuries were reported. However, one woman appeared to be suffering from breathing complications at the scene.

According to several eyewitnesses, after the fire started, a Laundry Club employee grabbed two fire extinguishers before telling customers that she did not know how to use it.

One witness claimed he and another customer tried to put the fire out with the two extinguishers. However, the extinguishers did not put out the fire.

Several witnesses claimed the employee did not call the fire department until at least 10 minutes after the blaze began.

"Everyone was coughing and their eyes were all red," said one witness who asked not to be identified.

Hoyle said several pieces of burning clothes had to be taken out of the building, which was almost completely filled with smoke. The flames were relatively small, but visible from outside the building, when firefighters arrived on the scene. At least two loads of laundry were brought outside while they were still burning. Weekend stabbings in frat row

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A large fight on North Pleasant St., in the area commonly referred to as "frat row," led to the stabbing of six University of Massachusetts students early Sunday morning, according to the Amherst police department.

Few details were released as of press time, but police believe the fight involved approximately six to 10 people.

Police responded to the incident around 12:33 a.m. and found that two men had been stabbed. One man, a 21-year-old Amherst resident, was stabbed in the head. He was transported to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield where he was listed in stable condition as of 10 a.m. on Sunday. The other man, a 20-year-old Amherst resident, was stabbed in the bicep. He was treated and released from Baystate Medical.

About 45 minutes later, at 1:12 a.m., police were called back to the same area on a report of a fight. Two additional men were found to be stabbed.

Police say a 20-year-old Somerville man was stabbed multiple times in the back.

He was taken to Baystate Medical Center and was in stable condition as of early

Election results in for SGA

All of the votes have been cast and tallied and the Student Government Association's Senate election results have been announced to the student body.

A total of 1,638 University of Massachusetts students – approximately 8.5 percent of the student body – cast their votes in support of their Senators. A minimum of five percent of the student body (1,020 students) had to vote in order for the elections to qualify.

The elections were held from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. on Wednesday in the Campus Center Concourse and in all dining halls.

"Thanks to a strong voter turnout, the SGA was able to run a single-day election for the first time in several years," said SGA president Pavel Payano. "We are pleased with how efficiently the elections ran."

There were 327 ballots from the Central District, 161 ballots from the Orchard Hill District, 97 ballots cast from the Northeast District,

Bike ride held in memorial for deceased bicyclist

By JAMIE MASON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

NORTHAMPTON — Bicyclists from around the region began a bike ride at Pulaski Park on Friday to remember fellow bicyclist Margaret Sanders and to raise awareness of bicycle safety on local roads.

The ride began at the park and continued on route 10 through Easthampton, around the rotary and back. There were two motorcycles placed in front and in back of the riders.

There were about 130 bicyclists of all ages, all wearing black armbands, and flashing red lights. All of the riders had their thoughts on Sanders, who was hit and killed by an armored truck last week while riding her bike on Elm Street.

Police say Rafael Sevilla, 25, of Indian Orchard was driving the truck that struck Sanders. He will not be facing any charges, according to Northampton police, who added that Sevilla was extremely distraught and had to be hospitalized after the accident.

Marvin Ward, a member of the statewide board of MassBike said, "The plans for the ride grew out of an impromptu gathering of about fifty people, some of whom knew Meg and some of whom did not."

"It was truly a spontaneous and collective planning, one person suggested that the best memorial would be a ride, another suggested combining it with the traditional last Friday of the month Critical Mass Ride. Another suggested that we follow the route Meg would have followed had she and her life not been cut off," said Ward.

Crowds of bicyclists from around the region gathered to hold a bike ride in honor of Margaret "Meg" Sanders, a local bicyclist who was struck and killed by a truck last week. Each bicyclist wears a black armband to symbolize their grief.

One rider, Jennifer Wadsworth, who knew Sanders from the Mass Red Ribbon ride, a ride that benefits AIDS organizations, said, "Meg did more at 23 for people than most people do in their entire lives. If you met her for the first time and she smiled, you would fall in love with her."

Another rider who was the team captain for the Mass Red Ribbon Ride, Esti Milam, said, "I ride that hill everyday, I live on Green Street. I am here to support safety on the road."

One rider traveled as far as Boston to take part in honoring Sanders.

"We have to make the road safe, draw attention to that," said Andi Genser.

Not everyone knew Sanders. Janna Richards said, "I didn't know her but she did a lot of volunteer work for the com-

College students most at risk for identity theft

By DESTINY REMEZAS
DAILY EGYPTIAN (SOUTHERN ILLINOIS U.)

CARBONDALE, Ill. — Keeping personal information confidential can be best to prevent identity theft, Illinois Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka said. Southern Illinois University is starting to identify ways to make this easier for students.

Cergio Brown, a sophomore studying accounting, had no problem displaying his student identification card. He had his student ID number removed from it.

Of the 9.9 million U.S. citizens expected to fall victim to identity theft, people ages 18 to 29 are at the highest risk, Topinka said at an identity theft seminar at the Carbondale (Ill.) Civic Center Wednesday.

Students' social security numbers are used as their student ID number at the University, unless a student requests a different number. The number is then printed on bills and some mail from the University.

"I can't believe they haven't thought of anything to change that," Brown said.

Anne DeLuca, assistant vice chancellor of Student Affairs, said a request for a proposal to change the student ID system is being created. However, she said changing the University's system could cost between $5 and $10 million and won't happen immediately.

While she said she does not know when it will be complete, incoming students would be the first to get the new numbers and current students would have their numbers changed over.

"Random, that is our goal," DeLuca said. "All students, randomly generated in number."

Both First Southern Bank and Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity sponsored seminars to educate people and raise awareness about the threat of identity theft.

"We have to help our younger generation keep control of their information," Topinka said.

Topinka said there are many things people can do to keep their personal information safe, like shredding documents and being watchful of purses and wallets.

Besides checking their credit reports, Topinka said, students should be aware about how their personal information is used. She also said getting a student ID card without the number on it is a good idea.

The University allows students, free of charge, to get a student ID card without their number displayed. They also allow students to change their ID number to a randomly assigned number, if they request it.

To protect his identity, Brown said he shreds all of his important documents.

Morgan McDonald, a junior studying fire science management from Chicago, said he worries about all his personal information that SIUC uses and has family members help protect him against identity theft.

About 20 minutes after the fire was extinguished, the building appeared to have suffered minimal damage. However, two dryers and several clothes were visibly damaged in the blaze. However, Hoyle said no official damage assessments were available as of press time.

The Amherst Electrical Inspector was expected to assess the damage late last night.

The cause of the fire is now under investigation.

An 18-year-old man from Woodcliff, N.J. was stabbed in the side. He was treated and released from Baystate Medical.

A third man, an 18-year-old from North Attleboro, was transported by a friend from the scene to the University of Massachusetts Infirmary for a laceration on his forearm. He was treated and released.

At 2:25 a.m., Amherst police responded to an apartment at 17 Southpoint Drive on a report of a man who had been stabbed in the hand. The man was identified only as a 23-year-old Amherst resident. He was treated and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. Police believe his wound was received in the melee on Frat Row.

Police say different injuries indicate that there was more than one weapon used at the scene. The reason for the fight is still unclear and the matter is still under investigation.

No information about the victims was released by police as of press time.

munity and I wanted to honor her by doing this ride."

"She sounded like an amazing person. I didn't know her but I wish that I had," said Yvonne Ting.

Shelia Pecor had a son killed two years ago while he was riding home from work.

"We need to heighten awareness about bicyclists' rights on the roads and bikers' responsibilities," Pecor said. "We need to pass laws to make the roads more accessible to bikers."

"Many people use bikes as their primary form of transportation. Meg didn't have a car and neither did my son," said Pecor.

Michelle Sauve knew Sanders through a mutual friend, love of cycling, and the Mass Red Ribbon Ride.

"I am here to honor Meg's memory. She made a huge impact on my life. She was a very special soul," said Sauve.

"I think there is a lot we can do as a community to watch out for each other. The roads need to be shared and we need to be more aware of each other," said Sauve.

The ride was a chance for community members to come together, with friends of Sanders, as well as people who never had the chance to meet her. There were people crying, laughing, sharing stories and hugging one another.

Before the ride began a bicyclist made an announcement saying, "remember that Meg would have wanted us to have fun." Another bicyclist in the crowd yelled, "this is for you Meg!" and everyone cheered together.

A statement written by the Mayor of Northampton, Clare Higgins was read aloud to the crowd.

"All of us in Northampton are stunned and deeply saddened by the tragic accident that took Meg Sanders from her family, friends and colleagues far too early. The poet Mary Oliver asked, 'Tell me, what is it you plan to do/ with your one wild and precious life?' Meg's answer was clear and consistent: I will help," wrote Higgins.

Sanders lost both of her parents to AIDS in the early 1990s when they lived in Chattanooga, Tenn. She dedicated much of her life to AIDS research and helping others who suffered from the illness.

"[Meg] helped countless people with HIV and AIDS through her fundraising, advocacy and the simple human connection she offered to people in need. She held out her hand to help women and children battered by circumstances, poverty and abuse. She was committed to building a better world and treading lightly upon it," Higgins added.

Sanders also worked at a women's homeless shelter in Northampton and volunteered her time at a domestic abuse violence hotline.

James Lowenthal, the president of the Pioneer Valley chapter of MassBike, said, "it's a peaceful celebration of bicycling and of Meg's life. It coincides with the monthly Northampton Critical Mass ride. Usually Critical Mass rides are free-form, with no set route."

The ride lasted until 8 p.m. after the riders met up with Sanders' two older sisters in Easthampton and returned back to Pulaski Park.

On Wednesday at 7 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge. The Student Government Coordinating Council will ratify the elections tonight at 7 p.m. in the SGA office.

At the first senate meeting, the senate will vote to break a tie between four commuter candidates who all received 4 votes. Newly-sworn in senators will hear presentations by the four tied candidates, and they will vote for all but one of the students to enter senate.

The tied students are Brian Whalley, Davi Synnott, Berkley Myers, and Jamie Corliss. Corliss and Whalley both served in senate for the 2004-2005 year.

Speaker Sean Bliss says there are several changes that he is looking forward to which will improve the effectiveness of the Senate.

"By having our meetings in the Cape Cod Lounge the Senate will have an increased amount of visibility for the student body and hopefully it will encourage more students to get involved with the many issues on campus," said Bliss.

Payano also plans to appoint a variety of presidential committees that will increase the impact senators will have on the quality of student life at UMass. He will announce the titles of those committees at this Wednesday's senate meeting.

"We're looking forward to a busy, productive year," said Payano.

Civilization vs. barbarism

Jeff Napolitano

This past Thursday, Sept. 29, students opposed to the illegal wars of the United States staged a demonstration against military recruiters at Holyoke Community College. These students are part of the anti-war coalition at HCC and decided that one of the key components to stopping such wars is to oppose the attempt to suck young people into it. So when the Army came to campus to recruit, these students set out with signs and flyers to do some (nonviolent) counter-recruiting. On Saturday, I talked to Charles Peterson, a member of the anti-war coalition, who confirmed the reports of the demonstration. He explained some of the context of what went on.

Last year, according to campusantiwar.net, the HCC student government passed a resolution banning military recruitment on campus. They did this in part because their school has a policy of non-discrimination, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. The military's ban on citizens who are openly gay/lesbian clearly violates that policy. Harvard Law School banned military recruitment from its campus based upon the same principle, although when threatened with loss of federal funding, recently reversed their decision, citing a potential loss of $400 million in subsidies.

So when the military set up a table last week at HCC, the students were there with signs and chants, such as, "Relief Not War," "College Not Combat" and "Bring the Troops Home." Several involved students went to the recruitment table and were ignored by the recruiters as they offered flowers, asked to sign up (while professing homosexuality), and chanted. At that point, members of the College Republicans at HCC, who were standing by and taunting the protestors, moved to the table and began pushing them.

Here's where the situation really became Orwellian: although it was the College Republicans who initiated the violence, the police who were standing by rushed in and began ordering and pushing around the protestors. A "Cops are Hypocrites" sign being held by a protestor was grabbed by the police from behind the line; when he tried to get it back, a group of officers grabbed him and began pulling him over the line. At this point, Peterson said he stepped in and wrapped his arms around the kid to prevent him from being pulled over the line. Three security guards then grabbed Peterson, and while two held his arms, a third officer, Scott Landry, held a bottle to Peterson's face and maced him.

Does anyone really believe the military is doing the student body any good by pretending that playing "Halo 2" out the back of a pimped out Hummer is what you'll expect as you get your limbs blown off in Iraq?

A suspicious twist to the situation is that Landry is also an advisor to the College Republican Club. He is the third advisor in the past year, after another advisor left the school due to his involvement in an "Affirmative Action Bake Sale" (a demonstration by the College Republicans meant to criticize Affirmative Action policies). That Landry was involved in a dispute between two groups (one of which he was advising) implies a direct conflict of interest; that he was guilty of macing a student, and the only officer who used such force, should bring about immediate censure and an investigation into his actions.

If we lived in a rational, intelligent world, in which violence and blind authority were looked down upon, we would expect a strong condemnation of police action and immediate remediation by the HCC administration. If we lived in a sane, compassionate world, in which those who peacefully and loudly oppose wholesale death and destruction were applauded, then those anti-war protestors would receive an apology and the military would receive a swift kick in the ass off campus.

But we don't live in that world. We live in a world in which Peterson, the maced student, received a restraining order from campus police. We live in a world in which the administration allows its police to attack members of the student body with impunity. We live in a world in which President Messner of HCC, a moral coward, gets on TV and talks about the possibility of losing federal aid if the recruiters are not allowed to prey upon the student body.

In a press release from HCC, Messner neglected to mention that due to a 1999 amendment to the Solomon Amendment, financial aid cannot be revoked from a school, regardless of whether recruiters are allowed on campus or not. The Pentagon could presumably withhold research funding, but given that HCC is not a research university, one would think that Messner would put the school's own nondiscrimination policy, the will of the student body and basic morality above such a threat.

The situation of students in Holyoke should strike a chord with students at UMass Amherst. "The military is coming to HCC because of the vulnerable members of society that go here," Peterson said. The working-class, underprivileged nature of many in the student body is an opportunity of which the military takes advantage.

Peterson surmised, "You wouldn't see this same reaction at Smith, or Mount Holyoke." Although the student population at UMass is from a more privileged background, the military certainly has targeted the school for recruitment. On any given warm day, you'll find the black and red (camouflaged?) Hummer on HCC's campus, with its built-in PS/2 video games and expensive LCD screens. Does anyone really believe the military is doing the student body any good by pretending that playing "Halo 2" out the back of a pimped out Hummer is what you'll expect as you get your limbs blown off in Iraq?

While our government is engaged in illegal actions around the globe, we have to make a decision: which world do we want to live in? Do we want to be those who sanction violence and death, or do we want to be with those that oppose it? With the majority of the people in the U.S. currently opposed to the Iraqi war, there's plenty of opportunity to be on the side of the rational and compassionate.

You can start by attending the UMass Anti-war Coalition meeting today, at 3 p.m. in the Graduate Lounge in the Campus Center. Members from the HCC branch will be there, and will tell you about the kind of world we should live in. I suggest those concerned with determining what kind of world we should live in attend, for there are few opportunities in which the choice between "civilization" and "barbarism" is so clear.

Some fuel for thought

Debbie Friedman

Recently, a really strange thing happened to me. For the first time, I heard George W. Bush make a statement and instead of cringing or laughing, I found myself agreeing with him. This past week Bush urged Americans to conserve energy and fuel as much as possible. Of course this is not a unique or bold statement for a wartime president to make, but it was a necessary call to American citizens. As a nation who is simultaneously in the midst of a war and dealing with the effects of two horrible hurricanes, I don't think we can afford to ignore the call that the president has made. However, in this chaotic, fast paced, self-absorbed country, I find myself doubting our generations' ability to voluntarily make a sacrifice.

In the past, war affected everyone and it seemed to mean a whole lot more than it does to our seemingly jaded population. In the past week, how many times have you stopped to reflect on the lives lost due to this war? If you are like me or any other average American, that answer is probably very small. That doesn't mean that we are cold-hearted people, it is merely a reflection on our society. In this country, we are all so consumed with our lives it is easy to get lost in our little bubbles, avoiding the harsh realities of the world. After a hard day of class or work why would we want to tune in to hear about all the travesties occurring in Iraq when we could laugh at the new episode of "Family Guy" or catch up on the drama in "Laguna Beach"?

I agree that it sucks to have to pay almost double the amount we did last year to fill up our cars, but at least your car isn't floating down a river in Louisiana.

Yet, despite how busy we are or how unengaged in politics some of us may be, everyone is quick to express their outrage with the current price of gas. While I am not arguing that this expression is irrational, I have a problem with all the complaining. Prices are rising because our demands for gas are so enormous. That demand combined with oil facilities being devastated by Katrina and Rita is causing this fuel crisis and Americans are feeling the direct effects. I agree that it stinks to have to pay almost double the amount we did last year to fill up our cars, but at least your car isn't floating down a river in Louisiana.

Yes, it is ridiculous that this administration seems to be taking little action to find ways to resolve the problem, but let's remember that we are at war. No one is forcing us to put our lives on hold to go over seas and fight. No one is forcing us to give up necessities or luxuries like in past wars either. In fact, no one is even asking. What is being asked is that we try and control our consumption of fuel because right now the demand is only making matters worse. Simple sacrifices like walking to town instead of driving, carpooling and limiting unnecessary trips for the time being could significantly help.

Living in this country means having the right to make ridiculous purchases and having the choice to drive somewhere rather than walk. We don't have to worry about a dictator enforcing consumption limitations, but that doesn't mean we can't limit ourselves. However, do we really have the willpower to do so? If we did, would my neighbors buy two Ford Expeditions when they only have little Davey in the back seat? If we did, would so many people drive down the hill to the dining commons instead of walking? We have men and women overseas right now making the ultimate sacrifice, yet if it came down to it, could we make even the most minute of sacrifices?

I realize that talking about sacrifices is a lot easier than making them. No matter how many times I remind myself of the current situation I am still going to want to drive into town rather than walk, especially when the cold weather comes. But since we are students who can't take time off to go help in Iraq or New Orleans and don't have much money to send either, perhaps our debt to society could be paid in sacrifice. Drive a little less, walk a little more and don't take three cars out when you only need one. It might seem insignificant, but if everyone does it, it's going to make a difference. As for me agreeing with George, well, don't expect that to happen again.

What is a 'real' Asian?

Katelyn Harding

I have heard on more than one occasion that I am not a "real" Asian because I do not speak the language. Nobody has the right to tell me something like that. Do they think that I was born and decided, "Oh, I am going to be adopted and become ignorant to the culture I am being born into?" I'm sorry, but I think the only ignorant people are the ones who make comments such as these.

Who are they to tell me that I'm not a "real" Asian? OK, then you are not a "real" white person, because I can guarantee you are 25 percent Irish, 25 percent Scottish, etc. You are not 100 percent, and at least I have that on you. If you have Irish in you and you don't speak with an accent, does that not make you a "real" Irish person? Not in the least. It's the same as my situation. I was born in Seoul, Korea and adopted as an infant and have lived in Massachusetts the rest of my 21-year-old life. What amazes me is that throughout my life, people have asked me to choose a side, white or Asian. As if I even had the choice.

It comes down to this: although we all know that the theory of America being a "melting pot" is crap, we can at least try to get some truth from it.

In one of my classes, we are discussing the issue of racism. Would you consider yourself racist? You would like to think you could honestly say no, but everyone has their biased opinions of others upon first glance, first meeting, etc. There always has been, and there always will be racism in America, whether we admit it or not. Recently I viewed the movie "Crash," and I was interested to see how gritty, graphic and honest it was. The movie plays upon every stereotype one can think of, but in reality, I am sure that more than one of you has had the exact same thoughts run through your head.

I cannot describe the number of times some idiot has come up to me and asked if I'm Chinese, and finding out that, gasp, I'm not, then, "what am I?" As if China was the only Asian country that existed. Or how many times I've been asked if I know karate, because obviously all Asians know karate. In Korea it's not karate, it's tae kwon do. All the Asians that are in movies are type-casted as kung-fu masters (Bruce Lee, Jet Li, Jackie Chan even Lucy Liu and Bai Ling).

The only Asian actress that I can think of who has managed to fight this stereotype is Sandra Oh, who appeared in the movies "Sideways" and "Under the Tuscan Sun" and the television show "Grey's Anatomy." Otherwise, we are all wicked smart martial arts masters who like taking a lot of pictures.

Currently, at the University of North Dakota, the NCAA is deciding on the University's appeal of an NCAA ruling that the school's "Fighting Sioux" nickname and logo is "hostile or abusive." Two Sioux Indian nations have voiced opposition to the "Fighting Sioux" nickname and the United Tribes of North Dakota has notified the NCAA of its rejection of the logos, according to USA Today.

Native Americans are another group who are most always type-casted. In a study discussed in my class, a group of children were asked to draw a picture of a Native American. Stunned, the children did not know what to draw. Then they were asked to draw a picture of an Indian, and the crayons were flying all over the paper, drawing feathers on the head, tomahawks in hand, you get my drift.

Now I understand that these are only children, but are these children going to grow up ignorant to other peoples' cultures their entire lives? For the most part, none of us cared or knew about anyone else's culture but our own. My high school was predominantly white, but coming to UMass has led me to meet and embrace so many different people and their cultures. One of my best friends is Bosnian, and it is so interesting to listen to him talk about his culture, his food and his religion. It's more refreshing to learn about different cultures than to be stuck in White America.

It comes down to this: although we all know that the theory of America being a "melting pot" is crap, we can at least try to get some truth from it. But it's up to you as individuals to make that change. In the words of John Lennon, "Living is easy with eyes closed, misunderstanding all you see." Keep your eyes open; this life is a lot more colorful than just white.

Katelyn Harding is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

PALESTINE ALSO IN OUR THOUGHTS

Upon reading "Is Israel in our thoughts?" by Bonnie Solomon, published on Sept. 29, I started to think, why should Israel be in my thoughts, more so than any other country in the world? I mean, is Saudi Arabia in everyone's thoughts, or Fiji, Tanzania or Chile? Granted that diversifying from the unfortunate trend of nationalism, of concentrating on only your own nation and paying attention to other countries is very important, but every individual has their own choice of what they want to concentrate on.

I understand that a lot of Jewish-Americans have been on the Birthright Israel trip and have a special connection with Israel, which is not the land of their parents' or grandparents' birth like other immigrants, but is a "Jewish nation" which they can call home if they choose to do so. But the way Solomon presented the article and the reasons she thinks should make us think about Israel are very one-sided and also offensive to an extent. The sentence that was highlighted for example, "it was so painful to see my people being forced out of a synagogue and into trucks to take them away from their homes only to have Palestinians move into them," proved particularly offensive.

Firstly, are Palestinians also not people like the Israelis, with families and pets and dreams? Why should they always be grouped into this sub-human category of people living on the fringes of society, which happens not just in Israel but also in other Middle Eastern countries? Secondly, the Gaza Strip was originally Palestinian land and was occupied by the Israeli military. It was supposed to be given back decades ago and Israel was legally not allowed to build on it or settle its citizens there. But they did so anyway and a lot of Israeli families started to call it home while the Palestinians who were evicted from there lived in refugee camps or had to be immigrants in other countries.

Why is one of the major acts of goodwill by the Israeli government such an inhumane and painful act for Solomon? Americans should have vocalized this criticism of the Israeli government when Israel started to build suburbs on someone else's land in defiance of many U.N. resolutions and against the wishes of every world nation with the exception of the U.S. In that case there would not have been this awful eviction of people because they would never have called it home in the first place.

In my experience almost all American channels paint a very favorable image of Israel as a Jewish homeland with nice neighborhoods and white fences where many young Americans spend a lot of time, like Solomon herself, as well as friends of mine. In terms of Israel's highly negative portrayal in the media, I would really like to learn where this is, with the exception of maybe Al-Jazeera and BBC to some extent.

However, the image of Palestinians is one of an extreme, fundamentalist group of people who have no tact, rationale or understanding of the world. All they know is how to blow people up and create panic and terror. It is no surprise that on more than once occasion I have seen people dressed up as "terrorists" with Palestinian flags or Arab headscarves, on Halloween here in the otherwise very educated and liberal Pioneer Valley area. So the question I would like to ask Solomon is if Palestine is also in her thoughts? And if it is then as what?

Starless 'Serenity' still shines

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

Is world peace really possible, or do the conflicting passions of competition, desire and sheer selfishness make a utopia impossible?

This is the core question at the heart of the aptly titled "Serenity," the starless sci-fi action flick now in theaters. The film is about a futuristic society of humans who inhabit multiple planets that are governed by "the alliance." The alliance is involved in conspiratorial evils of which a young girl named River Tan, a mentally disturbed psychic, becomes aware of after reading the thoughts of key members of the bureaucracy. When this is discovered she is deemed an enemy of the state along with the members of the spaceship, called Serenity, in which she and her brother Simon travel. The other members of the crew don't realize at first that the girl they are harboring is not only a fugitive, but a very dangerous individual. In other words, enemies beware, it's kung fu fighting time.

"Serenity"
Directed by Joss Whedon
Starring Nathan Fillion, Gina Torres, Alan Tudyk
Universal Studios
Grade B+

The main enemy of this crew of space travelers, played by Chiwetel Ejiofor, is a member of the alliance and a man who believes he does evil because it is necessary (he is an actor we'll being seeing more of for sure.) The bad guys who exist in this universe and torture, rape and eat their victims alive are called Reavers and bear a strong resemblance to the "orcs" of "The Lord of the Rings." They are feared by all and make for a decent body count. If anyone is caught by a Reaver it is considered humane to kill the victim before the Reavers have a shot at him or her.

"Serenity" is written and directed by Joss Whedon, whose passion for the material comes through loud and clear. The special effects are excellent and well-placed and the dialogue is full of humor that brings this film to life. The basic message of the film is very compelling: is serenity among humans ever really possible? The film would have us believe that love is the answer to happiness. Sure, it is, but does it eradicate sin?

The film is slightly muddled on this notion. At one point Malcolm Reynolds, the ship's captain, says to Ejiofor's character, "I'm going to show you a world without sin." Even in the future this is a giant stretch of the imagination. So, then, what does the film proclaim? In the last few minutes of the film, Reynolds goes on about the essentialness of love, which alludes to serenity among peoples. Then, all of a sudden, something goes wrong with the ship and this is the final stamp of comment the film makes.

This is a film that doesn't take itself too seriously, to such an extent that, in the last moment of the film, it is willing to subvert everything we thought it was trying to attain. Serenity in the universe seemed to be the film's aim. It makes the film seem slightly unfocused and the viewer wonders where this final statement was for the last two hours. But it's a humorous take of the film's subject matter. And after all, it's just a movie, right? Its chief aim is to entertain us.

In this area, it does a wonderful and accomplished job. It's difficult to believe that after "The Matrices," the "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon" slew of films and the Jet Li movies, anyone could be newly impressed with kung fu action, but the fighting in "Serenity" is supremely cool. Not only that, but the action sequences are tight and exhilarating. "Serenity" bristles with a fun-loving wit, and a great sense of storytelling ingenuity. Just because it's starless and gives up on its point, doesn't mean it can't outshine the other star-packed vehicles in the theaters that everyone is scrambling to see.

The cast of Joss Whedon's "Serenity" may not be the biggest names, but their performances are memorable.

BMAs highlight city's talent

The casual collection of local stars that stopped by the Avalon Club last Wednesday for the annual Boston Music Awards proved to be the most informal gathering that the show has had in its 18-year history.

The event parked musicians alongside critics alongside fans to form what seemed more of the atmosphere of a family reunion. The intimate ambience seemed to fit for a local award show, and the celebration truly marked a show in Boston, by and for the city's best.

The night's major winner, singer/songwriter and smoky vocalist Ray LaMontagne won three BMAs. LaMontagne, however, was not present to accept his awards.

Local rockers the Dropkick Murphys and hip-hop specialists the Perceptionists also picked up a pair of awards.

The true highlight of the show, however, came from performances from some lesser known groups. One in particular, the Vermont-based band Grace Potter and the Nocturnals, lit up the Avalon stage. With a blues driven gospel tune Potter caught the attention of the crowd, including a few straggling smokers who rushed in from outside when they heard Potter. Her soul-filled vocals were enough to inspire a standing ovation from her fans and peers.

Following Potter's performance, folk singer/songwriter Lori McKenna was given the award for the best female singer/songwriter, exclaiming that she has five children, but still formed a "girl crush" after seeing Grace Potter perform.

Perhaps Boston's most well-noted blues singer, Weepin' Willie Robinson, gave a remarkable performance as well. Backed by a band that included James Montgomery, the 79-year-old Robinson held his own. The band was begged back by the crowd for a memorable encore performance.

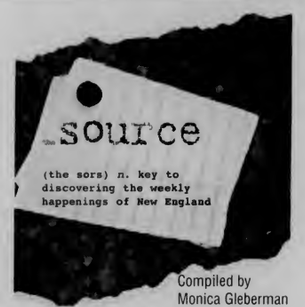
A Hall of Fame Award was presented to perennial rockers, the Neighborhoods. Aerosmith's Joey Kramer and Tom Hamilton handed out the award to the 'Hoods before the band played a roaring four song set to the delight of a large group of admiring fans. The punk rock presence of the 'Hoods was another addition to the familial, close-knit vibe that surrounded this year's BMAs.

The biggest party foul, however, came from N'Sync's Chris Kirkpatrick, who gave out the best local male vocalist award to Jake Brennan. In his announcements of the nominees, Kirkpatrick mispronounced that name as Jack Brennan, and again, after the crowd had very vocally corrected him. Kirpatrick announced the winner to be Jack Brennan. Aftercrowd's boos simmered, Brennan quipped, "I'm accepting this on behalf of Jack, who couldn't be here tonight."

The entire Brennan family seemed to be well-represented on the night. Dennis Brennan, Jake's dad, took home his own Boston Music Award in the Roots/Americana category.

The Dropkick Murphys, creators of the Red Sox most recent anthem, "Tessie," received the night's biggest award Wednesday for act of the year. Meanwhile, the Red Sox were battling across the street in an attempt to prevent a loss to the Toronto Blue Jays.

Other major winners included country freshman Sarah Borges for local debut album, and the Click Five for new local act. Averi won for local pop/rock band of the year, and Dear Leader took home the award for local album of the year.



Lost City Angels won for local punk group, but they were quick to denounce their categorization as punk.

"We're a hard rock band," said Adam Shaw.

Killswitch Engage was a surprise winner for hard rock act of the year, while the Dresden Dolls won for best live act. Lead singer Amanda Palmer also won for local female vocalist.

Folk singer Lori McKenna was given the Boston Music Award for best female singer/songwriter.

Redshirt freshman Chris Brown and the UMass men's soccer team shutout Siena 2-0 on Saturday. Brown has started 10 games in 2005.

Lemire is also at the front of the pack with four goals on the season. He has stepped up for UMass as senior captain Oral Bullen continues to have a quiet offensive season.

Both teams battled back and forth to a scoreless first half. With two minutes to go in the half it looked as if Siena had scored first but the shot was called off because of an offside violation.

Then UMass took the 1-0 lead at the 52:42 minute mark of the second half. Freshman Prince Ofusu sent a crossing pass into the goal box where it found Cook. The sophomore defender headed the ball from five yards out into the right corner of the Siena net.

The assist was the fifth of the season for Ofusu. He is by far the team leader in that category for the Minutemen. He has more than double the number of assists (two) than senior Oral Bullen and freshman Douglas Rappaport who are tied for second on the team.

Lemire tallied the Minutemen's insurance goal with just under a minute to go in the game.

Lemire scored his fourth goal of the season when he was able to get behind the Siena defense on a breakaway opportunity. He made the most of his wide open chance as he flipped a shot that ricocheted off of Saints' goalie Patrick Henry.

Siena made it a game right to the very end. Billman, however, made sure the Minutemen did not relinquish their lead. He was able to fend off a flurry of Saints' shots in the final 15 minutes of play.

Saturday's match was the last non-conference game of 2005 for the Minutemen. Following a week off the Maroon and White open up the Atlantic 10 schedule against the Rhode Island Rams on Oct. 9 at Rudd Field.

them into some weird defending positions and it worked very well. We really stretched their defense. We were a little scared of what would happen in the back, but our system opened it up so much that they had to take players out of the front and worry about us."

While the move didn't result in any first half goals for either team, UMass was able to put Fordham (6-5 0-2 A-10) on its heels with its new attacking style, and was finally able to break through early in the second half.

Midfielder Caitlin Footit, in the lineup for Tiffany Hamill, who was injured earlier in the game, scored her first goal of the season on a header off of a Canfield cross.

Rudy made some moves late in the game to help UMass preserve the 1-0 lead. After defender Tina Rodriguez picked up yellow card midway through the second half, Rudy moved Kaelyn Caldwell from the midfield to the backline to sure up the defense.

Rudy also brought in midfielder Nadia Villarroel to control the left flank in Hamill's absence and senior forward Adair Blyler to add some experience up front and control the clock.

The moves proved effective, as Fordham was unable to net the equalizer.

UMass finished the weekend on a positive note yesterday, defeating St. Bonaventure 2-0. Both teams went scoreless in the first half, but it was only a matter of time before the Minutewoman offense broke through, as UMass outshot the Bonnies 12-5 in the first frame.

UMass got a break when St. Bonaventure's Kristin Sotak was given a red card and ejected for elbowing midfielder Lindsey Bellini three minutes into the second half. Playing a player up for the rest of the game proved to be an advantage, as UMass was able to net two goals in the second half to secure the victory.

Roehrig scored the first goal with just over 27 minutes remaining, putting a shot over the head of the goalie from in front. Blyler and midfielder Morgan Czaja were credited with assists.

Forward Vanessa Lima added an insurance goal with 10 minutes to go, taking a pass from Bellini and putting a shot inside the far post. The blanking was the second shutout of the season for goalie Kristin Walker, and her fifth of the season.

Things have been up-and-down all year, but after getting off to a good start in league play, the Minutewomen are feeling confident.

"It's definitely a positive [the two wins]," Roehrig said. "This weekend was great. We played hard, and we always want to win on our home field."

Sophomore Tina Rodriguez, who plays defense for the UMass women's soccer team, was a key factor in the Minutewomen's two shutouts over the weekend. Rodriguez has started every contest for UMass this season.

in mind. Shea feels the team is prepared to make waves this year in the Atlantic 10.

"I think we're very prepared [for conference play]," Shea said. "We're setup up for our first road trip [at Richmond and St. Louis] where were take on a few big opponents, and we would like to set the standard early with a few wins."

Richmond, which fell to No.1 Wake Forest over the weekend, is currently No. 19 on the national poll and will be a difficult first test for the Minutewomen. However, the team is not treating the contest any different than their other conference match ups.

"I don't know that [Richmond] will be our toughest opponent," Shea said. "St. Louis is a good team, West Chester has been playing great, and Rhode Island as well. We have a young team who understands the pressures of playing in games situations."

Coming into conference play, UMass has one more win than it did at this point in 2004, but Shea feels the progress is much more significant.

"We are definitely a better team than last year," She said. "We are more skilled, we are playing at a sophisticated level, and for most part we have been very consistent. We have had moments of individual lapses that have hurt us late in games, but as a whole we are a much better team this year."

X-C competes at large meet

Crossing the line first for the Maroon and White was sophomore Christina Derosa, who placed 75th out of 310 runners. Junior Erin O'Donnell finished 184th, and junior Cuisle Kierans finished 198th. Sophomore Ashley Davidson placed 240th, and sophomore Amanda Bodette finished 258th. Rounding out the top seven was senior Suzanne Simmons in 290th place, and freshman Lauren Noreen in 300th.

"We still need to step it up, not everybody on the team did good. [Some] got lost in the size of the race," LeFreniere said. "It was a very good experience for our young team."

A positive outcome of this meet, according to LeFreniere, is that the Minutewomen got used to a big meet, which they will be facing next weekend at the New England Championships.

The Minutewomen ran a 6,000-meter course as opposed to their usual 5,000 meters.

"Team-wise didn't think [our finish] was where we would be. A couple of athletes are disappointed," LeFreniere said. "After race today have a better idea on what we have to work on. We need to learn from it and then move on. In the future [we] need to include better competition like this, it makes them better."

LeFreniere said that they have to get their nerves under control so they can run at their potential. She said they didn't have it all together.

"We've got to step it up a notch," LeFreniere said. "Our goal is the A-10 Championship."

Red Sox clinch wild-card spot

won the season series 6-4.

Cleveland's game ended when Jason Varitek was at-bat in the bottom of the fifth. Red Sox management hugged in their box seats next to the field, and owner John Henry passed the word along to the dugout.

By the time this one was over, the starters were out of the game and the much-anticipated season finale had the look of a spring training game, except for the chill in the air and the anticipation of a possible playoff rematch if both can get past their first-round opponents.

After Varitek singled, the Fenway video screen showed a shot of the manual scoreboard at the base of the Green Monster. The "9" next to the White Sox and Indians score came out, indicating a final, and the sold-out crowd stood and cheered.

Doug Mirabelli also homered for Boston, making it 10-1 in the sixth with a three-run shot that bounced off the base of the flagpole that holds the 2004 World Series Champion pennant.

The Red Sox have not repeated as World Series champions since 1915-16.

Now they'll have a chance.

The Red Sox counted the last three outs with giant numbers on an outfield scoreboard. Many of the fans had left because of the blowout, but they cheered each pitch to Bubba Crosby and when he struck out looking to end the game, the players poured out of the dugout for a celebration on the mound.

The outfield scoreboards posted matching messages, one congratulating the Yankees and one congratulating the Red Sox.

Jaret Wright (5-5) subbed for Mike Mussina, who will start the Yankees series against the Angels instead, but Jason Giambi was the only other New York regular to take the day off. Wright allowed three runs, three hits and five walks in 3 1-3 innings.

He left after Bill Mueller homered and Tony Graffanino walked starting a five-run fourth inning. Johnny Damon singled and, one out later, David Ortiz got his major league-leading 148th RBI.

But the big hit in the inning came from Ramirez, who even hustled around the bases — after his usual pause to watch the ball bounce into the center-field bleachers, of course. It was his 45th homer of the year, matching a career high; he has nine homers and 19 RBIs in his last 12 games.

Ramirez also threw out Jeter when he tried to stretch a Wall shot into a double in the first. Jeter slid headfirst into second base and walked off the field gingerly but stayed in the game until the fourth. The Yankees announced that he was taken out so that he could keep his knee iced as a precaution.

Although the Yankees had a chance to avoid a trip to California after the game, their victory on Saturday deprived the ballpark of the drama of the winner-take-all playoff in 1978 — 27 years ago to the day — that Bucky Dent won with his popup into the Green Monster's net.

Schilling gave up singles to three of the first four hitters, but Jeter was erased on Ramirez's play and the others were stranded when Hideki Matsui grounded out to first.

NOTES: The Red Sox had never made the playoffs in three consecutive years before. Additional rounds were played starting in 1969 and '95. ... Wright was hit on the mound in each of his three previous starts, twice by line drives and once by a broken bat. ... Alex Rodriguez was the only Yankee to play every game this season. ... Schilling tied Mickey Lolich on the all-time strikeout list with 2,832. ... The Red Sox hold a 36-35 edge over the Yankees since the start of the 2003 season. They've each won one AL pennant. ... Ramirez, who also walked twice, was 17-for-44, a .386 batting average in his last 12 games. ... Ortiz had a single, two walks, a strikeout and ended the season with a .300 batting average (.2995008). ... Rodriguez went 0-for-3 and won the AL home run race over Ortiz 48-47. A-Rod batted .321 with 130 RBIs. ... Rodriguez and Jeter finished first and second in runs scored in the AL, the first time the Yankees accomplished that since 1961 when Mickey Mantle and Roger Maris each scored 132 runs.

Chargers 'Brees' past Patriots

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — This was finally the week the New England Patriots couldn't plug the holes left by injuries — not against Drew Brees and San Diego's explosive offense.

The Chargers handed the Patriots their first loss at Gillette Stadium in 22 games Sunday, beating them 41-17 as Brees threw for two touchdowns, LaDainian Tomlinson ran for two more and Antonio Gates had six catches for 108 yards.

It was the first loss in Foxborough for the Patriots since Dec. 22, 2002, when they were beaten by the New York Jets. That was the only season in the last four that they failed to win the Super Bowl.

The last time the Patriots started a season 2-2 was 2003, though they went on to win the title that year anyway.

It could have been the weather — the temperature at game time was a San Diego-like 73 degrees.

But it also was the missing Patriots — the first time in three years it seemed apparent that New England couldn't just plug in bodies to replace fallen starters.

Though the game was tied 17-all at the half, Brees took advantage of a secondary that already was already without two of its top three cornerbacks and now is without safety Rodney Harrison, lost for the year with a knee injury. Harrison's absence was clearly felt on one play in the third quarter when backup running back Michael Turner ran right through Harrison's replacement, Guss Scott, on the way to an 18-yard pickup.

That drive ended with a 28-yard touchdown pass to Reche Caldwell that gave San Diego (2-2) a 31-17 lead. Brees also had an 11-yard touchdown pass to Keenan McCardell in the second quarter.

Gates, a former basketball player, also leaped over Scott to take in a 58-yard pass from Brees at the New England 1 on the first series of the second half. That set up a 1-yard touchdown run by Faulk, that broke that 17-all halftime tie.

UMass shuts Siena out

By JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts' men's soccer team (4-6) was finally able to break out of its three game losing streak, and gain just their second road victory over the year with a 2-0 win over Siena (2-5) in Loudenville, N.Y. on Saturday.

Before Saturday the last time the Minutemen had tasted victory was on Sept. 18 when they blanked Navy 2-0. That game against the Midshipmen is also the only other shutout that UMass has posted this season.

Over that span UMass had been outscored by their opponents 7-1. The Minutemen were also out shot by a count of 35-23.

That all changed on Saturday when the Minutemen were able to pull the offense and defense together to leave Loudenville with a victory.

Although the Saints out shot the Minutemen 11-9, junior Nick Billman didn't let anything reach the back of the net. In his second game back from a separated shoulder Billman made five saves on the day.

Goals for the Minutemen were scored by sophomore's Kenny Cook and Matty Lemire. The pair continue to pace UMass' offensive attack.

Cook's goal was his third of the season and third in five games. He also moved into second place on the team with six points, just three behind Lemire.

Along with leading the team in points (9),

Minutewomen even season record at 5-5-1

By DAN DUGGAN

What a difference a week made for the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

Last week, UMass lost three consecutive games at home, and with the first two games of the Atlantic 10 season this weekend, it seemed that the Minutewomen had picked a bad time to struggle.

But UMass (5-5-1 2-0-0 A-10) was able to pick up two wins at home against conference foes, downing Fordham 1-0 on Friday and beating St. Bonaventure 2-0 yesterday.

The Minutewomen will look to continue their winning ways on Saturday when they travel to Rhode Island to take on the Rams.

This weekend's games marked the end of a season-long five-game homestand, during which the Minutewomen went a disappointing 2-3, but UMass coach Jim Rudy was happy that his team was able to begin the conference schedule on a high note.

"It's big," Rudy said of the two wins. "It's a good start [to the conference season]. I still anguish on the ones we missed on; Vermont and Fairfield in particular. But this is a good weekend for the kids."

The Fordham game kicked off the weekend, and the Rams presented a tough opponent for UMass, as they came into the game with a 6-3 record and posed match-up difficulties with a dozen players listed at 5-7 or taller on their roster.

The biggest issue during the Minutewomen's losing streak was an inability to score, as they scored only two goals in the three games. In an attempt to generate more offense, Rudy changed the team's set up, moving midfielder Jenny Roehrig up to left wing.

The move paid off early, as Roehrig teamed up with forwards Britt Canfield and Vanessa Patry, putting pressure on the Fordham defense.

"We took a bit of a gamble," Rudy said. "We attacked in an odd shape and tried to force

On Friday, the Massachusetts field hockey team traveled to Syracuse in the final non-conference game before the first Atlantic 10 match up at Richmond this week. The Minutewomen (3-8) battled hard in the first half and fought to a scoreless tie, but the second half saw the Orange (5-6) pull ahead with two unanswered goals and win their seventh straight against UMass.

Overall it was a complete victory for Syracuse, which outshot UMass 9-2 and did not allow a shot on goal. At 51:24 in the contest, Syracuse's Michelle Sola scored her first goal of the season, and the first of the game, from Jessica Dahle and Meg Ryan. Then at 66:33, the Orange got an insurance goal by Paige Sullivan from Ashley Fry, her seventh goal of the season. The game would end like that, with a 2-0 victory for Syracuse.

"We made some critical mistakes at important points in the game," coach Patty Shea said. "We actually possessed the ball for the bulk of the game, but we were never able to get any penetration upfield."

Freshman forward Erin Parker had the only shot for the Minutewomen in the first half, and senior back Katelyn Woolfrey had one blocked in the second half. The team also had just one penalty corner towards the end of the game.

All but one of UMass' remaining regular season games will be against conference opponents, with the lone non-conference game being home against Dartmouth. With that

Red Sox join Yanks in playoffs after win

By JIMMY GOLEN

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox joined the New York Yankees in the playoffs on Sunday and made their rivals' road just a little tougher.

Reigning World Series MVP Manny Ramirez hit a three-run homer and also threw out Derek Jeter from the outfield on Sunday, and Curt Schilling shut the Yankees down long enough for the Red Sox to beat them 10-1 and clinch the AL wild-card berth.

Boston opens the playoffs Tuesday at Chicago. New York's loss meant it will start the post-season Tuesday at Anaheim rather than at home against the Los Angeles Angels.

Schilling (8-8) held the Yankees scoreless for five innings; by that time, the Cleveland Indians had already lost 3-1 to the Chicago White Sox and assured Boston of the AL's last playoff spot. A day earlier, the Yankees celebrated in Fenway Park's visitor's clubhouse after clinching the AL East.

Boston and New York each finished the year 95-67, and the Yankees took the division title because they beat the Red Sox 10-9 in the season series. The Angels also finished 95-67 and earned the home-field advantage against the Yankees because they

Change is good for UM soccer

When encountering problems in everyday life – be it socially, academically, or, in this case, athletically – the best solution is to move forward, literally.

Having encountered trouble in the final third of the field – that is, finishing the job – the Massachusetts women's soccer team came out last Friday to their home Rudd Field with a new set-up to kick off the Atlantic 10 season.

Head coach Jim Rudy manipulated his 4-4-2 formation around a little bit and, after taking in the results of this weekend, is most likely to stick with his new plan, barring something catastrophic.

See, the Minutewomen (5-5-1) have made a nasty habit out of outshooting and outplaying its opponents, but were seeing nothing in the win column to show for it. Speedster Britt Canfield and freshman sensation Vanessa Patry lead the way in the front and do their best to stretch the defense, but for one reason or another most of the Minutewomen's shots had been going anywhere but into the net.

Enter sophomore Jenny Roehrig, who has been moved from the midfield up to the forward spot with Patry and Canfield, providing more options and spreading opponents' defense out a little more. Kaelyn Caldwell has also been moved up to the midfield from the back, maintaining some presence in the middle.

The result is a 3-4-3 formation, an offensive-oriented attack that had been reaping benefits all weekend for UMass.

On Friday, against an above-average – not to mention tall – Fordham team in the A-10-opener, the Minutewomen were outshot but ended up on the winning end.

The Rams took 14 shots to UMass' 11, but it was one in particular that proved most critical. In the 49th minute, Canfield took a feed from senior co-captain Lindsey Bellini down the left side. Canfield then crossed it to Caitlin Footit, who headed the ball in for her first goal of the season and her first goal in almost a year.

UM, of course, went on to win 1-0.

Yesterday afternoon it was back to the same old, same old – UMass dominating its opponent in a would-be loss. But there was no loss, unless you were a Patriots fan.

The Minutewomen outshot St. Bonaventure 26-11 and uncharacteristically took a 2-0 win against a team that is having an uncharacteristic first half.

And they were two very nice goals, by the way. Roehrig took a pass from ten yards out and, barely facing the goal and pretty much on one leg, flipped a blooper over the head of goalie Lisa Eberhart for the 1-0 lead. Vanessa Lima made it a 2-0 affair when she rolled a feed from Lindsey Bellini past Eberhart.

"It's tricky because he puts Jenny [Rochrig] on the left or the right," Lima said of Rudy's new system. "I guess sometimes the other team thinks 'Oh, we've figured it out, she's only playing on the right side', but then we just switch Jenny to the other side.

"I think it works really well because we have these pockets of open people. We're getting caught offsides a lot, but I think that once we learn the system, we won't go offsides as much."

As for the defense, co-captain Amy Maffucci doesn't feel a sense of vulnerability with just the three of them in back. "Steph [Barrett], Tina [Rodriguez] and I played as defenders together last year, so we're more comfortable with the three-back system," Maffucci said. "The three of us know where each other is."

Cross country teams place 34th and 38th

By JOEY WHITE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts men's cross-country finished 34th out of 44 teams at the Paul Short Invitational this past Saturday. UMass coach Ken O'Brien said that this meet has been added to their schedule because they need to upgrade and look at it as assisting them for the rest of their season and careers.

The Minutemen will be back in action next week at the New England Championships at Franklin Park in Boston.

Finishing first for the Minutemen was sophomore Nils Fischer, placing 142nd out of 300 runners. Senior Ryan Corbett finished just behind Fischer for the 143rd spot, and senior Sean Corbett finished 169th. Freshman Matthew Weissinger came in 191st, and senior Matthew Clark finished 203rd. Rounding out the top seven was junior Walter Biner in 261st place, and senior Andrew McCarron in 289th.

"I think overall, we're disappointed," O'Brien said. "When looked over meet, not satisfied."

O'Brien sat his No. 2 runner, freshman Jesse Regnier, due to an aggravated knee, an injury not believed to be threatening the end of his season.

"There were outstanding teams and runners," O'Brien said. "The biggest and best quality race they have ran."

Although the Maroon and White were frustrated with their results, the top five runners sprinted for their best times of the season.

O'Brien felt that the team ran exceptionally well during the second half of the race, but was a little too conservative in the first half.

"I didn't want them to get caught up in the emotion at the beginning," O'Brien said. "We underplayed our cards a little bit and our result was a lot lower than we thought."

O'Brien viewed this race as helping his team grow as a team and as individuals, and believes it can help them handle the situation better in two weeks when they compete in another large meet in the Penn State Invitational.

The Massachusetts women's cross-country team finished 38th out of 47 teams this weekend at the Paul Short Invitational. This was the biggest race of the season so far for the Minutewomen.

"It was overwhelming," UMass coach Julie LeFreniere said.

Stabbing shocks UMass students

By MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"I heard about it on the radio, just this morning," said Jeffry Gummeson, a computer systems engineering major. "I was just so surprised that anything that bad happened around our campus."

Shock was the main reaction held by many students when they heard about the stabbings that occurred outside a fraternity this weekend.

Police are still investigating the incident and have so far recovered a sharpened screwdriver from the scene of the crime, said Amherst Police Lt. Ronald Young. Police also believe a knife was used in the stabbing, though they have not yet recovered one.

Police suspect that the fight was started by two groups who met at a bar earlier this week. Police also don't believe that the one who did the stabbing was a UMass student. At this time, no arrests have been made.

The stabbings occurred during a fight outside of Pi Delta Psi, involving approximately 6-10 people. Police say alcohol was likely a factor in the fight.

Matthew Zagrodny, a brother of the Zeta Beta Tau, the other fraternity involved in the fight, described the scene as a "melee. There was a huge fight," he said, adding that he had been hit in the ruckus.

"I didn't see anything with the stabbings," Zagrodny said. "There was a lot of drinking going on." Zagrodny left when the police arrived, not wanting to deal with the ensuing mess. "I'm kind of used to fraternity fights, but I've never heard of anyone being stabbed during one."

"It's just shocking," said Tiffani O'Connor, a pre-major in English, who says that she frequents the fraternities, and is glad that, this weekend, she was at home. "It's creepy," she said. "Usually, nothing happens in Amherst, ever."

O'Connor's friend, Meghan Brescher, also a pre-major in English, agreed with these sentiments. "I think that's just scary. I just don't see that coming from a UMass student."

Brescher, who is a New Jersey native, says that she never expected an incident as serious as a stabbing to happen in Amherst. "It seems so random," she said, "and it freaks me out. They make it seem so safe here. I can't believe there was nobody there to stop the fight before it got that bad."

The Interfraternity Council has said in a recent press release that "there is no reason to believe the incident was an example of interfraternal violence."

Amherst common soon to become wireless

By MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amherst will soon be home to a new wireless network according to Town Select Board member, Kristopher Pacunas.

Wireless Internet, or wireless fidelity (Wi-Fi), as it is known by the more technically savvy, is already available in the three Amherst public libraries. Pacunas said that the town saw the success of this venture and decided to set up wireless networks in town hall meeting rooms, the Bangs Community Center meeting rooms and courtyard, the Town Common, and Sweetser Park.

Wireless works by taking high-speed Internet connections and beaming the signal into the air so that people within a certain distance are given Internet access.

In a telephone interview with the Collegian, Pacunas said that the Town Select Board has decided to put in place these wireless options for the good of the public. "We always see people sitting on the deck of Jones Library after it has closed, just to use the wireless Internet." Pacunas said that putting in other wireless hotspots in town seemed like a "natural progression."

The wireless set-up is also relatively cheap, costing the town only $5,500. "It is an inexpensive way to provide convenience to the town, said Pacunas.

"The wireless networks might also help promote business downtown," Pacunas commented, "but the real reason we are doing this is because we have a commitment to providing technology to the people of Amherst. Wireless access is feasible here, so we're going to do it."

THE DAILY COLLEGIAN/MEGAN BARTLETT

The common in the Amherst center is one of several sites that will soon have wireless Internet access.

Pacunas's information technology (IT) crew is still testing and configuring the wireless system, though Pacunas is confident that this phase of the project will end soon. The official "launch date" of the wireless system is Oct. 17, though Pacunas says that time is estimated with a buffer, and hopes that it will be up and running smoothly much sooner. The select board isn't planning any kind of advertising coverage of the wireless switch and is depending on word of mouth to spread the information.

Pacunas plans to have his IT department install antennas designed by Cisco for covering large areas. In the libraries

Renovations set to begin in dining commons

By JOHN FENUCCIO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

While the Berkshire Dining Commons will be closed for renovations from Jan. until Aug. 2006, the University of Massachusetts' Food Service program plans on opening three additional avenues in order to meet students' needs.

The Berkshire dining commons, located in the Southwest residential area of the UMass campus, is getting its first renovation in its 45-year existence. Southwest is undoubtedly UMass' largest residential area, and when closing one of the two dining commons located there, Ken Toong, Director of University Dining and Food Retail, recognizes the need to ensure students have options during the renovations.

"We'll open up the Southwest Cafe and change it to a 'grab 'n go' concept, serving more hot and cold items," Toong says. In addition, the Kosher Kitchen presently located in Hampden will be relocated to the Hampshire dining commons while the space in Hampden (serving a capacity of 150 people) will be turned into a fully functioning DC.

"Essentially, we closed one DC and opened two more along with the grab 'n go concept," Toong says.

This will better ensure that students who would normally grab junk food when they're in a rush have a nutritious alternative, says Toong.

The Berkshire Dining Commons, once reopened, will have several new features that should put UMass above and beyond many other universities and colleges, according to Toong.

Toong says, "The major difference is going to be the open-concept with multi-seating, cooking in front of you, and the kitchen being downstairs." Students will be able to sit at different size/style tables, one of which will be a high chair and table, different from the traditional barracks style seen throughout the DCs on campus.

In addition to brightening up the atmosphere with brighter colors and lighting, the new Berkshire facility will feature a self-contained vegetarian section that will ensure no meat contamination, a noodle bar, cereal bar, salad bar, smoothie bar and even a brick oven. A new "hot line" will be introduced as well, inviting one local restaurant a week to present their food to the students.

"This is a $10 million project of major construction; the only thing we're keeping are the pillars," Toong says. He also explained that it is the goal of the University to exceed the students' expectations, and another way of doing so is adding plasma televisions and a reservation room. The reservation room will be accessible for students and groups who would like to reserve the room for a function or simply to ensure a group of students can sit together.

COURTESY UMASS DINING SERVICES

Ken Toong has presented this basic floor plan to outline some of the changes that students will see to the Berkshire Dining Commons.

Addressing the long lines students face when returning their trays to the kitchen, students will now be able to turn in six or seven trays at a time eliminating the trays left behind for the dining staff to pick up after. Adding more tables and plenty of new and modern options for students will allow the "open-concept" to flourish once the Berkshire DC opens in Aug. 2006.

"My goal is to meet and exceed the customers' needs," says Toong. He adds, "We ask the students to bear with us because when it reopens, we think it's going to be the best DC in the nation."

Club to hold benefit drive

By ANNA DOLIANITIS

Reader to Reader Inc., an Amherst-based public charity, is holding a children's book drive throughout the month of October to benefit the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The organization was founded in 2001 to aid schools within the state of Massachusetts. It has since helped over 210 of the country's least privileged communities, and now has as its mission the necessity of "building up school and classroom libraries across America," says executive director, David Mazor.

Reader to Reader is run by a group of over 20 people, most of whom are volunteers, including two University of Massachusetts interns. The group collects new and gently used children's books and works with other national organizations, such as the U.S. Department of Education, in order to see to it that children in need receive these reading materials.

"Reader to Reader is a constant thing, so books can be donated year-round, not just for Hurricane Katrina relief," said intern Rachel Wasserman, 21, a senior at UMass.

The effort to help victims of the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina began late this summer, shortly after the devastation occurred. "We are absolutely astonished by the scale and quality of the donations we are receiving," Mazor said in a press release last month, "we are receiving thousands of children's books from as far as Texas, California and Washington state."

The book drive is receiving participation and support from local organizations such as Pioneer Valley schools and a high school in Springfield, which aims to collect 60,000 children's books, according to the press release. The relief effort is also receiving contributions from other organizations nationwide, including a Girl Scout troop in Los Angeles and a school system in North Carolina.

"Every student deserves a chance to get a good education, and having the resources, such as books, is incredibly important. Books may not be a necessity to survive, but it is every bit as important to get them down there," says Wassmerman.

"We are sort of acting like a middle man," she continued.

"After we receive the books, we go through them to make sure that we are not sending them any that are in terrible condition. Then the books get send down there and are distributed to the schools."

Bekin Van Lines and McKee's Moving and Storage, two moving companies, have donated their services in shipping the books to the south.

Reader to Reader, Inc. asks the community to help collect the resources necessary to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina, either through a donation of books or a monetary donation to be used for postage and for the purchase of specific books needed by the schools. Those interested in contributing to the effort should call David Mazor at (413) 256-8595, or contact the organization at the following address: Hurricane Katrina Book Drive, C/O Reader to Reader, Inc., 24 Mt. View Circle, Amherst, MA 01002

Mazor hopes to collect 200,000 books for the victims on the Gulf Coast. However, he notes that the feedback that he is receiving from the national community indicates that the donations might exceed his expectations.

United States falls in world education rank

By ELAINE WU
DAILY TROJAN (USC)

LOS ANGELES — The United States is falling when it comes to international education rankings, as recent studies show that other nations in the developed world have more effective education systems.

In a 2003 study conducted by UNICEF that took the averages from five different international education studies, the researchers ranked the United States No. 18 out of 24 nations in terms of the relative effectiveness of its educational system.

Another prominent 2003 study, the Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, shows a steady decline in the performance of American students from grades 4 to 12 in comparison to their peers in other countries.

In both studies, Finland, Australia, Belgium, Austria, Hungary, Netherlands and the United Kingdom beat the United States, while the Asian nations of South Korea, Japan and Singapore ranked first through third, respectively.

The TIMSS study is a comprehensive study done on a four-year cycle that measures the progress of students in math and science in 46 participating countries. It evaluates fourth, eighth and 12th-graders through questionnaires, tests and extensive videotaping of classroom environments.

The TIMSS results reveal a lot about the weaknesses of the U.S. education system, said David Marsh, a professor at the University of Southern California Rossier School of Education.

"In fourth grade, American kids do above average internationally. By eighth grade, they slip a bit, and by 12th grade, they've slipped a lot," Marsh said. "We're the only country that slides down that much from fourth to 12th grade."

Although studies have attempted to illuminate the reasons for this downward slide, no conclusive explanations have been drawn.

The UNICEF report finds that educational success or failure is not directly linked to funding, and that there is no clear link between student-to-teacher ratios and test results.

By international standards, the United States spends a lot of money on education, and in terms of class sizes, a lot of countries that do well have larger class sizes than the United States, Marsh said.

Marsh said that he attributes U.S. rankings to a different set of reasons – namely, the way material is being taught in classrooms.

"The United States focuses more on procedure, and we try to teach many topics fast. Other countries tend to break topics up and go much more in-depth. They work on the concept, not just the procedure," Marsh said. "Countries that did well in rankings focused on teaching the ideas and taught a few topics a year. Kids will learn what a fraction really is, not just how to add or subtract them."

For example, teachers in the United States tend to teach in whole numbers, while other countries use rulers so children are able to see that there are numbers between whole numbers, Marsh said.

When kids are taught the procedure, and not the concept behind a subject, they tend to forget more quickly, he said.

Peter Ueovano, assistant principal at Jefferson High School, cites different reasons for the decline in the U.S. education system.

"There are environmental factors that are involved. I think there's a shift in the mentality of both kids and parents," he said. "Kids value different things these days, and schools are more diverse than they were 15 or 20 years ago. We're more open culturally, but that has caused more division rather than unity in the country. Parent involvement has also decreased, and there are also discipline factors involved. Schools have lost a lot of control."

But the United States is taking steps toward improving education standards at the country.

In 2002, the Bush administration signed the No Child Left Behind Act, which places accountability for progress upon schools and doles out regular standardized testing.

The act is geared toward encouraging higher academic achievement among students, particularly those that come from poor minority backgrounds.

But some students at USC cannot see how the law is proving effective.

"Because the only way we measure how well students do is through testing, teachers end up teaching how to take the test, and not necessarily the subject matter," said Megan Burske, a sophomore majoring in history and communication. "Great, students can take a test, but they don't know anything."

"The U.S. caters to students' needs and wants," said Mittias Sueldo, a sophomore majoring in international relations who spent part of his education in Argentina. "Kids here learn to pass a test, but they don't learn the concepts. In Argentina, you either know it or you don't."

Emily Gamelson, a junior majoring in history, thinks that the low student achievement in U.S. schools has a lot to do with the lack of competition.

"Ambition and the motivation to achieve aren't really inspired in our education system," Gamelson said. "Since education is available to everyone, there's not a lot of competition in our schools. Other countries force kids to focus at an earlier age, and there's more competition to deal with."

WASHINGTON — President Bush nominated White House counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court on Monday, turning to a lawyer who has never been a judge to replace Sandra Day O'Connor and help reshape the nation's judiciary.

"She has devoted her life to the rule of law and the cause of justice," Bush said as his first Supreme Court pick. Chief Justice John Roberts, took the bench for the first time just a few blocks from the White House.

If confirmed by the Republican-controlled Senate, Miers, 60, would join Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the second woman on the nation's highest court and the third to serve there. Miers was the first woman to serve as president of the Texas State Bar and the Dallas Bar Association.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist outlined a timetable calling for confirmation by Thanksgiving — a tight timetable by recent standards that allowed less than eight weeks for lawmakers to review her record, hold hearings and vote. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, made no commitment, saying he wanted a thorough confirmation proceeding.

O'Connor has been the court's majority maker in dozens of controversial cases in recent years, casting deciding votes that upheld the 1973 ruling that established the constitutional right to an abortion, sustaining affirmative action programs and limiting the application of the death penalty.

Within hours of Bush's announcement in the Oval Office, Miers travelled to the Capitol to begin courtesy calls on the senators who will vote on her nomination.

Frist, R-Tenn., was first on the list. His welcome was a statement in praise. "With this selection, the president has chosen another outstanding nominee to sit on our nation's highest court," it said.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid was complimentary, issuing a statement that said he likes Miers and adding "the Supreme Court would benefit from the addition of a justice who has real experience as a practicing lawyer."

At the same time, he said he looked forward to the "process which will help the American people learn more about Harriet Miers, and help the Senate determine whether she deserves a lifetime seat on the Supreme Court."

Reid had personally recommended that Bush consider Miers for nomination, according to several sources familiar with the president's consultations with individual senators. Of equal importance as the White House maps its confirmation campaign is that the Nevada Democrat had warned Bush that the selection of any of several other contenders could trigger a bruising partisan struggle.

Other Democrats sounded anything but conciliatory. "The president has selected a loyal political ally without a judicial record to sit on the highest court in the land," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif.

Republican strategists who spoke on condition of anonymity said they would have to work hard to assure the support of some of the more conservative Republicans in the Senate, particularly on the issue of abortion. All 55 GOP senators voted to confirm Roberts.

Little is known publicly about Miers' position on abortion, an issue of surpassing importance to outside groups on both ends of the political spectrum.

When delegates to a national American Bar Association convention adopted a position in favor of abortion rights in 1992, she worked as head of the Texas state bar to force a reconsideration of the issue by submitting it to a referendum by the 360,000-membership. "This issue has brought on tremendous divisiveness and loss of membership..." she said in early 1993.

Miers, whom Bush called a trailblazer for women in the legal profession, said she was humbled by the nod.

"If confirmed, I recognize I will have a tremendous responsibility to keep our judicial system strong and to help insure the court meets their obligations to strictly apply the laws and Constitution," she said.

Whatever her credentials for the high court, Miers' loyalty to Bush is above question. When he first decided to run for governor in the early 1990s, he hired Miers to comb his background for anything derogatory that opponents might try to use to defeat him.

Miers also introduced Bush to Alberto Gonzales, who served as Bush's counsel in Austin and later in Washington, before being named U.S. attorney general.

During Bush's first term as governor, Gonzales used information turned up by Miers to persuade a local judge to excuse Bush from jury duty, a civic task that would have forced him to disclose his 1976 arrest for drunken driving in Maine. The incident was not divulged until the waning days of Bush's 2000 campaign for the White House.

Federal Election Commission records show Miers contributed $1,000 to Bush when he first ran for the White House in 2000 and $5,000 to the Bush-Cheney Recount Fund in the post-election struggle that finally sealed his victory over Al Gore.

Ironically, she had donated $1,000 to Gore a dozen years earlier, when he first sought the White House.

There was little outright opposition to Miers in the first few hours after her selection was announced.

"It's not that we don't know anything, and the small pieces of information we do know are disappointing. For example, she's Southern Methodist, notoriously pro-abortion," said Troy Newman of Operation: Rescue.

U.S. Supreme Court nominee, Harriet Miers, left, meets with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter on Capitol Hill yesterday.

Wireless common coming soon for Amherst residents

where the wireless has previously been offered, Pacunas said that the equipment was more in line with the kind of wireless apparatus people use in their own homes, whereas the new devices are designed specifically for the purpose of giving larger areas wireless access.

Pacunas says, users will see the wireless network identifier, or SSID, PUBLIC, pop up on their laptops when they are within wireless range. They can connect to the system once they agree to a disclaimer and terms of service page. In order to have access to the wireless Internet, users will also need "a properly configured Wi-Fi compliant 802.11 b/g wireless device," according to a website Pacunas set up for public information on the new project.

An 802.11 b/g is "an international standard for wireless networking. It permits different devices to communicate with one another using this standard." This device is also the one most commonly used to connect to a wireless Internet.

Pacunas encourages people not to depend on the wireless network as their only connection to the Internet. "This system is for occasional users; people shouldn't use this as their sole Internet access point."

The website also tells users that the system is "mainly intended for Internet browsing and email. The system supports HTTP, HTTPS, SMTP, and POP, IMAP, FTP, SNMP and printing are not supported."

Another issue that might come up for those who depend on wireless access is the problem of troubleshooting since, town staff is not allowed to troubleshoot. Speed will also not be optimum for these frequent users.

According to an article in The Herald Dispatch, "free or low-cost Wi-Fi access in downtown...would make spending time downtown more attractive to young adults." This would, in turn, bring these young adults, and the money that they feed into local businesses, into the area on a more regular basis.

In town restaurants, such as Rao's, which already is wireless, students with laptops already fill the tables, bringing more business to the coffee shop than they might have without the attraction of wireless Internet connection.

For more information on the wireless access in Amherst, Pacunas invites residents to check his information page at: www.amherstma.gov/public_wireless.asp.

Study finds student debt is still growing

By Courtney Klemm
Daily Illini (U Illinois)

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Two decades ago, a student could work a full-time, minimum wage job during the summer and be able to pay two-thirds of a public university's annual costs for four years. In today's economy, the same job worked for a full year would not cover a year's expenses at a public university, according to a study by the Center of Economic and Policy Research.

Nearly two-thirds of students attending a four-year public university or college take out student loans while in school. Students who took out loans averaged $17,600 in debt on graduation day, according to studies from 2004.

Sheena Greenwalt, a junior in Business, said covering the cost of school wasn't discussed with her parents, but she knew she would have to take on a lot of the responsibility due to her parents' limited income.

"I filled out the FAFSA before entering school and after seeing how much aid I received, I then took out a subsidized loan, which is offered through the federal government," Greenwalt said.

The University distributes approximately $440 million to students each year in the form of loans, grants and scholarships, said Dan Mann, director of financial aid. Compared to the national statistics, the average indebted student from the University owed $15,696 for the 2003-2004 school year.

Tim Brantner, freshman in ACES, said his father felt it was part of his responsibility to pay for some of the costs of a college education. And, although he will be in debt when he graduates, Brantner said he understands his dad's point of view.

"It's probably for the best because it's going to teach me how to spend money and save in the real world," he said.

The study found that high levels of debt are due largely in part to rapidly increasing college costs and policy choices that have made more loans, rather than grants, available to students. According to the study, college costs have risen by more than 50 percent since 1990, a number that was adjusted for inflation. However, Randy Kangas, assistant vice president for the University's planning and budgeting, disputed the fact that student debt is blamed on rising college costs.

"The cost has not changed dramatically, who's paying this cost has," he said. "What has changed is the state's contribution."

Kangas said Illinois ranks fourth among Big Ten schools in terms of tuition and mandatory fees for a general, undergraduate student, falling behind Penn State, the University of Michigan and the University of Minnesota. Last year was the first year in the history of the University that student tuition overtook state funding.

The University has had to reallocate millions of dollars from lower priorities to higher, cut administrative costs and raise tuition, among other actions, to keep up with the costs of higher education, Kangas said.

"There hasn't been the state support that there used to be," he added. "As state revenue declines, student tuition is picking up the bill."

And with tuition costs increasing each year, students have to pitch in to stay in school.

Besides taking out a loan, Greenwalt said she also works two jobs during the school year for extra money.

"It's extremely stressful," she said. "It's definitely really hard watching a lot of my peers just kind of fly by the seat of their pants and not have to really worry about anything when I'm constantly worrying about work, paying for school, on top of school work and everything else."

Brantner said he knows having to pay off loans will be a setback after graduation.

Alex Agramonte works in the bursar's office at William Paterson University in Wayne, New Jersey. he is a recent graduate and has thousands of dollars of student loans to repay.

Midterms crucial to freshmen

By Robert Taylor
Daily Kent Stater, Kent State U.

KENT, Ohio — With only three weeks left until midterms at Kent State University, Undergraduate Studies is one of several groups on campus trying to get students to buckle down and study before it is too late.

According to data released by the Office of Research, Planning & Institutional Effectiveness, only about 50 percent of freshmen with a GPA of less than 2.0 at midterms return for their second year at Kent State. Freshmen with a GPA of 2.0 or higher return for their second year at least 70 percent of the time.

"It may be too late for some students at this point already," said Gary Padak, dean of Undergraduate Studies. "[The data] is something that you might think is common sense, but it is a little more complicated because there are a lot of other factors that could happen after the midterms, but it is clear that there is a relationship between the two."

Padak said that freshmen must not lose their way early in the semester.

"The whole thought is that we should change the cultural awareness of midterms," Padak said. "A freshman starts here and there is so much to grapple with in terms of adjustment and transition that academics just become another competing interest. It's fairly easy for someone to put it on the back burner thinking that they have the entire semester."

Undergraduate Studies is working with several groups on campus to get the faculty more involved with freshmen.

"We have sent a letter to every faculty member who teaches freshmen students with the data. The letter encourages them to speak to students and keep them updated," Padak said.

Undergraduate Studies also asked faculty to identify freshmen who are already struggling in their classes and refer them to Terri Capellman, director of First Year Experience. Capellman has helped more than 50 freshmen already.

"One of the things I like to do with students is create an academic action plan for them so that I can generate a commitment on the students' part," Capellman said. "An academic adviser can explore a student's course work and whether or not they need to drop a class."

Capellman electronically sent out a Resource and Referral Guide to all freshmen. The guide includes information such as important phone numbers, Web sites, study plans and mentoring programs that can aid students with their course load. The guide is also available online at the First Year Experience Web site.

Faculty members aren't the only people who should be in heavy preparation for midterms. Several deans across campus visit freshmen orientation classes to tell them three methods they should employ to be successful in their first semester, Padak said.

The first method is for freshman students to attend the classes he or she is enrolled in.

"I'm not here to say that the quality of instruction in every class is excellent, it depends upon a person's interests, but one major thing that separates successful students from those who fail is attendance," Padak said.

The second method is to get to know at least one of their instructors very well.

United States offensive continues in Iraq

By Mohammed Barakat
Associated Press

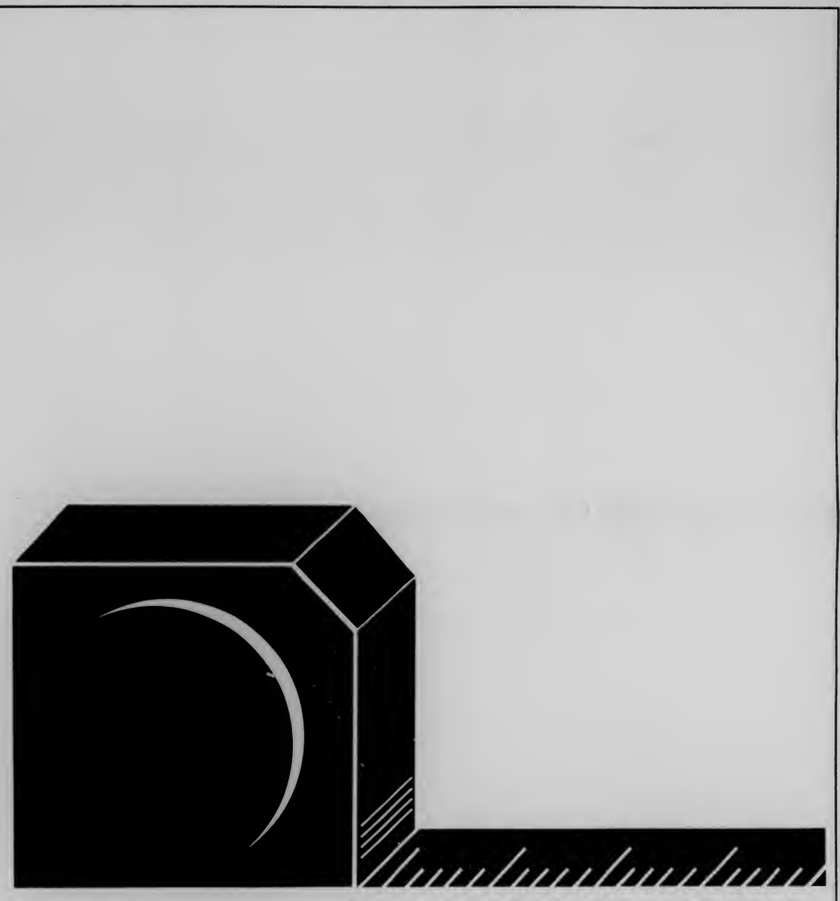
QAIM, Iraq — With snipers on rooftops and helicopters hovering overhead, U.S. forces clashed with insurgent fighters Monday while searching homes in a town near the Syrian border.

In Baghdad, Iraq's oil minister narrowly escaped an assassination attempt when a bomb hit his motorcade.

While U.S. forces pushed ahead with their offensive further west, fighting erupted in the capital of Iraq's Anbar province, with masked militants attacking an Iraqi patrol and sparking a gunbattle in the streets of Ramadi.

Oil Minister Ibrahim Bahr al-Uloum was headed out of the capital to attend the opening of a rebuilt refinery to the north when the roadside bomb hit his seven-car motorcade Monday morning, killing three of his bodyguards, the ministry said. Bahr al-Uloum was unhurt.

The assassination attempt came a week after a car bomb at a checkpoint near the Oil Ministry killed at least three ministry employees and seven policemen.



Iraq has the world's third-largest known oil reserves, but the industry has been crippled by war, sanctions during Saddam Hussein's rule and the anti-U.S. insurgency. Oil production remains limited, curbed by decaying infrastructure and frequent militant attacks on pipelines and refineries.

The violence came less than two weeks before a national referendum on a new constitution. Al-Qaida in Iraq and other groups in the Sunni-led insurgency have launched a wave of violence to wreck the Oct. 15 vote, killing at least 207 people in the past eight days, including 16 U.S. forces.

Staff Sgt. Donnie Hendricks, Sgt. Hunter Sabin, Sgt. Antonio Molina and Sgt. Justin Thomas sit at their base in Muqdiyah, waiting for a truck to pick them up and rop them off.

Bahr al-Uloum vowed that the insurgents would fail and that Iraqis will approve the new constitution. "All Iraqis are looking forward to saying 'yes' to the constitution ... By doing so Iraq will usher in a new stage," he said after the attack.

Reversing the race to the bottom

Ethan Burke

Check the tag on your shirt. If your shirt was made in the past couple decades, chances are it does not say, "Made in USA."

In the new global economy where it has become easier for companies to shift production around the world, corporations search for cheaper costs and that includes cheap labor.

Today, multinational corporations operate all around the world in places like Haiti or Malaysia; such places that have high unemployment, few laws protecting workers and a desperate people that choose to toil for 50 cents an hour rather than watch their family go hungry. In these places, people often work under horrid conditions. Every movement is monitored by guards and technicians until they become one with the machine that stitches the designer label. Guards file workers into lines, searching them before allowing them to leave the factory. Production quotas increase to a pace that cannot possibly be attained while managers track their efficiency down to the one thousandth of a penny in the dehumanizing process of profit seeking.

Farm workers till the soil and harvest the crop of their country on land owned by multinational corporations. Corporations exploit natural and human resources while making billions selling the fruit of foreign land and labor.

Atrocious sweatshop and plantation labor are a domestic problem as well. Weak labor laws in the United States do not protect agricultural workers and textile workers. A separate set of laws for agrarian work has young children farming rather than attending school. Not enforcing minimum wage laws and other labor standards has created an invisible, vulnerable class that suffers under third world conditions.

Not enforcing minimum wage laws and other labor standards has created an invisible, vulnerable class that suffers under third world conditions.

The U.S. Department of Labor estimates that 67 percent of garment factories in Los Angeles do not pay minimum wage or over-time. However, there has been little government effort to stop these crimes.

None of this is inevitable. Labor laws in the United States could be enforced. Laws should be passed where nations that foster a system of wage slavery or actual slavery (still a real problem in the world) would not be able to do business with the United States.

The United States government has used sanctions against Iraq, Cuba, Iran, Libya and South Africa for political reasons. The U.S. can bolster human rights, decrease poverty and protect American workers from pay cuts and outsourcing all by demanding producers pay decent wages to the workers around the world or face sanctions.

American companies can be forced to comply with certain labor standards in their overseas production. The goods from foreign companies that do not meet labor standards could be banned.

Some will say that higher wages will cause unemployment because producers will be unwilling to pay higher wages.

Wages in the United States increased dramatically for several decades after World War II as average Americans saw their wages double while unemployment was low. To the contrary, in the past several decades in the era of economic "globalization," the median wage of workers has actually decreased and unemployment has been higher on average.

When faced with paying more for labor or losing the U.S. market, companies would have little choice but to cut into their skyrocketing profits and keep selling to the United States.

Some may argue that higher wages will make everything more expensive to consumers in the United States. These people should ask themselves if they should accept slavery if it means they can save a few bucks on clothing and groceries.

The working conditions of sweatshop workers and exploited farmers around the world are little better than slave conditions. Where chains and guns force slaves to work, the need to provide for a family forces many others to work under similar conditions, but we somehow consider them free and the system legitimate.

A final argument supporting the current system says that many workers in poor countries wouldn't have any jobs if it weren't for corporations moving in to take advantage of their cheap labor. This argument assumes there are only two options for the poor in the third world: wage slavery or nothing. Another set of options ignored in this argument are: pay a decent wage to have the privilege of using another nation's resources, or give the nation back their resources so they can provide for themselves. These options hint at some of the underlying problems that many would rather not think about.

Will we continue a system that is built on the backs of a class of people living in misery, or will we find a more equitable method for sharing the costs of production?

Multinational corporations move from country to country searching for the lowest labor costs in what some have termed the "race to the bottom." Wages are depressed while desperation and insecurity increase as isolated workforces in different parts of the world are pitted against one another in providing the cheapest labor. For everyone's benefit, we can reverse this trend by taking control of our economy instead of continuing to fool ourselves into believing this system of so-called "free trade" benefits society.

Shirts: more than meets the eye

Stephen Gladwin

The American advertising savvy never ceases to amaze me. Nor surprise me. But the boys in the advertising biz have really outdone themselves this time. Their newest ploy, playing out on college campuses like UMass, is so diabolically brilliant, so knowing, so perfect that I can't help but be impressed despite the inherent deviousness of it.

I first noticed this new trend in American advertising whilst walking to a class on a crisp spring day. Walking against the stream of nubile female flesh stuffed into logo-heavy shirts, I was struck by a distressing epiphany: here are the new billboards of America. You know the shirts. The ones that scream epithets informed with chic feminism ("You were never my boyfriend") or embroidered with vintage logos of beloved American products (Hershey, Tide).

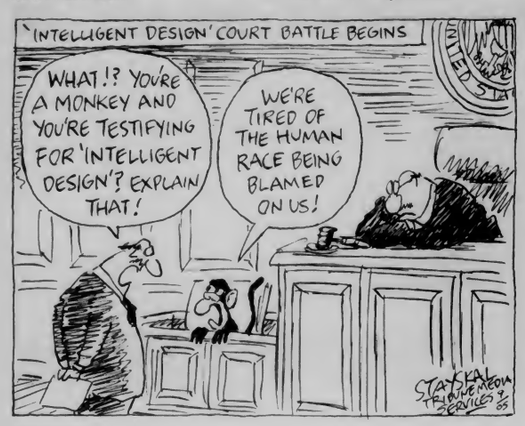
Here's the rub: college girls just aren't as smart as they think they are when it comes to sexual politics. Although they may be quick to condemn a hormonal catcall or leering gaze for what it is, the commercialization of their bodies goes right over their heads. That is the absolutely devastating brilliance of this advertising scheme. The advertisers have done what many a testosterone-engorged frat boy cannot; they have finally cracked that distinctively female paradox of secretly desiring the male gaze (that most hated of the cloudy form of feminism often possessed by many college girls) while publicly condemning it as sexist.

With this more modest, less revealing clothing, girls can more safely draw attention to their goods while selling corporate America's goods. Not only that, but they instantly reach advertising's mythical demographic: young adult males. The billboards are situated in the best hideout of those young adult males: that hormonal funhouse known as the college campus. If logos spread across a comely lass's chest or rear (those shorts with "UMass" on the rear – come on, we all know it's all about the last three letters) isn't good advertising, I don't know what is. Sex sells, baby.

Advertisers really can't go wrong with exploiting the inferiority complex of the "I have, therefore I am" dynamic of the American psyche and the sexual angst of the average male college student. Ardent Italian Marxist, painter, poet and filmmaker Pier Paolo Pasolini once predicted, among much public outcry, that the invention of the birth control pill would allow pharmaceutical companies to harvest women's bodies. But even that explosive thinker couldn't predict a scheme as cunning as this.

Walking against the stream of nubile female flesh stuffed into logo-heavy shirts, i was struck by a distressing epiphany: here are the new billboards of America.

What I see as the next step is shirts advertising products specifically for men. I'm talking condoms, athlete's foot medication, men's magazines, etc. I can see it now: a Durex slogan sprawled across a co-ed's chest, boasting "Before you unwrap these, unwrap one of ours." The only trick is imbuing the slogans with some irony and sarcasm. Man, what a slam dunk. A generation raised on "The Daily Show" and taking potshots at cheesy horror movies will guzzle this stuff down like so much lukewarm Pabst.



There's a sense of sadness with all this. It's dehumanizing in a new way; it abstracts the female form with a crass, bottom-line business sensibility. At least sculpture and painting celebrated the beauty of the female form and had the power to inspire as well as titillate. These shirts just move York Peppermint patties. Hell, even pornography wins out when stacked against these shirts. At least pornography is honest in its exploitation of women and doesn't use them as unsuspecting pawns in a corporate scheme.

But the possibilities really are endless, which means we probably won't see an end to this anytime soon. The college soil is just too fertile for advertisers to resist. College girls, simultaneously exhilarated and overwhelmed by their newfound sexuality, aren't savvy enough yet to see the t-shirts for what they are, and college boys will never fail to eagerly dart their hungry eyes to the carefully placed product. Couple that with the simple fact that, at its best, advertising exploits a culture's collective subconscious, with all its childlike grabbiness and "me first" needs.

College culture is particularly conducive for this dynamic, being a magnification of America's aversion to introspection. Considering the titanic amount of boozy, sudsy self-denial I've seen in my three years at UMass, I doubt this new advertising scheme would raise an eyebrow with most college students, and that's exactly how the advertisers want it.

So what have we learned? Many college girls are consummately American in their participation in our cultural pastime known as advertising — even Dubbya would be proud. And no matter how much fancy book knowledge we absorb and rallies we may attend (Shout those slogans. Pump those fists.), we're still suckers for a demeaning put-on.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ISRAEL VIEW DOES INJUSTICE

On Thursday, Collegian columnist Bonnie Solomon asked her readers if they remember Israel. I commend Ms. Solomon on raising this question. We should all be ashamed of ourselves for forgetting about Israel. Ms. Solomon, however, excluded some fine points which no accurate discussion of the conflict can be without.

Have we forgotten Israel's egregious human rights record? Have we forgotten that Israel carries on an illegal 38-year occupation? Have we forgotten that the forces which founded the state of Israel, many of whom were wanted on charges of terrorism, are responsible for the plight of Palestinian refugees? Have we forgotten that the majority of the depopulation occurred before an Arab soldier set foot on the area of historic Palestine?

Have we forgotten that Israel continues to build a wall pervading Palestinian territory and destroying the livelihood in its path and hording water reserves? Have we forgotten that the only proven weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East belong to Israel? Have we forgotten that Israel attacked the U.S.S. Liberty in 1967, killing numerous American servicemen?

Perhaps it is Ms. Solomon who has forgotten Israel or perhaps she just chooses to forget the Israel she does not like. Ms. Solomon should make a critical examination of these issues before writing on them again and should ask herself why Israel is in such desperate need of a public relations campaign. As someone who has traveled extensively throughout Israel and Palestine, I have seen both sides of the government. I have seen what they have done to Palestinians and I have seen how they lie to their own people at home. I can tell you first hand that the Israel Ms. Solomon recalls is nothing more than the amalgamation of Zionist daydreams of a place that never was and never can be while it is built on the guilt of occupied land, demolished homes and uprooted trees.

Ms. Solomon insists that many people "thought that pulling out of Gaza would facilitate the peace process between the Israelis and the Palestinians," but those who truly understand the dynamics of this conflict know very well that these events will be meaningless since they do not resolve the core issues.

Ms. Solomon's selective memory does a disservice to all of those striving to reach a just and lasting peace based on the framework of human rights.

MISGIVINGS IN BEDTIME CRITIQUE

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players and the Health Education Department of University Health Services would like to thank Erin Dunlop for her support and response to Greg Collins' editorial in which she addressed many of the inaccuracies of this column. We would also like to thank the RA staff who continually support and request our program as well as the thousands of students who see our show each year.

We agree with Mr. Collins in that "the choice to have sex is a monumental one for both parties involved," that is why we do what we do. Mr. Collins states that sex education should not be taught in the public realm and rather students should seek out information needed to make complex decisions regarding sexuality on their own. What he doesn't seem to understand is that 63 percent of first year UMass Amherst students are sexually active. Many students are coming to UMass lacking the knowledge and skills needed to make informed decisions about sex and ways to protect themselves from sexually transmitted infections and pregnancy.

Mr. Collins provides suggestions as to where students should privately gather information before making complex personal decisions. We have data from the 2005 American College Health Assessment survey that shows UMass Amherst students do not believe the information they ascertain off the Web, are not reading medical dictionaries, don't believe their friends' information is accurate and they aren't going to their parents to discuss sexual issues. Students do, however, overwhelmingly believe the information obtained by health educators and health center medical staff. The Players participate in an on-going extensive training program, coordinated by a health education professional, to ensure that accurate and appropriate information is being provided.

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players address, affirm and support abstinence and recognize that not everyone is engaging in sexual activity. As a comprehensive program, we also believe in harm reduction and in providing students with accurate information to help guide difficult personal decisions. Our show presents a wide range of information without judgment on individual decisions regarding sexual practices or behaviors. The philosophy of the Not Ready for Bedtime Players aligns with that of the Sexuality Information and Education Council of the United States (SIECUS) and is supported by research. This research indicates that accurate sex education actually delays the age of first intercourse and results in more informed decisions by individuals when they choose to have intercourse or engage in other sexual behaviors.

NRBP shows portray sensitive and often difficult to talk about issues such as sexuality and safer sex, homophobia, date rape, HIV and other sexually transmitted infections and pregnancy. Our mission is to raise awareness of these issues, break the silence around some of these topics and to provide accurate information to the UMass Amherst community. We offer reliable resources on all of the topics covered in our performances for students to further their learning and understanding of these issues on their own and with other professionals privately.

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players are proud of being part of a model program for other colleges and universities across the country and of bringing accurate and comprehensive sex education to the UMass Amherst community since 1988. We invite all individuals who attend our shows to fill out an evaluation. We are responsive to students' needs and have made changes to our show based on student feedback. We are not going anywhere, however, and will continue to raise awareness of important issues around sexuality using the forum of public education.

Gavin Rossdale opens up Institute

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

In the '90s, Nirvana and the grunge revolution yielded a lot of cheap imitations. While some of them hit it big and some of them flourished, real talent was often overlooked. Bush – who's front man Gavin Rossdale was often more vocal about his looks than his songwriting – was rewarded with deserved commercial success but was denied the critical acclaim that they worked hard for. Over 10 years since their first album, and four years since their last, Bush's discography stands up stronger than most '90s bands, and it's clear that Rossdale and his band deserved more than they got.

Following 2001's Golden State, a strong album whose release coincided with 9/11 and guitarist Nigel Pulsford's first child being born, Bush went on hiatus. Now Rossdale has emerged with Institute, featuring Cache Tolman from the post-punk supergroup Rival Schools and Chris Traynor who not only served time in Helmet and Orange 9mm, arguably the two best groups to emerge from the New York early '90s hardcore scene but filled in for Pulsford on Bush's "Golden State" tour. On the band's debut "Distort Yourself," Rossdale takes Bush's post-grunge songwriting and mixes it with Helmet's chunky staccato riffs (Helmet-frontman Page Hamilton produced the album).

In a phone interview with the Daily Collegian Rossdale came off as friendly and intelligent. Often artists with even half of Bush's success have inflated egos. Rossdale, on the other hand, is modest and down to earth. Rossdale explained that Institute isn't a new direction for him – it's just a continuation of where he was going before.

"When I began I was just making music. When it became apparent that Nigel didn't want to work [it became something new]," he explains. "Artistically you can't help but be following on a track. You can think if you get a suntan and a yellow t-shirt you can be someone else but essentially you're always going to be you as an artist if you are true to your vision."

Rossdale's vision has already led him down the right path and the songs on "Distort Yourself" have big radio hooks. Songs like "The Heat Of Your Love" and "Seventh Wave" have even bigger hooks. While the album does have moments of restraint, including the impressive and haunting "Ambulances," the overall hard-rock feeling is surprising, given that in the later Bush albums Rossdale was often more keen to experiment with new technologies then write bare-bones rock songs.

"I began trying to [write experimental songs] with this but … when it came to recording songs for the record, all the songs [that] were more guitar orientated were the ones chosen. The power of the band comes from the guitar at this point."

Fans of Bush will find themselves encountering familiar themes in Rossdale's cryptic lyrics. Songs like "Information Age" and "Save The Robots" deal with the same issues that many Bush tracks such as "The Chemicals Between Us" and "Letting The Cables Sleep" look at.

Musician- just have one song to write and your life's just a variation on one thing. When you give your life to something, it's intimate. [The songs are] always about man vs. machine, humanity vs. homogenous reproduction, this balance between the future and the past and what we gain from the speed we live at and the desire for results and how we measure success."

Rossdale certainly succeeded at his goal of following his vision and making another strong record but he realizes that he has to explain a four-year absence from the public eye.

"I worked on a couple of movies and spent time with my wife and with my dog. [Being in a band], you're in a cycle that never seems to end. It's cool and you love it but you need time to reconnect with friends and family. It does end but then you get the pressure attacks where you feel like the world is passing you by." Despite the fact that he had a legion of fans clamoring for new music, Rossdale remains modest about his hiatus. "I don't have some outrageous ego view that people give a shit."

Rossdale also knows he is again going to have face critics that will always shoot him down no matter how good of an album he has.

"[The criticism has] always been a bit of mystery because if you're just making music you aren't doing anything shitty. I inspire a lot of love and a lot of hate, but it was shocking to me when it was like 'oh, I'm not cool enough.' I've really got no control," he laughs. "I'm happy to inspire extremes but I was starting to have enough of the 'I hate you' criticism. There [are] a lot of other things to criticize than what we were doing. … If you can just make it so that you're doing good then at some point people will just be like 'OK, damn that is pretty good.' You can't be held responsible for people liking you and the more people who liked us, the more trouble that got us … we got some good reviews [on 'Golden State'] but people didn't hear about that." Rossdale concludes with a concise summary. "A bit of both is not a bad thing."

Institute
Distort Yourself
Interscope

While Rossdale has successfully staged a comeback something that is surprisingly hard to do in the fast-paced world of 21st century pop-culture, he does realize some sentimentalists will have a problem with him starting a new band.

"I didn't know really know [what was happening with Bush] and at some point you gotta be responsible for yourself … what was a side project became the main thing. Bush is not done, there's every chance there would be another record it's never been stopped."

Rossdale has proven he cannot be stopped either releasing a record as strong as anything he has previously put out. Institute may lack Bush's name but it takes all their brains and pumps up their muscles. "Distort Yourself" is more than just post-grunge nostalgia; it's everything that made Rossdale such an underrated talent and might be enough to get him some serious recognition.

Bob Mould returns to rock with solo album "Body of Song"

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

In 1998, alternative-rock legend Bob Mould announced he was putting away the electric guitars and distortion pedals that had made him one of the most respected and important musicians of his time. With the massively influential Husker Du Mould stretched the boundaries of punk music, placing pop hooks next to furious walls of guitar and setting the stage for bands from The Pixies to Nirvana to The Flaming Lips. The band broke up before they ever reached commercial success but Mould soldiered on, releasing a pair of dark, intensely personal solo albums before forming Sugar, one of the most criminally overlooked bands of the '90s. While Sugar's work was critically acclaimed and they formed a strong fan base, Mould was still passed over by MTV and alternative-rock radio, despite the fact that he was one of the creators, and one of the best, of the genre, and the band broke up. His proposed retirement from rock wasn't that much of a surprise when he announced it – on his 1996 self-titled solo album there was a blistering burst of fury entitled "I Hate Alternative Rock" – but it was certainly a sad day in the history of rock.

Luckily, Mould recanted on his word. Following the disappointing foray into electronica, 2002's "Modulate," Mould balanced his gig as a dance-DJ and his penchant for remixing and making electronic music with his passion for the guitar. Long promising a return-to-rock album, Mould toured off and on with just his acoustic and electric guitars and a DAT tape of backing tracks for his electronic songs, playing old favorites and showcasing new songs. Finally, this summer Mould made good on his promise, releasing "Body Of Song," his strongest work in nearly a decade and an album that can easily stand amongst his best works.

Incorporating loud guitars, his trademark from-the-gut lyrics, and his newfound love of electronics, "Body Of Song" is the sound of an artist that has harnessed his talents and continued to explore and evolve. "Circles" and "Paralyzed" are the two most immediately powerful songs on the album, sounding just like Mould should in the 21st century, while "Days Of Rain" and "Beating Heart The Prize" are the type of distressed, slow-burn songs that Mould has mastered over the course of his solo career. "Best Thing" and "Missing You" could easily fit in on a Sugar album and "(Shine Your) Love, Light, Hope" and "I Am Vision, I Am Sound" are more listenable and enjoyable electronic-dance tracks then anything off of "Modulate."

Arguably more exciting then Mould's comeback on record is his live comeback. Armed with a live band (which includes Fugazi drummer Brendan Canty) for the first time since 1998, Mould has returned to his deafeningly loud ways to promote "Body Of Song." When Mould hits the Paradise in Boston tomorrow night he'll be playing songs from his solo career along with songs from both Sugar and Husker Du's catalogue in a full band context for the first time. Longtime fans shouldn't miss out on this opportunity to see one of the most important and talented musicians of the past 25 years in his most natural environment. Those new to Mould should also be excited to see what all the fuss is about. After a few lackluster years, the man responsible for a massive amount of great, important music and for causing a huge seismic shift in the world of pop music, is back and is more relevant then ever.

Mould may be twice the age of a lot of the newcomers emerging on the national music scene but he's out to prove he still rocks harder and better. Anyone that can make it to the Paradise tomorrow night should be prepared for a night of furious, scorching, and brilliant rock.

Musician Bob Mould is going to be performing at the Paradise Rock Club on Oct. 4. He returns to the stage after pursing a career in professional wrestling as a script writer for a brief period.

Dredg

4/10

Catch Without Arms
Interscope

Dredg is a band that is clearly proud of how artistic they are. Rather then divide their latest album, "Catch Without Arms," into sides, they label the first half "Perspective I" and the second half "Perspective II." The artwork and, of course, the music itself, follows this attitude which makes Dredg a band that is, if anything, difficult to place. The California-based band is in some ways evocative of Tool and Incubus, two bands that are often applauded for their artistic tendencies and within "mainstream" music. The big difference is that, while Tool – and, to a lesser extent, Incubus – have earned a reputation as a thoughtful, intelligent, and challenging band, Dredg sounds like their little brothers. They want to be like their idols but are blissfully unaware of the huge gap in between them.

Singer Gavin Hayes often sounds like a less pompous Bono and guitarist Mark Engles creates atmospheres like The Edge, making them almost exactly what it would sound like if Incubus held a jam session with U2. The songs all sound and feel very pretty but it is all too innocuous. Hayes' lyrics often combine wide-eyed life philosophy with wide-eyed romanticism that is poetic but doesn't quite have an impact. Dredg has the right idea but they seem to be too tangled in cliches and try too hard to be "unique" to really achieve anything of any great interest or importance.

The band occasionally comes up with cool sounds and noises, such as in "Zebraskin," but they can't overcome high-school diary lyrics. Dredg also finds itself in an awkward place of being a rock band that likes to sound really sensitive. "The Tanbark is Hot Lava" is propelled by a start/stop riff that doesn't really go anywhere and while Hayes has a strong voice, he doesn't have any strong hooks at his disposal. Simultaneously getting the point and missing it, "Catch Without Arms" isn't awful, unlistenable, or even bad – it just tries too hard without accomplishing what it sets out to do. The band is already obsessed with themselves and their art and while they have no doubt created something from their heart, it is missing all the intelligence that a great work contains. The world needs more bands that, like Dredg, strive for originality over mainstream success. If anything can be said for Dredg, it is that they can't be put in a box or a genre, they certainly aren't aiming to be the next big thing, and they are earnestly trying their best to make something interesting – and "earnest" is certainly the best word to describe the band – and that's always refreshing. However, "Catch Without Arms" isn't that intriguing or smart. Dredg is all heart, so it's hard to admonish them, but with so much truly challenging and bright music being made it's hard to endorse them. Dredg is artsy but they don't seem to know that artsy is not the same as artistic.

6.5/10

Alpine Static
Sub Pop Records

Kinski is not your average psychedelic, art-rock instrumental band. The Seattle quartet has released a few albums that contain spiraling guitars, crushing noise, and spacey ambience, and has built a name for itself as a band that should be watched. On "Alpine Static," the band still explores a lot of the same dynamics but gets a little more straight-forward in their desire to rock. The first three tracks of "Alpine Static" could be mistaken for Queens Of The Stone Age leading a jam session and often, such as on "The Party Which You Know Will Be Heavy," Kinski sounds like mid-period Sonic Youth.

As such, "Alpine Static," and Kinski itself, seems a bit confused. The band certainly knows their way around improvisational and instrumental music and has proven they are able to create soundscapes (such as on "Passed Out On Your Lawn"), but a lot of times it feels they are holding back. The opening track "Hot Stenographer" doesn't build or sputter out into anything, nor does it reach the feel of a hypnotic cycle. Rather, it just feels incomplete, like a rock song missing its hook, which only adds to the confusion.

The band knows how to create amazing textures and sounds but they still haven't stumbled upon something truly groundbreaking – albeit that is quite a difficult task in the field that they work in – nor have they been able to fully escape their ambient and noise forefathers. "Alpine Static" has a definite album feel to it, however, as those first three tracks pave the way for an album that gets gradually more psychedelic and interesting as it progresses. With the epic "Passed Out On Your Lawn" as a turning point, "Alpine Static" casts the listener off into a dreamy space with "All Your Kids Have Turned To Static" before the menacing "The Snowy Parts Of Scandinavia" twist into a noisy nightmare with intermissions of a Who-like guitar riff.

Kinski still has a long way to go if they want to reach the top of the instrumental art-rock pile but on "Alpine Static," they have proved that they have the goods to get there. Most of "Alpine Static" is psychedelic bliss and bracing noise rock but there are still some pieces that feel lacking, either because they don't seem fully developed or because Kinski is often too tied to their influences. The album finds Kinski bouncing between their best moments and their stalest, alternately rewarding and dull. "Alpine Static" may not be impressive enough for some noise fanatics but Kinski does have the potential to crossover to rock 'n' rollers that want to see what avant-garde rock is all about.

Say Hi To Your Mom

Ferocious Mopes
Euphoria Records

Say Hi To Your Mom isn't your typical rock 'n' roll band; in fact, they aren't really a band at all, despite what one would hear when listening to their new album "Ferocious Mopes."

Say Hi To Your Mom is really just rock journalist Eric Elbogen from New York who creates all his own music with the help of homemade computers and supposed robots.

Elbogen refuses to say where he writes his reviews and insists they are written under a pseudonym to keep fans at bay. This is all part of a mystique he creates with his music.

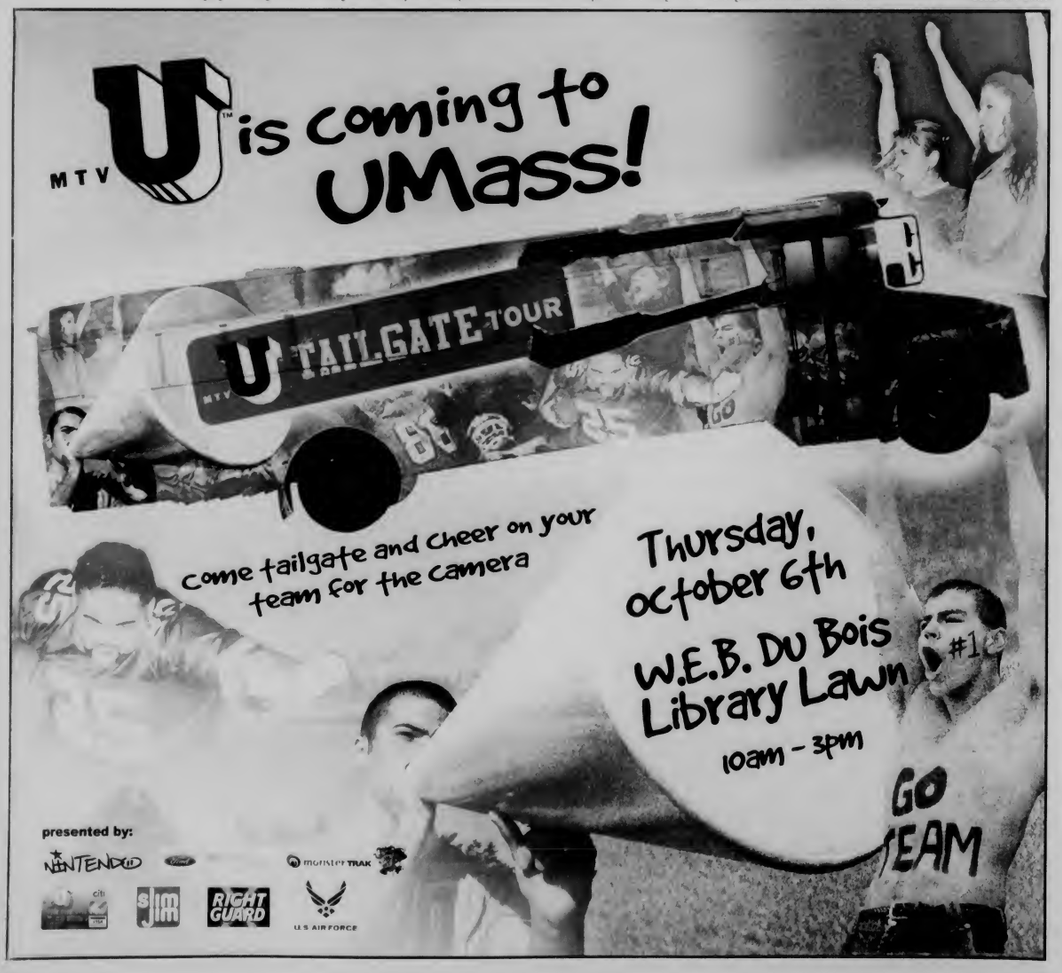
Elbogen rarely even gives out his last name, but that's also part of the mystique of the music he is trying to create. To make the outfit a live band, Elbogen has friends play alongside of him to recreate his music.

To add to the mystique, he puts out all of the albums on his own independent record label Euphoria to avoid the business side of the music industry.

If you ignore the mystique and the pretentious biography Elbogen gives the band, one will hear simple music played well and sung quietly.

At times the music may sound repetitive, but that's part of the plan when the music flows from song to song. At times the lyrics appear to flow as one large song. But with a closer listen, the themes of the lyrics change and are somewhat poetic throughout the album.

By no means is Elbogen like Ben Gibbard of the Postal Service and Death Cab For Cutie, but the slow songs on the album are similar to the early Death Cab For Cutie sound.



Unfortunately by track five, "I Think I'll be a Good Ghost," the music becomes too stale and just drags on and unavoidably recreates indie-rock cliché.

While the mainstream audience won't recognize the cliché Elbogen creates, the underground fans will definitely notice. These are the people he is trying to market his music to in the first place. Some of the themes they will notice are death, vampires, and robots.

Some of the songs have a guitar structure that is similar to something from an early Nintendo video game and the drums just disappear at this time, leaving listeners scratching their heads and wondering where the song is going.

By the album's end, Elbogen strips the music down to just an acoustic guitar, and this is by far the highlight of the album.

The Bravery

6/10

Self Titled Island

The 1980s are over, but one would never guess it when he or she is listening to the latest The Bravery release.

13 years after the demise of the '80s, The Bravery was born. This would normally be too late unless you're from New York, the city that never sleeps that has a modern love of things gone vintage or retro.

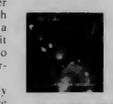
With that said, The Bravery have been around now for only a couple of years, but since every major label in the country is looking to profit from the new wave of '80s bands, the major record label Island signed them quickly and put out their latest album.

With major record label funding, the band can purchase as much or as little '80s clothes as possible to fully create their image.

Image aside, the band's music speaks for itself. The Bravery is simply a decent band capitalizing on what is trendy right now in the rock 'n' roll market. They rarely cuss, sing about sorrow, or get political.

The dance beats flow well from song to song with the guitar, bass, and drum creating an album one can easily dance to when it's '80s night at the local club or in the bedroom with the blinds down.

The major drawback for the album is the vocal performance from vocalist Sam Endicott. Endicott, throughout most of the album, sounds like fellow New York rocker Julian Casablanca from the band The Strokes. Other times, Endicott tries and fails to sound like melodramatic front man of The Cure, Robert Smith. The only singer to ever come close to Smith is Morrissey of The Smiths, a comparison that does not sit well with either singer, who are rivaled for biggest tearjerker of the 1980s.



If The Bravery were really brave, they would not have to capitalize on a trend to get noticed by fans and media alike. Instead they don't challenge anything and sound too much like U.K. rockers Razerlight or The Killers.

Five bands in this review were mentioned with an '80s sound and the word "the" preceding the important half of their name, coincidence? Perhaps, but you can decide that for yourself.

Besides Sleater Kinney and The Donnas, the rock 'n' roll scene has been in a drought lately concerning the numbers of all-girl bands, but who cares. With the release their debut album, the all-girl band The Like fills the void.

With Sleater Kinney rocking harder and not caring as much about their looks, The Like takes a different approach with their music. The Like come rocking with the first three tracks on their album, but like the Chicago White Sox season, the album slowly quiets down as the tracks go by.

The Like

Are You Thinking What I am Thinking
Geffen

The rest of "Are You Thinking What I Am Thinking" creates a more of a pop album feel, far better then fellow Geffen artist Ashlee Simpson or Maverick Records artist Michelle Branch. Singer/guitarist Z Berg has one of the best and most talented voices in pop music today.

The pop portion of the album is beautiful and every aspect from the instrumentals to Berg's vocals whom are done very well. Here is where Berg's vocals really shine for the album.

The music has a story to it. By no means is it a concept, but instead the story of beauty flows from each song to the next, even the more rock 'n' roll-sounding early tracks have a beauty to them.

Perhaps the beauty is found in the music because members Charlotte Froom, the bassist, Tennessee Jane Bunny Thomas, the drummer, and Z Berg have known each other for the past four years of their lives. In that time, the girls have matured greatly from 15- and 16-year-olds to college-age young women.

A transition like this cannot go unnoticed and the growing experience may have been why the album has such beauty to it.

For now, The Like are opening for bands like Maroon 5, Phantom Planet and Kings of Leon, but in the future they will without a doubt be the headliner.

The Talking Heads made a movie called "Stop Making Sense" back in George Orwell's favorite year, 1984. It is safe to say that the band We Are Wolves listened. It took 21 years, but they did.

We Are Wolves

8.5/10

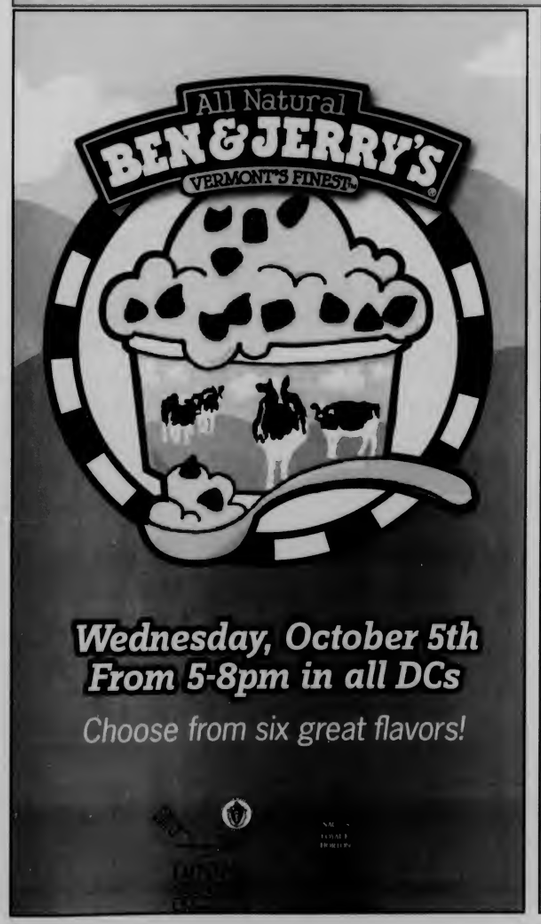
Non Stop Je Te Plie En Deux
Fat Possum Records

With their debut album "Non Stop Je Te Plie En Deux" the French Canadian band We are Wolves creates a sound that might be music or might not be music. According to Webster's Dictionary, the definition of music is: "The art of arranging sounds in time so as to produce a continuous, unified, and evocative composition, as through melody, harmony, rhythm, and timbre."

At times throughout the album, the sound hits this definition; at other times it hits half of it. However, most of time there is a beat, but no melody, there is rhythm, but no harmony.

Maybe the sound of the album is just art. According to Webster's Dictionary, the definition of art is: "Human effort to imitate, supplement, alter, or counteract the work of nature. The conscious production or arrangement of sounds, colors, forms, movements, or other elements in a manner that affects the sense of beauty, specifically the production of the beautiful in a graphic or plastic medium."

By no means is the album plastic besides the actual cave, the album is sound therefore it is non-graphic. But the sense of beauty is challenged in a post-modern way, and the sound arrangement/production is the same way.



With the conclusion that We Are Wolves create post-modern music unlike most music heard today, one can reach the comparison to bands like Sonic Youth and the work of early Wilco.

But, unlike the bands mentioned above, We Are Wolves don't focus on lyrics or vocals all together; the instrumentals and noise are the main points of the album. Also, unlike Sonic Youth who has gone more song-oriented recently, We Are Wolves makes the music now and it is fresh and very well done, aside from some beats going flat or some noise being too loud over the beat. The album is a delightful twist from everything else today.

ing — with the wind chill diving below zero for a good part of two months. Instead of dressing down in the hundred-degree heat, they were bundling up.

"It was gorgeous in December. The first snow ... you love it," Brown said. "Then you come back [from break] in April and there's still snow on the ground. I've never lived anywhere else in my entire life other than Tuscon. I've seen snow on rare occasions but ..."

Rappaport interrupts him.

"It was a shock," he says, eyebrows raised with incredulity.

In 2004, the Red Sox won the World Series for the first time in 86 years and the Patriots won their third Super Bowl in four years. For a region that stays sky-high even when its teams are in the cellar, the winning was intoxicating, and UMass followed suit with some intoxication of its own — the American League Championship celebration, the World Series celebration and the Super Bowl celebration, all with thousands of inebriated students screaming at the tops of their lungs.

The Tuscon natives were stunned by the passion that is synonymous with Boston sports.

"Phoenix has the [Arizona] Diamondbacks and the [Phoenix] Suns," Brown stated. "But it's nothing like the Red Sox or the Patriots."

"It's kind of impressive," he conceded. "You go to class and 85 percent of the people are wearing Boston-something."

For two talented soccer players like Rappaport and Brown, one would think that there would be ample opportunity to play elsewhere, but UMass coach Sam Koch – on a west coast recruiting trip – stumbled upon Brown, and offered him the chance to play. Brown was sold.

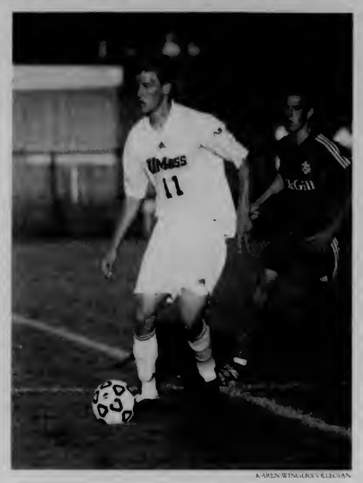
"I was in a tournament in San Diego," he said. "And Sam [Koch] saw me play and just asked me if I'd consider [playing for UMass] and if I wanted to come out here. That was what I wanted – a chance to play – it didn't really matter where.

"I saw some other opportunities but they were mostly west-coast," he added. "And I came out [to UMass] and liked the guys mostly. It was a great team."

Brown arrived last year to some bleak news. His coach informed him that the defense was already set and there weren't going to be many changes. It left him with a couple of options: either play behind the starters for the season or redshirt for a year and learn from the sidelines.

He chose the latter. And it has proven to be beneficial for both Brown – who is starting and is a formidable presence on defense – and the team.

"It was one of those situations where we didn't know where he was going to play," Koch said. "He was open to [redshirting], learning the first year. We were pretty deep at his position at that point, and we're real happy he did because now he's a freshman. And he's coming in as a starter where he wouldn't have gotten a lot of playing time his first year."



The road to UMass wasn't as straight for Rappaport, who had other Atlantic 10 schools calling.

"I was set to go to another school," he said. "And that kind of fell through and this was a college in the same conference so it just worked out really nicely."

In 2004, while Brown was on the sidelines observing, Rappaport was getting comfortable at Rudd Field, where he played the left side in the midfield and part-time defense. As Koch points out, he has developed a unique style of play.

"[Doug is] one of our best left-sided players," Koch said. "He's very dangerous going forward. He's good with the ball. He's very deceptive when it comes to winning balls. He has a Rappaport tackle that's a little bit different from everyone else. It's a poke tackle. He's very deceptive and I think it catches a lot of people off guard."

It has been a successful 2005 for both Minutemen – referred to as "Browny" and "Dougy" by teammates – who ended up with numbers 11 and 12, which is good for a few laughs when "Tuscon, Arizona" is announced back-to-back over the loud speaker before games. Brown and Rappaport were both oblivious to this – their attention focused on more urgent matters, namely getting the Minutemen back on track and ready for the conference season.

A. KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

Defenseman Chris Brown has started all 10 games for UMass this season after redshirting last year. The Minutemen are 4-6 this season.

"It is fun for me just playing," Brown said. "It's been a frustrating season, but we still have the A-10 playoffs."

The Minutemen are 4-6-0 in 2005, and they endured a frustrating September, accented by scoring droughts and a three-game losing streak (that was snapped with a 2-0 win Saturday against Siena). The all-important conference schedule begins on Sunday against Rhode Island, and Rappaport is confident that UMass will be back in stride by then.

"We just need to score some goals," he said. "It's been a really bad stretch for [senior captain] Oral [Bullen]. It's only a matter of time before Oral gets his goals, same with [sophomore] Matty [Lemire]. Come conference time we'll be fine. It's true what they say: when you're in the conference [schedule] you're 0-0, there's no record. It doesn't matter what you've done throughout the year."

It's like it has always been for these two affable Arizonians – all about soccer. And nothing would make "Browny" and "Dougy" happier than for UMass soccer to turn things around.

ate. Not that I'm in favor of anything positive happening for that network. I'm seriously considering utilizing the SAP button on my remote if the Sox make the ALCS just to avoid listening to Joe Buck and Tim McCarver.

Buck and McCarver have always driven me crazy with their thinly veiled shots at the Sox (and Manny in particular), but they've reached a new low this year, culminating in McCarver openly jinxing Schilling's no-hit bid a month ago at Yankee Stadium.

And then there's Fox, forever compelled to show Babe Ruth, Bucky Dent and Aaron Boone clips every time the Sox and Yankees meet, while somehow glossing over the fact that last year the Sox beat the Yankees in the greatest comeback in sports history, and for the first time actually have the upper hand in this rivalry. It certainly was hard to tell that during Saturday's Yankees win when Fox inexplicably played "Everybody Hurts" while panning the Fenway crowd.

I have only two requests of Fox if the Sox and Yanks meet in this year's ALCS. First, hopefully McCarver will just announce the game wearing a throwback Babe Ruth jersey, thus eliminating any confusion for which team he is pulling for. And second, I hope that Fox doesn't show any of the International League playoffs in the center of the screen while putting the Sox game in a tiny box in the bottom corner of the screen.

If Fox honors these simple requests, it should be another great October here in Amherst.

I'm sure all of you returning students already know what to expect, but to you freshmen, just keep these few things in mind over the next few weeks.

You are going to be too hung-over to make it to your 1:25 class tomorrow, but it'll be OK as long as the Sox win. Your GPA is going to fall further than you will ever tell your parents about, and you'll spend next semester just trying to avoid academic probation. You're going to go to the riots in Southwest, and they'll actually be mostly peaceful and just people celebrating, but make sure that once that gang of riot police starts to move in you get out of their way because you won't win many battles against tear gas and rubber bullets.

And one last thing, no matter how many people cheer for you to do it, it's never a good idea to jump off of the Berkshire DC.

battle. Green and Bidwill both greeted the media in Spanish, unlike Mike Nolan and John York, who didn't try. Bidwill held up a Mexican national jersey, pandering to the audience who knew what the truly big sporting event of the day was.

And Cardinals safety Robert Griffith ran out of the tunnel with an enormous Mexican flag.

The Mexican audience appreciated those gestures. And they eventually learned to appreciate the Cardinals, who at least had a semblance of an offense.

The fans' football interest was on full display. Unlike years ago, when the NFL started playing exhibition games here, fans are much more savvy, following the action, cheering and booing in all the right places. Well, mostly. They seemed to take field-goal attempts as a personal insult, booing them fiercely.

What the fans wanted more than anything was to see some decent football. They cheered every big play, which means that by early in the second half they all but abandoned the 49ers.

It's too bad, because it looked like this could be a real love affair for the 49ers. York was probably eyeing Azteca as a solution: the stadium is newer (by six years) than the 'Stick, bigger and nicer. And unlike the 49ers' home field, the place was filled.

But just like back at home, the crowd abandoned the 49ers. Really, the 49ers left the enthusiastic fans little choice.

There was something to celebrate in Mexico on Sunday night. But it wa n't happening inside Estadio Azteca.

Things were much different when Trammell was a player and he helped the Tigers post 11 consecutive winning seasons from 1978-88.

As a 20-year standout in the field and at the plate, he led Detroit to a World Series championship in 1984 and the American League East title in 1987, when he narrowly was beaten out by Toronto's George Bell for AL MVP.

Trammell was a six-time All-Star, four-time Gold Glove and three-time Silver Slugger shortstop.

After he retired in 1996, he was a baseball operations assistant in Detroit for two seasons and was the Tigers' hitting coach in 1999. Then, he moved near his hometown and coached with the San Diego Padres for three seasons.

The Tigers knew Trammell was the popular choice to be their 35th manager on Oct. 9, 2002, and they insisted he was also the right choice. Trammell, Al Kaline and Ty Cobb are the only players to be with the team for at least 20 seasons.

"People don't come to your games to see your manager," Dombrowski said when Trammell was hired. "I can understand why some people will feel that this was based on Alan's popularity here. But really, we could not afford to make this decision based on that, because we need to right this ship."

Alan Trammell was fired as manager of the Detroit Tigers yesterday. The Tigers went 186-300 during his tenure. Jim Leyland, who last managed the Colorado Rockies, has been named as a possible replacement.

A long journey to UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Things are perfect in New England. The Red Sox are in the playoffs for the third straight year, the New England Patriots are beginning their annual struggle to defend their title and the leftover summer sunshine is receding in the face of brisk winds from the looming fall.

It is a scene to which New Englanders have become accustomed, feeling entitled not only to all four seasons but also to having perennial contenders on the gridiron and the baseball diamond.

It was a drastic change for Chris Brown and Doug Rappaport, who were born and raised in Tucson, Arizona – a mere 2,800 miles from Massachusetts.

They came to the University of Massachusetts to play soccer. It was an extreme departure from the part of the country that they knew – where their hometown temperature is still in triple digits and the biggest sports draw is the University of Arizona, which doesn't even have a soccer team.

Brown and Rappaport attended Salpointe High School in Tucson, meeting for the first time on the soccer field in their freshmen year on the varsity squad. It was a successful few years for the two 'Zona natives, who – with Brown on defense and Rappaport playing the left side of the midfield – went 24-0 in their junior year and went all the way to the state finals, before losing the championship.

But the tandem came back and won the state championship in their senior year, leaving nothing behind as the college coaches came knocking.

"It was a lot of fun to leave on a good note," Brown said.

It is an odd circumstance: two soccer players in Arizona, from the same high school and in the same grade, committing to a college in Western Massachusetts.

When asked about picking UMass, both chuckled – probably at the idea of ending up in Amherst – then insisted that the thoughts about attending UMass came separately, only to escalate when they discovered what the other was thinking.

"I was thinking about it and he said he was thinking about it," Brown said. "It was nice to go somewhere and already know somebody."

Not only did they know each other, but the close-knit Minuteman soccer team was together on and off the field.

Brown and Rappaport were roommates in the Emerson dorm in Southwest for their freshman year and the majority of the soccer team was just down the hall.

"Last year our whole soccer team, I think it was 16 guys, lived on the same floor," Rappaport said.

It was a big break for the two Arizonians, who saw familiar faces with regularity, a welcome sight after a dramatic social and cultural change.

"The team was awesome," Brown said about last year's squad. "The guys made it worth it."

They were a continent away from home, fortunate to have fellow athletes around, but the 2004 winter was harsh – even for people who knew it was com-

It's back... Playoff baseball returns to UM

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Columnist

It's finally back. It's been a long wait, but the event that annually turns this campus upside down, resulting in absolutely no school work getting done for a month, thousands of dollars of damage to the campus and cops in riot gear becoming a fixture in Southwest, is back.

That's right – it's time for playoff baseball. Sure we've had to endure a long season, with roughly 356 errors by Edgar Renteria, 148 clutch hits by Big Papi and 73 idiotic quotes from Kevin Millar and Keith Foulke, but come today at 4 p.m. all that's going to matter is what happens over the next four weeks.

Many of you probably are beginning to take the Sox playing deep into October for granted, with this being the third straight year they've made the playoffs, but amazingly this is the first time in franchise history that they've made the postseason three years in a row.

So you should definitely enjoy this experience. And watching these games at UMass is as good an atmosphere as you could ask for, save for actually being in Boston. I have as many memories from the Sox last two playoff runs as from any other time in my three-plus years here.

If you're a diehard Red Sox fan, be thankful that you came here rather than going somewhere far away from Boston. I have a friend going to school in California right now who is a huge Sox fan, and I know it's killing him to be out there right now. Sure, there are some Boston bars where he can watch the games with Sox fans, but it'll be nothing like this campus over the next month.

This has all the makings of another tremendous postseason, with the potential for a third consecutive ALCS match-up between the Sox and the Yankees.

And don't think Fox isn't drooling over the possibility of the ratings that series would gener-

New kind of football in Mexico

By Ann Killion
Knight Ridder

MEXICO CITY – American football in Mexico? Si. But Sunday night was still all about Mexican futbol.

In the first NFL regular-season game outside of the United States, Estadio Azteca had all the imported trappings. The stands were packed, American rock music blared, the NFL logo was on display, the league pontificated about the history of the evening.

But the energy, the passion and the soul of the night, came – as it always does here – from soccer.

In the midst of a mundane Cardinals drive in the first quarter, a deafening, brain-rattling roar went up from the bowels of the old stadium into the cool night air. Mexico's under-17 team had just won the junior world cup with a 3-0 trouncing of Brazil.

Delirious cheers of "Mex-i-co, Mex-i-co" and "Ole, Ole, Ole," consumed the crowd for several minutes. The crowd's happy buzz lasted for the rest of the night. And they were willing to make the 49ers – the crowd favorite – the beneficiary of their excitement. But the 49ers squandered away a 14-point lead and all the crowd's love.

As thousands celebrated the soccer victory in the streets, crowding around the golden Angel of Independence statue on Paseo de la Reforma, the 103,467 inside Azteca witnessed a mind-numbing display of NFL ineptitude.

As predicted, the game was an awful display of the NFL product, with the 49ers claiming the title of most awful.

The 49ers sullied the famous field, blessed by both the pope and Diego Maradona's Hand of God. Despite Commissioner Paul Tagliabue's claims Sunday evening that the participants were both outstanding franchises, the game was dreadful.

Though the 49ers defense initially appeared worthy of Mike Nolan's trust, scoring two first-quarter touchdowns off fumbles, the 49ers offense wasn't trustworthy at all. In fact, it appeared not to have even made the trip.

And the Mexican crowd that was ready to give the 49ers all its love eventually gave up. A week ago, the 49ers had a home game that turned into a road game, thanks to thousands of Cowboys fans who invaded the stadium. On Sunday, the 49ers traveled 2000 miles south for what could have been a home game.

Before the game, the stadium was almost unanimously pro-49ers. When Derrick Johnson picked up a fumble and returned it 80 yards for the 49ers' second defensive touchdown of the first quarter, the crowd response almost equaled the celebration for the soccer team.

Mexican media had predicted that the 49ers would be the home favorite. Just like at home, the affinity dates back to the great 49ers teams of the 1980s and 90s. In the parking lot before the game, many fans were wearing NFL jerseys. The old-time legends – Rice and Young – were on display. But impressively, there were more current jerseys – Rattay, Barlow, Peterson and Alex Smith – that one would normally see even at Candlestick.

You can take the Cardinals out of Arizona but you can't take the Arizona out of the Cardinals. Even here, no one wanted to support the Cardinals before the game. There were virtually no Cardinals jerseys in the crowd. And in a pregame news conference, even Tagliabue took a shot at the Cardinals' expense.

When asked about possible future expansion in Mexico, the commissioner made fun of Dennis Green's Saturday comments when the Cardinals coach incorrectly said that the league had 36 teams and might expand to 40, (in reality, just 32 NFL franchises exist). Tagliabue said, "he just thinks he's been beaten by 36 teams."

Nearby, team vice president Michael Bidwill grimaced, probably thinking, "We gave up a home game to be mocked?"

Bruins eye Stanley Cup

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON – While the Boston Bruins hibernated during the NHL's season-long lockout, many New England sports fans hardly even noticed.

They had plenty to keep them occupied. They watched the Red Sox stage an unprecedented playoff comeback on the way to their first World Series title in 86 years. They cheered as the New England Patriots won their third Super Bowl in four seasons. Even the Boston Celtics made a late surge last season to qualify for the NBA playoffs.

Pro hockey, it seems, fell off the sports radar.

With the Red Sox World Series victory, the Bruins are now the Boston sports franchise with the longest championship drought, having not won the Stanley Cup since 1972. They haven't played in the finals since 1990 and haven't even made it to the second round of the playoffs since 1999.

It is a situation management wants to rectify as soon as possible. General manager Mike O'Connell has made no secret of the fact that he thinks he has built a team that can challenge for a championship in the new NHL, with a salary cap and rules changes designed to open up the ice and increase scoring opportunities.

"This team, the way it's set up with the rule changes, I think that we have to be considered one of the favorites for the Stanley Cup," O'Connell said in August when the team announced the re-signing of center Joe Thornton to a three-year, $20 million contract.

Thornton is the primary reason O'Connell thinks he has a contender. The 6-foot-4, 225-pound former top overall draft pick is just 26 years old and scored more than 20 goals in each of his last five NHL seasons, including two with 30 or more. In 2003-04, he led the team in scoring with 23 goals and 50 assists.

The team's young core includes forwards Sergei Samsonov and Patrice Bergeron, and goalie Andrew Raycroft, the NHL's 2004 rookie of the year. Raycroft ended a brief holdout early in training camp, but defenseman Nick Boynton, an all-star in 2003-04, remained unsigned.

Management has surrounded the young stars with veteran free agents – but are they aging stars past their prime, or experienced players who can complement the youngsters? Defenseman Brian Leetch is 38; forward Shawn McEachern is 36; and forward Alex Zhamnov will be 35 on opening night Wednesday against the Montreal Canadiens.

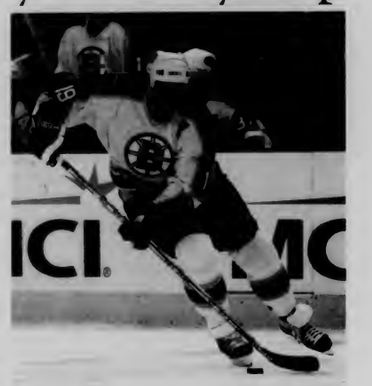
"I think we look pretty strong, and I know a lot of people are saying we have a team that can compete for the Stanley Cup," Zhamnov said. "It's not going to be easy."

The Bruins look particularly strong up front, where Thornton is likely to center a line with Samsonov and Glen Murray.

Samsonov, a former rookie of the year, is a proven scorer – when healthy. He scored 19 or more goals in each of his first five seasons but has played just 66 games over the past two NHL seasons due to wrist, knee and rib injuries. He has played just one exhibition game this year with a strained back. Murray had 30 or more goals in each of the last three seasons, including 44 in 2002-03 when he finished with a team-high 92 points.

The new rules figure to benefit the Bruins.

"We have a lot of big, strong guys who used to make plays when people were hooking, and now, look at Joe [Thornton]. He gets the puck in the neutral zone and no one can stop him," Samsonov said. "We have a lot of offensive guys on our team who thrive on that, and hopefully it's going to play right into our hands."



The question marks are on defense, where the depth is provided by inexperienced players who will have to "step up," O'Connell has said.

Hannu Toivonen, a former first-round draft pick and the backup goalie, is 21 and has never played in an NHL game.

The Bruins have been aggressive in trying to win back fans, lowering some ticket prices and promoting the new season heavily with radio ads.

But management and players know that the bottom line is wins and losses. Put a contender on the ice, and the fans will fill the TD Banknorth Garden, and maybe even forget about the Red Sox and Patriots for a couple of hours.

"In hockey towns, like Boston is, the true fans are always going to come out," Murray said. "No question about it."

Joe Thornton and the Boston Bruins return to the ice following last year's lockout and are considered a Stanley Cup contender.

Trammell cut loose by Tigers

By Larry Lage
Associated Press

DETROIT – Alan Trammell is out and Jim Leyland might be in as manager of the Detroit Tigers.

Trammell was fired Monday after three seasons in which he failed to turn around a franchise without a winning record since 1993.

"You will not find a more dedicated, hardworking and respected individual that cares more about the Tigers and his coaching staff," Tigers president Dave Dombrowski said in a statement.

"However, for the Tigers to reach the next level, I feel it is appropriate to make a change at this time."

Leyland, a former Florida, Pittsburgh and Colorado manager, said the Tigers called him Monday morning to set up an interview with him on Monday evening.

"It's well known that I interviewed with Philadelphia last winter, and I'd like to manage again," the 60-year-old Leyland said last month.

Leyland helped the Marlins win the 1997 World Series – with Dombrowski as general manager – and was a two-time NL Manager of the Year while leading the Pirates. He was 72-90 with the Rockies in 1999, his last season as manager.

The Tigers went 71-91 this season and were 186-300 in three seasons under Trammell. The MVP of Detroit's 1984 World Series team had one year left on his contract.

Detroit lost an AL-record 119 games in his first season as manager, then improved to 72-90 last year, the biggest turnaround in the AL since Baltimore's 33-game improvement from 1988 to 1989.

With a lineup and bullpen that seemed upgraded, the Tigers thought they had a chance to have a winning season in 2005.

The Tigers were 42-44 at the All-Star break and 61-62 in late August before losing 29 of their last 39 games.

The Tigers were set back by injuries this year, but Trammell refused to point to them as an excuse. Outfielder Magglio Ordonez missed about half of the season with a hernia, and closer Troy Percival appeared in just 26 games before an elbow injury ended his season in July.

Both were hailed as prized free-agent signings before the season. Standout shortstop Carlos Guillen also struggled to stay healthy after having knee surgery last year.

"Really, I'm OK," the 47-year-old Trammell said last week. "I'm a big boy. I've been through enough that I understand how things are."

UMass Dining Services beats the competition

By John Fenuccio
Collegian Staff

This past July, the National Association of College and University Food Services presented the University of Massachusetts with the grand prize during the 2005 Loyal E. Horton Dining Award presentation.

The University received a gold medal in the residence hall multiple concepts category, which qualified UMass for the grand prize. All of the winners from the region were grouped together in order to choose a grand prize winner.

The award recognized UMass for a food service program that Director of University Dining and Retail Food, Ken Toong says is better than that of smaller schools.

The judging for the award was based on several categories. To qualify, the respective school needed to meet or exceed $8 million in revenue per year. The overall ratings were judged based upon areas of menu, merchandising, presentation, marketing, nutrition soundness and overall impression. UMass was awarded 49.3 points out of a possible 50, setting the bar for other schools to be measured up against.

After touring the nation's other programs of both small and large schools, Toong said, "Our program will continue to improve and continue to give the students variety and choice."

Despite UMass' size, it's been able to compete with the nations other large universities and even the smaller colleges because of the desire to exceed the expectations of the students, a goal Toong encourages his entire staff to keep in mind.

Toong says students all too often don't recognize the strides taken by the university that have put UMass Dining Services on a national stage.

The fact that students meals are cooked in front of them helped to give an edge to the university in judging. In fact, the omelet bar is one of the most commonly overlooked aspects of the program, said Toong.

"We have two cook-to-order omelet bars in our D.C.'s. Many other schools do it once a week or once a month," Toong said.

Toong explained other initiatives that UMass Dining Services has taken. In order to stay on the cusp of innovation including the Student Ambassador Program, and a "secret-shop" type

Motives for 'Frat Row' stabbings still unknown

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

"No Comment," was the word from Zeta Beta Tau fraternity members yesterday regarding the stabbing early Sunday morning near their residence that has put many University of Massachusetts students on edge.

Meanwhile, Amherst police now say the stabbing victims were five UMass students and one non-student. Another student was also injured.

Christopher Canton, 21, of 374 N. Pleasant St., an economics and political science major, received a stab wound to the head. He remained in stable condition yesterday at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, according to John Quill, Vice President of Standards for the UMass Interfraternity Council.

Joseph Gratton of 374 N. Pleasant St., a journalism major, received a stab wound to the left bicep. He was treated at released from Baystate Medical Center.

Stephen Fiore, 20, of Somerville, a management major, received several stab wounds to the back. He was still listed in stable condition yesterday, according to Quill.

Alp Akiner, 18, of Woodcliff Lake, N.J. received a stab wound to the side. He was treated and released from Baystate Medical Center.

Sean Fitzgibbons of North Attleboro received a stab wound to the forearm. He was treated at the UMass Infirmary and released.

Thi Ly, 23, of 266 E. Hadley Rd., the only non-student whom police have identified, received a knife wound to the hand. He was treated and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

Blake Gideon of 374 N. Pleasant St., a UMass student, reported bruises to his head, but was not taken to the hospital.

Police believe the individuals involved in the incident had an altercation outside a local bar last weekend. However, police do not think the person who did the stabbing was a UMass student.

Members of the Zeta Beta Tau fraternity hang a "No Comment" sign on their front door in response to continous requests for local media oulets to comment on last weekends stabbings.

The fight that led to the stabbings occurred outside Pi Delta Psi, 389 N. Pleasant St., commonly referred to as "Frat Row." The fight involved members from both the Pi Delta Psi and Zeta Beta Tau (ZBT) fraternities.

UMass spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski said a review of the case by the administration will be done to determine any disciplinary action against the students involved, once the Amherst police is finished with their investigation. In addition, he said, "we're providing Amherst police with whatever assistance they need."

"While this is obviously a very serious incident, it involves a small number of people making bad choices," Blaguszewski said. "It's not something representative that occurs at this university."

The UMass Interfraternity Council, which represents the interests of several campus fraternities, including ZBT, released a statement yesterday that condemned the violence and distanced fraternity members from the violent acts.

"The fight was not instigated by either Zeta Beta Tau or Pi Delta Psi members," the state-

Massachusetts politicians demand redistricting

By Renee Dudley
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — Local political leaders and members of the Massachusetts branch of Common Cause proposed to create a seven-member independent commission of citizens to redraw the state's legislative district lines, in an effort to make the redistricting process more fair and democratic.

Petition signatories are calling on the Massachusetts Legislature on Monday at the State House to place a constitutional amendment on the ballot for voters in 2008 that would establish the proposed commission.

Former Massachusetts Attorney General Scott Harshbarger said gerrymandering — the illegal practice of dividing an area into electoral districts to give an advantage to a particular candidate — has caused a decline in the strength of minority votes, which are being diffused into white suburban districts.

"Democracy in Massachusetts has become a spectator sport," Harshbarger said. "This amendment will reengage the electorate and once again make local politics participatory," he said, adding that incumbent protection through redistricting is a factor that has led to Massachusetts' 49th-place rank in terms of electoral competition.

Deval Patrick, a leading Democratic candidate for governor in 2006, attended the meeting and agreed that the amendment would increase the significance of voter participation, while not wholly stripping politicians of redistricting powers.

"We're never going to totally bleach politics out of the system," Patrick said. "But this amendment strikes a fair balance because, although local citizens would be drawing the new districts, politicians appoint them in the first place."

Former governor and presidential candidate Michael Dukakis has voiced his support for new redistricting process in which the citizens decide new district lines.

Former governor and presidential candidate Michael Dukakis said Massachusetts should follow the lead of other pioneer states, including Arizona and Iowa, by establishing a private redistricting commission.

"Any time the Legislature alone picks districts, it makes a less competitive political environment to make sure the incumbents are not really challenged," Dukakis said. "The practice of gerrymandering started here, so we

Both parties conflicted over Miers nomination

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — One of the Senate's senior conservatives, Republican Orrin Hatch, offered unconditional support Tuesday to Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers amid expressions of anxiety in some Republican quarters over her legal philosophy.

The Utah Republican took on criticism that Miers has no experience as a judge and a largely unknown track record.

"A lot of my fellow conservatives are concerned, but they don't know her as I do," said Hatch, a former Judiciary Committee chairman. "She's going to basically do what the president thinks she should, and that is be a strict constructionist."

Hatch said he already has decided to support her confirmation. "I don't need any more. I know her really well. And I intend to support her," he told reporters.

President Bush, at a news conference in the White House's Rose Garden, asked the Senate to confirm Miers by Thanksgiving and urged Democrats to give her a chance to explain her views of the law and the Constitution.

He worried aloud that issues could surface, noting that half of the Democratic members of the Senate had voted against John Roberts, his choice to succeed William H. Rehnquist as chief justice of the United States.

Miers, who was meeting Tuesday with Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa., and Judiciary Committee member Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., was nominated to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

"I know her. I know her heart. Remember, she was part of the search committee that picked John Roberts," said Bush, who used his Rose Garden news conference to reiterate his credentials as a conservative.

Sessions wouldn't go as far as Hatch, saying he plans to review Miers' record. But he added that he thinks "she has a good understanding of the role of a judge — that a judge should not make law."

"I am enthusiastic about this nomination and I know the president believes in Ms. Miers strongly,

Minorites get fewer Katrina contracts

By Hope Yen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Minority-owned businesses say they're paying the price for the decision by Congress and the Bush administration to waive certain rules for Hurricane Katrina recovery contracts.

About 1.5 percent of the $16 billion awarded by the Federal Emergency Management Agency has gone to minority businesses, less than a third of the 5 percent normally required.

On Tuesday, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, R-Maine, and Rep. Donald A. Manzullo, R-Ill., asked the Government Accountability Office to investigate whether small and minority-owned businesses have been given a fair opportunity to compete for Katrina contracts.

Andrew Jenkins doesn't think so.

Once Katrina's destructive waters receded, he began making calls in hopes of a winning a government contract for his Mississippi construction company.

Jenkins, who is black, says he watched in frustration as the contracts went to others, many of

Meth ad employs cringe-factor

By Zachary Franz
Montana Kaimin (U Montana)

MISSOULA, Mont.—Would you pluck out all your eyebrows, sleep with someone for drugs or tear off your own skin? A graphic new ad campaign suggests you might if you use meth.

Despite the cringe-factor, the response to the series of advertisements illustrating the dangers of methamphetamine has been overwhelmingly positive, says the leader of Montana Meth Project, the group responsible for the ads. What we're hearing, mainly, is that it's factual and hard-hitting," said Peg Shea, who took over as executive director of the Helena, Mont.-based group on Monday.

The campaign includes television, radio, and billboard advertisements aimed at discouraging teens from trying meth. And they are intense.

One television ad shows a girl in the shower who sees the draining water turn red with blood and shrieks in horror when she sees its source: Her future-self cowering in the tub. Her future-self, pale except for her black eyes and numerous cuts, implores the still-innocent girl, "Don't do it."

A billboard ad shows a disgusting public bathroom. "No one thinks they will lose their virginity here. Meth will change that," says the sign.

The radio spots feature real Montana teens sharing their experiences with meth, including jail time, emergency trips to the hospital, and sex in exchange for drugs.

"Yes, they're graphic," said Siobhan O'Connor, a marketing expert who helped produce the ads. O'Connor, who is executive director of the Thomas and Stacy Siebel Foundation, was also the acting executive director of the project until Shea took over. "To educate teens, you have to show them the harsh reality."

"They're creepy," Trevor Russell, an employee in the University of Montana University Center food court, said of the ads. "They're enough to scare the st out of people."

The ads are not meant to frighten people, however, said Shea.

"It's not about scaring as much as showing this is scary stuff," she said, "It's a reality thing."

There have been some complaints that the television ads are too graphic, said Shea. The group has agreed to air the commercials only after 7 p.m., in order to limit their exposure to young children.

According to O'Connor, the campaign was carefully researched. Montana Meth Project conducted surveys and held focus groups with hundreds of teens. The idea, she said, was to find a way to effectively reach teens.

"It's a very different thing to craft a message for teens than for other age groups," said O'Connor.

A smile for a nickel: cheerful Jefferson shown on new coin

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After nearly 100 years of depicting presidents in somber profiles on the nation's coins, the Mint is trying something different: The new nickel features Thomas Jefferson, facing forward, with the hint of a smile.

"It isn't a silly smile or a smirk, but a sense of optimism that I was trying to convey with the expression," says Jamie Franki, an associate professor of art at the University of North Carolina-Charlotte. His drawing was chosen out of 147 entries.

In unveiling the design Tuesday, Mint officials said they believed the new image of Jefferson was an appropriate way to commemorate his support for expanding the country through the Louisiana Purchase and sending Meriwether Lewis and William Clark to explore the territory in 1804-05.

"The image of a forward-looking Jefferson is a fitting tribute to that vision," said David Lebryk, the acting director of the Mint.

For the past two years, the Mint has changed the design of the nickel every six months to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the Louisiana Purchase and the Lewis and Clark expedition, both of which occurred during Jefferson's administration.

The new five-cent coin, which will go into circulation early next year, is the last scheduled change in the nickel's appearance. It will feature Jefferson's Monticello home on the reverse side of the coin but in an updated image from the Monticello that first began appearing on the nickel in 1938.

The image of Jefferson will be accompanied by the word "Liberty" in Jefferson's own handwriting, a detail that was introduced last year in the Westward Journey series of nickels.

Since Abraham Lincoln became the first president to be depicted on a circulating coin, in 1909, presidents have always been shown in profile, in part because profile designs remain recognizable even after extensive wear on the coin. The Mint, however, believes it has produced an image of Jefferson for the new nickel that can stand up to heavy use.

For next year, between 1.4 billion and 1.8 billion of the new nickels are expected to go into circulation. The coins will be called the Jefferson 1800 because Franki's image of Jefferson is based on a Rembrandt Peale portrait of Jefferson done in 1800, the year Jefferson was first elected president.

Hispanics given less college aid

By Dawn Nott
Daily Californian (UC-Berkeley)

BERKELEY, Calif. — Hispanic students were found to receive the lowest federal financial aid awards of any ethnic group, according to a recent report by Excelencia in Education, Inc. and The Institute for Higher Education Policy.

According to the report, released in August, although more Hispanics nationally are receiving federal aid than previously, their average aid package is less than those awarded to students of other ethnicities.

Eighty percent of the Hispanic undergraduate population applied for financial aid in 2003-04, while only 63 percent actually received some form of aid. The report highlighted grants and loans, and did not include private sources.

The report showed that the average financial aid award for Hispanics in 2003-04 was $6,250, sitting below the national average of $6,890.

At the University of California-Berkeley, however, 87 percent of Hispanic undergraduates received financial aid in 2003-04.

UC Berkeley does not track sizes of aid packages by ethnicity, since ethnicity is not a determining factor, said Richard Black, associate vice chancellor of admissions and enrollment.

"I feel that we're doing a good job. If a student fills out a FAFSA, they will receive the full package of aid," Black said. "The difference is in where students go to school. All groups showing similar need are getting similar packages at Berkeley."

According to the report, 85 percent of Hispanics were U.S. citizens, compared with 93 percent of all undergraduates. Hispanics were also twice as likely to be resident aliens as all undergraduates.

"Undocumented students need more information on private scholarships, since they are usually not eligible for federal or state financial aid," said Jesse Escobar, recruitment coordinator for Raza Recruitment and Retention Center, an on-campus group that provides outreach efforts to the Hispanic community.

Although citizenship status affects financial aid eligibility, there is a benefit to attending UC Berkeley, Black said.

"The good news is, you don't have to pay non-resident fees, but the bad news is that you don't qualify for federal, state or institutional financial aid if you're an undocumented resident," he said.

Excelencia's report shows that Hispanics had relatively lower family incomes compared to all undergraduates. This is consistent with Hispanic students at UC Berkeley, who had the lowest median family incomes for 2002 freshmen, as reported by the Office of Student Research.

"From what I understand, many (Hispanic) students are going to lower-cost colleges and therefore getting less aid. It could be that they don't believe the resources are out there," Black said.

The report supports his statement, showing that 41 percent of Hispanic students went to lower-cost institutions and paid tuition and fees of $1,000 or less in 2003-04, compared with 30 percent of all undergraduates.

Many Hispanic students are also faced with the challenge that comes with being first-generation college students. Almost half are the first in their families to attend college, compared to one third of all undergraduates, according to the report.

Man pays millions to enter space

By Marcia Dunn
Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A rich entrepreneur scientist who bought his own ticket to the international space station said from orbit Tuesday that the trip was worth the millions of dollars he paid, and his only fear on launch day was not going.

"I'm having a great time. I mean, this is a dream come true," Gregory Olsen said at a news conference broadcast from the space station.

"This is my fourth day and I'm really enjoying it," he added. "Just to look out and see the Earth from about 230 miles up is just great."

The best part, Olsen said, is "just being here." As for the reported $20 million he paid for the 10-day trip, "It's like the price and value argument. This is something I wanted to do, I love doing, so to me, yes, it's worth the money."

With his launch aboard a Russian Soyuz rocket on Saturday from Kazakhstan, Olsen became the world's third paying space tourist. He made his fortune with Sensors Unlimited Inc. of Princeton, N.J., a company that makes devices for fiber-optic communications and infrared imaging. He is chairman of the board of directors and a co-founder.

Olsen said he was not afraid during liftoff.

In fact, "as soon as that rocket launched, I was the most relaxed I've been in two years. I've had some ups and downs on this thing," the 60-year-old said, referring to his lengthy delay in flying for unspecified medical reasons.

"The only thing I was nervous about was maybe I wasn't going to go. And once I felt that rocket push off from the ground, I just felt that sense of relief and joy. The Russian Space Agency has a great safety record and they're great at space, and with a crew like this, how could you go wrong?"

He said he has not suffered any of the typical space motion sickness.

Olsen arrived at the space station Monday with NASA astronaut William McArthur and Russian cosmonaut Valery Tokarev, who will spend the next six months aboard the orbiting complex. The scientist, who holds a doctorate, will return to Earth early next week with astronaut John Phillips and cosmonaut Sergei Krikalev, who have been in orbit since April.

Phillips said he can't wait to devour "a hot steaming pizza and a big cold mug of beer," once he's back on Earth. Krikalev said a good cup of coffee, and fresh fruit and vegetables, sound good to him.

California money manager Dennis Tito visited the space station in 2001 and South African Internet entrepreneur Mark Shuttleworth in 2002, in similar deals negotiated with Russian space officials.

Delta cuts flights to save fuel

ATLANTA — Delta Air Lines Inc., buffeted by high fuel costs in the wake of Katrina and Rita, said it is reducing its domestic flight schedule.

The Atlanta-based carrier isn't experiencing a shortage of jet fuel, but is conserving energy, it said.

Delta spokeswoman Chris Kelly said it's impossible to say exactly how many flights will be reduced because it will depend on travel each day.

The reductions will be minimal, though, affecting early morning and late-night flights that have low bookings, Kelly said. For example, flights are more likely to be cut on Tuesday or Wednesdays rather than on busier travel days such as Friday, Sunday and Monday.

Delta will notify affected passengers a few days in advance and will try to offer them choices about rescheduling flights, Kelly said. The company has no end date for the flight reductions.

International flights will not be affected since it would be harder to accommodate passengers with other flights on those routes, she said.

An airline industry expert said Delta's move came as no surprise when other airlines also have been temporarily curbing flights. American Airlines on Friday announced that it was temporarily cutting flights from two hubs. American, owned by AMR Corp., cited high jet fuel prices, which were also blamed for a new round of fare increases.

"You want to save fuel to avoid higher costs in the future. When you have a solvent airline that's not bankrupt ... that's American Airlines doing that, why would you be surprised that an airline that's in the midst of bankruptcy is doing that?" said Anthony Sabino, a professor at St. John's University's Peter J. Tobin College of Business in New York. "Delta has to get lean and mean ... This is what they have to do. This is the first wave, but it's going to continue."

Also Tuesday, Delta said it plans to fly eight new routes to Mexico as part of its bankruptcy reorganization plan, which includes boosting international capacity. The nonstop service would include flights from Atlanta to Acapulco and Zihuatanejo-Ixtapa; from Boston, Cincinnati and Washington to Cancun and from Los Angeles to Cabo San Lucas, Puerto Vallarta and Zihuatanejo-Ixtapa.

Delta, the third-largest carrier in the U.S., has about 4,500 flights a day nationwide.

Shares of the company, which filed for bankruptcy protection on Sept. 14, fell 1 cent to close at 78 cents Tuesday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Delta's announcement followed one by American Airlines on Friday that it was temporarily cutting flights from two hubs. American, owned by AMR Corp., cited high jet fuel prices, which were also blamed for a new round of fare increases.

American, the nation's largest passenger air carrier, said it was canceling 15 round trips temporarily from Chicago O'Hare and Dallas-Fort Worth international airports. Northwest Airlines also announced modest flight reductions.

It was only two weekends ago on Sunday, Sept. 25 when UMass police issued a Crime Alert after a man was found with a .45 caliber handgun after a report of a possible armed robbery and shooting. Police believe the suspect is a gang member from Springfield.

With the recent spike in violence, some UMass students feel less safe about walking alone or socializing on Frat Row.

"Yes, this incident will change my plans," said Masooda Gohari, a junior biochemistry major. "I don't feel as comfortable to go party there now. I always worry now about my friends going there."

"It's creepy," said Tiffani O'Connor, a pre-major in English who often frequents the fraternities. "Usually nothing happens in Amherst, ever."

Meanwhile, some students say they will not change their usual routines due to these incidents.

"This campus is fairly safe, and sometimes these types of incidents happen," said Lacy Flemming, a senior, who says she frequently walks home alone after working the late shift. "You can't let things like this change your life."

should end it here too."

Michael Sriqui, assistant director of Common Cause Massachusetts, a nonprofit and nonpartisan public interest group, said Massachusetts has a long history of gerrymandering.

"In 1812, Massachusetts Governor Eldridge Gerry, a Democratic-Republican who opposed the Federalists, endorsed slicing out a district that crawled up Essex County so that all of his friends would get elected," Sriqui said. "A critic said the area resembled a salamander — a term which then turned into 'gerrymander.'"

Pamela Wilmot, executive director of the petition initiative, said voters want redistricting problems to be addressed.

"We have not seen a lot of organized opposition to the Fair Districts legislation," she said.

U.S. miltary launches another offensive against Al-Qaida

By Antonio Castaneda
Associated Press

HAQLANIYAH, Iraq — Some 2,500 U.S. troops along with Iraqi forces launched their second major offensive in western Iraq in a week Tuesday, sweeping into three towns to take them back from insurgents who had killed Marines there last month.

The U.S. military announced its first casualties of the offensives, with four troops killed by roadside bombs during the fighting and a fifth elsewhere.

The assaults in western Iraq aim to put down al-Qaida in Iraq and other Sunni-led insurgent groups that have waged a campaign of violence aimed at wrecking a crucial Oct. 15 national vote on a new constitution. The United States has hoped the new charter would bring together the country's fractious communities, but Sunnis sharply oppose it.

Sunni Arab moderates threatened Tuesday to boycott the voting after the Shiite-led parliament passed new rules over the weekend that make it effectively impossible for Sunnis to defeat the charter at the ballot box.

The new rules deepened alienation over the political process among Sunnis, who had decided to participate in the referendum but to vote no. A boycott would undermine the referendum's legitimacy and strike a blow to hopes that political progress would weaken Sunni support for the insurgency.

"Boycotting the referendum is a possible option ... because we believe that participating in the voting might be a useless act," said Saleh al-Mutlaq, a leading Sunni politician.

The United Nations also expressed concern about the new electoral rules, saying they don't meet international standards.

U.N. officials have been meeting with Iraqi authorities and are confident that Iraq will ultimately agree to sound electoral rules, spokesman Stephane Dujarric said.

"Ultimately, this will be a sovereign decision by the Iraqis and it's up to the Iraqi National Assembly to decide on the appropriate electoral framework," Dujarric said. "That being said, it is our duty in our role in Iraq to point out when the process does not meet international standards."

In Baghdad, a suicide attacker set off a car bomb at the main entrance to the heavily fortified Green Zone, a district of Iraqi government buildings and the U.S. and British Embassies. The powerful blast killed two policemen.

The attack came on the first day of Ramadan, the holy Islamic month of fasting.

Al-Qaida in Iraq called on its followers to step up attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces and make it a "month of victory for Muslims and a month of defeat for the hypocrites and polytheists."

Previous Ramadans since the invasion and occupation of Iraq two years ago saw a spike in violence in Iraq.

Al-Qaida in Iraq urged Sunnis to boycott the referendum, saying U.S. authorities would fix the vote. "You know very well that the Americans are going to supervise collecting the voting boxes and counting the votes," it said.

The military launched its latest offensive in a cluster of cities in the Euphrates River valley about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Code-named "River Gate," it was the largest U.S. offensive in the troubled Anbar region of western Iraq this year, the military said. It also included hundreds of Iraqi troops, the largest such contingent of any of the offensives this year.

Airstrikes by U.S. warplanes and dozens of helicopters set off explosions that lit up Haqlaniyah, Parwana and Haditha before dawn Tuesday. Barrages of gunfire also were seen in the night sky. Large sections of Haqlaniyah's power were knocked out.

Some of the strikes took out bridges across the Euphrates in the area to prevent militants from escaping over them into the desert, said Lt. Col. Christopher Starling, the operations officer in Regimental Combat Team 2, which is leading the offensive.

Dozens of roadside bombs were encountered on the main arteries into the towns as U.S. troops moved in, Marine commanders said.

Later in the day, U.S. snipers took positions on rooftops in Haqlaniyah as troops blared warnings on loudspeakers ordering residents to stay inside their homes, witnesses said.

The military launched a similar offensive on Saturday, 93 miles upriver, by the Syrian border. Operation "Iron Fist," which continued Tuesday, concentrated in the towns of Sadah, Karabilah and Rumana, aiming to uproot al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents who receive reinforcements and supplies from Syria. At least 57 militants have been killed in that operation.

The military said a Marine was killed Monday by a roadside bomb in Karabilah, the first U.S. death in Operation Iron Fist.

In the hours before Operation River Gate began, a roadside bomb hit U.S. troops in Haqlaniyah on Monday, killing three, the military said.

A soldier was shot Monday morning near Taqaddum, a town close to the city of Fallujah, also in Anbar but away from the two offensives, the military said.

The killings raised to at least 1,941 the number of U.S. military members who have died since the beginning of the war in 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

The towns of Haqlaniyah, Parwana and Haditha, with a combined population of 100,000, have no Iraqi police or troops based in them, leaving their streets open to roving insurgent groups.

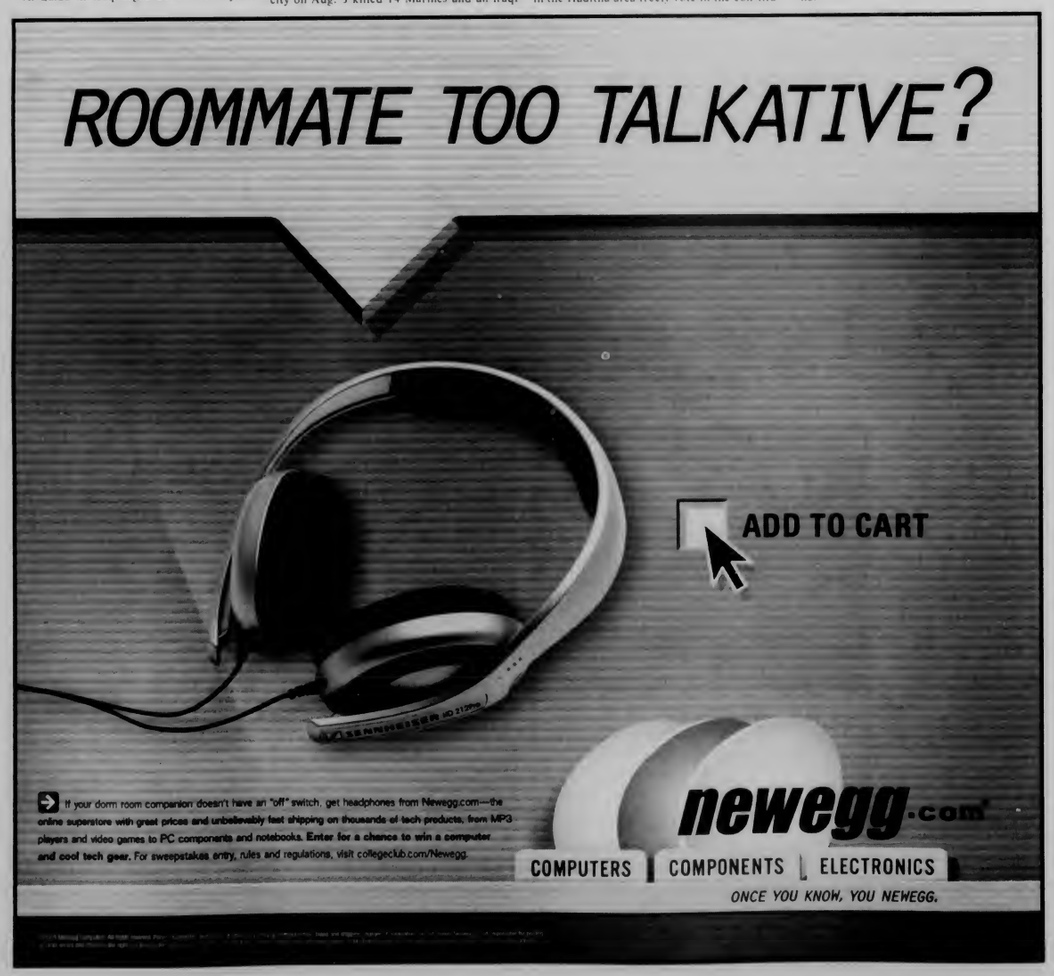
On Aug. 1, an ambush by insurgents in Haditha killed six U.S. Marine snipers, and a large roadside bomb on the outskirts of the city on Aug. 3 killed 14 Marines and an Iraqi interpreter.

KRT

Marines from the 3rd battilion of the 2nd Marine Regiment scan the horizon during a sweep earlier this month. The U.S. launched ts latest offensive about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Last spring, Haditha General Hospital, the region's largest, was heavily damaged by a suicide car bomb that set fire to the building, and insurgents used staff and patients as human shields during fighting with Marines that followed.

The U.S. military has said that Iraq's most wanted terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the head of Al-Qaida in Iraq, once had a home in Haditha.



Earlier this year, hundreds of U.S. forces conducted individual sweeps in the three towns.

The newest operation is "step forward to eliminating insurgents and giving the country back to the Iraqi people," said Col Stephen W. Davis, who added it would help residents in the Haditha area freely vote in the constitutional referendum.

On Monday, the United Nations announced in New York that it is distributing millions of copies of the draft constitution in this country ahead of the referendum. But residents in Baghdad and several other provinces told the AP on Tuesday that they have not received the document or seen it being handed out in their areas.

Under referendum rules, the constitution is defeated if two-thirds of voters in any 13 of Iraq's 18 provinces vote "no." Leaders of the country's Sunni Arab minority were hoping to use that to knock down a draft charter they say will tear Iraq into Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni fragments, leaving the Sunnis the weakest.

The Shiite-led parliament ruled Sunday that two-thirds of registered voters must vote "no."

Clinton visits New Orleans, meets evacuees

By Amy Forliti
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Officials ended their door-to-door sweep for corpses and some schoolchildren returned to classes as New Orleans revved up efforts to recover from Hurricane Katrina. Meanwhile, former President Clinton met with evacuees in Baton Rouge.

The search for Katrina victims ended in Louisiana with a death toll substantially less than the 10,000 victims some officials feared. A private company hired by the state to remove bodies was on call if any others were found. The toll Tuesday stood at 972, eight more than Monday, the state health department said. Mississippi's death toll remained at 221.

The death toll probably will continue to rise, but authorities have said sweeps yielded fewer bodies than feared, and that the toll was likely to be well below the dire projections. Mayor Ray Nagin said soon after Katrina struck that New Orleans alone could have 10,000 dead.

On Tuesday, former President Bill Clinton met with several dozen New Orleans-area residents who are staying in a shelter in Baton Rouge's convention center. The evacuees, many of whom have been sleeping on cots in the Rivercenter's vast concrete hall for more than a month, complained of lack of showers, clean clothes, privacy and medical care. Clinton, working with former President Bush to raise money for victims, toured the sleeping area, shaking hands, hugging and chatting.

"My concern is to listen to you ... and learn the best way to spend this money we've got," said Clinton, who was to visit the city itself later in the day.

Robert Warner, 51, of New Orleans said he and others have struggled to get private housing set up through the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"We've been mired in the bureaucratic red tape since Day One," he said.

There were signs of normality in New Orleans on Monday. St. Andrew the Apostle elementary school in the reopened Algiers neighborhood was the first Roman Catholic school to resume in New Orleans.

"My heart is just bursting," said teacher Jewell McCartney, fighting back tears as she welcomed her class of sixth-graders. "I just want to give them all a hug."

Archdiocese officials said their schools also were reopening in areas outside the city. Some public schools in nearby parishes also opened Monday, but public schools in New Orleans remain closed. Some may resume by November.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers continues pumping water out of the lower Ninth Ward and efforts to rebuild the levees that breached, causing water to cascade into the city, remained under way. Two canals near the area were closed Monday as a precaution, because of stronger-than-normal winds and higher tides, spokesman Alan Dooley said. As of late Monday afternoon, a steady stream of water leaked through the repaired levees.

and I value his judgment," Sessions said following an hour-long meeting with the nominee.

Bush has known Miers for more than 10 years, first as his personal lawyer and most recently as a White House counsel. "When it's all said and done, the American people are going to know what I know: This woman deserves to be on the bench. And she'll bring credit to the bench and to the law," he said.

Facing criticism from conservatives who were disappointed over his father's choice of Justice David Souter, who has become one of the most liberal members of the court, Bush insisted that Miers was a strict constructionist and a conservative and would stay that way. "She isn't going to change over the course of time," Bush said.

"I have said in the past that I would like a nominee with a proven track record on important issues to all Americans and whose judicial philosophy is well-formed," said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., one of Congress' most fervent anti-abortion lawmakers. "I am not yet confident that Ms. Miers has a proven track record."

of program where students ranging from freshmen to seniors are picked to visit each D.C. once a week and report on their experience. UMass also employs student greeters who-m Toong has asked to say hello to at least fifty students a day, as well as student chefs with a talent for sushi making to create sushi in the Worcester D.C.

"A lot of people assume that DC food would be bad, but everyone I talk to agrees that the food is pretty good. There is a lot of variety and it's obviously much more convenient than having to cook for ourselves," said freshman Ashley Maroney

Toong says the university is continuously challenged because of the need to meet the expectations of thousands of customers each day (5,000 meals a day are served in Southwest alone).

"People wonder if UMass is too big, but we're out to prove to ourselves and to everyone else, we're four dining commons that run just like four colleges," Toong said. "We can do it like the small schools and even better."

Minority firms struggle to obtain building contracts them larger, white-owned companies with political ties to Washington.

"That just doesn't smell right," said Jenkins, president of AJA Management and Technical Services Inc. of Jackson, Miss., noting the region has a higher percentage of blacks and minority-owned businesses than other areas of the country.

Many requirements normally attached to government contracting were waived by Congress and the administration.

The result has been far more no-bid contracts going to businesses that have an existing relationship with the government.

There also was an easing of affirmative action rules for contractors and a suspension of a "prevailing wage" law that black lawmakers and business people believe will hurt the disproportionately large number of black hourly workers in the region.

"It sends a bad message," said Harry Alford, president of the National Black Chamber of Commerce. "What they're basically saying to the minority in New Orleans is, 'We'll make it harder for you to find a job. And if you do, we'll make sure you get paid less.'"

The Department of Homeland Security, whose FEMA division handles most of the contracts, said it is committed to hiring smaller, disadvantaged firms.

But many of the no-bid awards were given out to known players who could quickly provide help in an emergency situation, spokesman Larry Orluskie said.

"It was about saving lives, protecting property, and going to who you go to, to get what you need," he said.

The Labor Department also has said its decision to temporarily suspend affirmative action rules for first-time government contractors doing Katrina work was motivated by a need to reduce paperwork to speed emergency aid.

The Army Corps of Engineers has a better record on minority contracts, with roughly 16 percent of the $637 million in Katrina contracts going to minority-owned companies, according to agency records.

Businesses with more than 50 employees typically must have a written affirmative action plan if they are awarded contracts of more than $50,000.

But the Bush administration removed that requirement for three months, saying basic anti-discrimination laws would provide adequate protection.

At a recent meeting in Mississippi for minority businesspeople with federal contracting officials, Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., said many of the 100 owners walked out in anger when told their best chance of getting work was to seek smaller subcontracts from the larger companies.

The larger companies include Kellogg, Brown & Root, a subsidiary of Halliburton, which Vice President Dick Cheney headed from 1995 to 2000; and AshBritt Inc., a Florida company with ties to Mississippi's governor, Haley Barbour, the former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

"The president has talked about small businesses being the engine of our economy, but when the time for sound bites is over his administration still uses the same backroom deals to take care of their friends," said Thompson, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

The situation has exacerbated racial sensitivities that already were heightened by the slow initial federal response to the New Orleans flood. Many poor black residents didn't get help for days.

President Bush has met privately with NAACP President Bruce Gordon to discuss the racial component of the disaster. And Alford said he will get a meeting with Bush sometime soon to talk about improving opportunities for minority contractors.

With billions of dollars of new contracts still yet to be awarded, minority leaders say they remain hopeful the Bush administration will begin to provide the same types of opportunities given to large-scale contractors.

Willie Nelson of 33-year-old Nelson Plumbing Inc., continues to wait. He says white-owned firms scurry with work in Mississippi, while his Jackson business sits idle.

"The majority firms are all over the place," Nelson said. "We just want an equal opportunity. But it's been very difficult. They seem to be more interested in taking care of their own while we try to just get a foot in the door."

Past riots are cautionary tale for upcoming games

"I am not going to class again until the Sox win. If they get swept, I'll drop out and come back in the spring ... that's how hardcore I am," said John Gentile, a UMass student and avid Red Sox fan, just after they were beaten by the Chicago White Sox last night 14-2. This statement reflects the mindset of this campus, along with a good portion of New England right now. With the mayhem and riotous behavior that occurred last year during the World Series, including the death of Victoria Snelgrove, safety is very important to keep in mind as we all advance further into the playoffs.

With the recent stabbings that occurred over the weekend, Amherst police and UMass police will undoubtedly be under a lot of pressure from students, residents and the administration to make sure this campus and its students remain safe. However, repeat performances are things this campus cannot afford to see right now. The student body as a whole needs to really put forth a strong effort in ensuring that this baseball season ends without any further injuries or riotous behavior.

According to an article in The Daily Collegian on Tuesday, "Police said that alcohol was likely a factor in the fight." This concept is one that needs to be firmly grasped by everyone on campus planning on celebrating in the similar fashion of last year. A UMass student was critically injured and the suspicion of alcohol involvement is there. At this point, another large-scale "riot" or disturbance is exactly what is not needed at this University.

Parents and students are led to believe that UMass is a safe community. However, according to the article, Meghan Brescher said, "It seems so random and it freaks me out. They make it seem so safe here. I can't believe there was nobody there to stop the fight before it got that bad." The student getting stabbed and the riotous behavior from the baseball games are two very different situations. However, the stupidity of both is clearly apparent.

This campus is a safe campus. The only way it can remain that way is by not participating in any irresponsible and illegal behavior during the upcoming playoff games. Considering nothing for the school's reputation, we should all think of our own security and safety in the weeks ahead. Also, the weight of this year's World Series is not as heavy as it was last year. There is no "curse" to be broken. And while many Red Sox fans would like to keep the championship rolling, the hardest part is now over. You are all over the hump.

Unfortunately, alcohol consumption is a factor that will never be eradicated. However, we can only hope that those opting to drink will drink responsibly and be mindful of their actions. On behalf of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, we hope that you all choose to watch and celebrate the playoff games in a non-violent and responsible manner. Please keep your actions in mind during the upcoming weeks.

Duncan Devlin

From the first time someone indulged in storytelling, society was doomed to destroy itself. As a story passes down through the generations, there is the potential for someone to not know the difference between fantasy and reality. Today, it is not the passing down of oral traditions or those stories written in books that create killers, but it is the movie industry. Our nation's youth is being destroyed by a new movie genre that has evolved in the last few decades: entertainment. This genre has got to go before it is too late. As long as Americans continue to let their children watch non-Disney movies (although Aladdin may be a little too violent), humanity has an ever-growing potential to destroy itself. I call for the swift abolishment of all forms of violent media before it is too late.

As we all know, violent films create serial killers. From an early age, many children have no concept of the difference between fantasy and reality. Aliens, Terminator 2 and Robocop are traditional movies that often blur the fine line between fantasy and reality, leading to a loss of life. Lord of the Rings has recently called children to take up swords and start hacking off the limbs of any agent of evil that may pass their way. If a child watches any film with violence in it before the age of 17, he or she is surely on the way to creating another schoolyard massacre. With many parents having no way to tell their children the difference between fantasy and reality, what is a concerned nation to do? I propose stronger guidelines all around.

First of all, we must abolish the current practice of making films that blatantly demand an "R" rating. Films such as Saw or Pulp Fiction have no right being anything more than an idea (which we will need some way to detect) in the back of someone's mind. In fact, I would say the MPAA should bump any film deserving of the current PG-13 rating straight up to NC-17 (which we must soon change in favor of the NC-24 rating). Even PG films will need some serious work.

Star Wars, for example, may be too much for our children.

With many parents having no way to tell their children the difference between fantasy and reality, what is a concerned nation to do?

After all, it has all those lasers, space battles and lightsabers, and let us not forget about its promotion of the occult with that so called "force." How many children will be the victims of senseless beatings with plastic lightsabers by peers in Darth Vader costumes this Halloween? But what can be done? Even if we remove these elements from the theaters now, people still have recordings in their possession.

Archives of movies present the ultimate threat to our nation, since anyone with a video player can watch them. Children are resourceful enough to acquire films without directly purchasing them. Unlike video games, which present a slight challenge in acquisition due to price, video tapes, laserdisces and DVD's, as well as any computer multimedia, are relatively easy to obtain, and have no place in the hands of Americans. Even if someone does not have children, it is still good practice to make sure that he or she does not have the potential to contaminate our sterilized America.

Of course, our only hope is to outlaw all recorded media. Those forms mentioned above, as well as books, control people have over their TV viewing and basically just about any way that people can make their own choices in entertainment, or life for that matter, need to find a home in abolition. In order to enter politics, there will be only one piece of required reading: Ray Bradbury's Fahrenheit 451 (abridged edition).

Of course, the reading may be problematic, since this will be the only form of memory left for our society. Some forms of, "moving pictures," may continue to exist, but the government (or maybe just the Office of Homeland Security) will be the only people who can decide what Americans want to watch. After all, they know what people want and what is best for the masses. In my opinion, "... deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed" is a perfectly reasonable statement to pacify the masses. It will not matter anyway, since the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution will soon be long gone.

Please, restrict what the American people can do. Our nation was founded on the principle of doing the will of a few rich prudes in power; let's keep it that way.

De Effe: taking it all in World Perspectives

Wesley Miller

I spent the bus ride from Guadalajara to Mexico City drifting in and out of shallow sleep. I had lately been reading too much Kerouac and underneath my quiet, pensive demeanor, I was composing explosive narratives as I gazed out the window into the darkness of the Mexican desert. I was headed back to the city of my birth or so it seemed; the city which only two months before had laid to waste my former confident self and left me as fresh and vulnerable as a newborn child.

I spent the summer before my trip to Mexico in preparation. My goal was emptiness. That is to say, I wanted to be empty of all preconceptions, notions and desires. To a point, I was ready. I had arrived at the conclusion that my choice to travel abroad meant nothing in the grand scheme of things and that Mexico existed entirely outside my comparisons and experience. I was trying hard, a little too hard. I was to learn that soon.

The flight from Logan to Guadalajara had stopovers in Chicago and Mexico City. Even in attempting to describe the latter, I still find myself at a loss for words, each word as deficient as the last. I'm as awe stricken and reverent as I was that day months ago.

The whole moment occurred in layers, each holier than the one before it. As we started our descent into Juarez, things were unfolding, beginning with the city. From the first sight, to the touchdown, Mexico City stretches out to infinity in a perfect Euclidian plane of urban geometrics only heeding to the dormant volcanoes that tower over the city like ancient guardians. Every time I thought it would stop, every time I thought the skyline would appear, it simply continued to stretch.

There was no possible way to compute what I was seeing. If I were truly an enlightened, empty being, I could have sat there calmly absorbing the scene, but I was degenerating exponentially by the second. All at once I was stripped naked for the world to see, completely vulnerable and embarrassed.

My philosophy meant nothing. I wasn't enlightened; I was a kid from the suburbs of Boston with well-formed ideas about men, women and the existence of God. Where was the Pru? Where was the Hancock?

My philosophy meant nothing. I wasn't enlightened; I was a kid from the suburbs of Boston with well-formed ideas about men, women and the existence of God. Where was the Pru'? Where was the Hancock? This wasn't Boston; this was a completely different world that I would never, ever understand. My eyes were smarting and chills were running up and down my spine. The woman next to me asked if I was all right.

Two months later I was headed back and my heart was full of joy. The second the bus squealed to a stop, I was a mad tourist, running around frantically absorbing everything I possibly could then letting it bang around like a pinball inside my being. I was in la Ciudad de Mexico (or De Effe as the natives call it), one of the great urban metropolises of the world and I was thankful down to my core.

At roughly 21 million people the Districto Federal of Mexico is the third largest city in the world. When the Spanish arrived almost 500 years ago, this was the Aztec capital of Tenochtitlan. It was situated on a lake, which the Spanish drained to build their new world headquarters. Now, the churches of the conquerors sink comically into the moist earth while the important buildings are held up on complex hydraulic support systems. On any given day, the Zocalo (central plaza) is swarmed with pedestrians, vendors, beggars, musicians and dancers. The whole place is completely overwhelming. The only thing you can do is be overwhelmed.

In the space of the trip, we saw all the important landmarks, including the ones that only existed in my myth. We ran up and down the pyramids at Teotichuacan for hours, tried to imagine what was going on in Frida Kahlo's head as we looked down at her bed and sipped Coronas in the hot Mexican sun and drifted through ancient Aztec canals at Xochimilco. Somewhere off in the chaos of the barrios, I knew Kerouac had composed "Mexicali Blues." I also knew that Mexico City was where they found Borroughs writing "Naked Lunch." I visited these places at night while I slept. By day, my eyes went bloodshot attempting to take in everything else.

The second I hit my seat on the trip back, I was out. It would be hours before we were out of the city's shadow and back in familiar Guadalajara. In the meantime, I slept contentedly and had deep, restful dreams of Juarez, De Effe and Jack Kerouac.

The electronic addiction

Andrew Freeman

He went into the establishment on Wednesday, having lost his girlfriend and his job. Two days later, he fell out of his chair, still conscious but seriously ill. He died at a hospital, his heart failing from dehydration and lack of sleep.

Lee Seung Seop died after playing online games at an Internet cafe for two straight days, as reported in the Los Angeles Times. The 28-year-old South Korean man's death illustrates a broader problem facing millions of people across the world — electronic addiction.

Electronics are everywhere. Many of us can scarcely conceive of a life without them. In my own life, this is especially apparent. I do my papers and some course readings on my laptop. I read the news on my laptop. Most of my entertainment comes from electronic sources, be it playing computer games, reading humorous Web sites or watching DVDs. This column is being written on my laptop, based on research from the Internet.

All of this is fine. Many students can balance their electronic lives with their real ones, and the Internet, television or other media cause only minor disruption. But it is not difficult for these useful devices to take over one's life.

Many students can balance their electronic lives with their real ones, and the Internet, television or other media cause only minor disruption. But it is not difficult for these useful devices to take over one's life.

There is something tantalizing about the new technology. The Internet, in particular, provides almost instantaneous access to an enormous amount of information. The potential uses of the Internet are amazing: almost anything can be done online. However, the variety of opportunities for distraction online are limitless, from activities that might be construed as productive, such as checking e-mail, to those that are clearly not, like online games.

The perceived anonymity of the Internet is also seductive for some, leading people to believe that there are no consequences for what they view. I write "perceived" because online privacy is often a misnomer, compromised as it is by spyware, cookies and hacking. Also, other users of a computer can often simply look at the browser history to see what was accessed. Still, this perceived anonymity encourages the creation and viewing of Web sites promoting everything from racism to criminality to pedophilia to suicide.

Perhaps the most addictive power of the new technology is the potential of creating and inhabiting alternate realities. This idea, explored in science fiction, has become reality through computer games, specifically massively multiplayer online role-playing games. In MMORPGs such as World of Warcraft and Asheron's Call, you create characters and adventure with thousands of gamers worldwide through a vast world, completing quests and slaughtering monsters or other players.

The danger of these games, indeed of all computer and video games, is that they can become extremely addictive. Often when I play computer games, I find it is less about having fun than it is about accumulation — getting better items for my character, completing quests, etc. It can feel almost like a job — I feel compelled to improve my character, or finish a mission — and this entertainment can feel more important than real work. These feelings arise in games, like Starcraft and Diablo II, which are not open-ended and can be set down fairly easily.

Massively multiplayer games are significantly more addictive, because they are designed to be unlimited. While one can eventually beat most computer games, MMORPGs require immense amounts of time, and the game designers are constantly creating more areas to explore. Game makers are paid monthly fees, so they strive to make the games as absorbing as possible to keep their customers, which has the consequence of nurturing some gamers' addiction to the games.

Besides the Internet and gaming, there are many other mediums for electronics to influence our lives, from the ubiquitous cell phone to television. Americans watch far too much television: an average of four hours and 46 minutes of television each day, according to the 2005 Eurodata TV worldwide study. Cellular phones have many of the same capabilities as computers, from games to Internet access. They can even provide the trappings of love: the Hong Kong company, Artificial Life, has developed a virtual girlfriend program that cell phone users can interact with.

The reason that technology is so appealing is that it promises to rectify our insecurities, or allow us to ignore them. Do you feel lonely?

Stalk chatrooms or talk to hundreds of acquaintances on AIM. Do you want to feel important? Start a blog. Does your real life disappoint you?

Live in another world, where you can be supreme ruler of your own destiny. But technology cannot solve your personal problems or allow you to escape them, and if you approach it with that goal, then you may become addicted. The consequences of addiction, as Lee Seung Seop's story illustrates, can be tragic.

Dangers of the rumor mill

Becky Martins

As French designer Coco Chanel once said, "The most courageous act is still to think for yourself. Aloud."

Too often, people believe everything they are told. Many fail to look at situations critically and arrive at their own opinions. If they are confident in what they think, these individuals don't always speak up. However, to truly get ahead, we must realize the importance of objectivity. Until this happens, our lives will be lived in accordance with others' beliefs and principles. We may share a common opinion of our peers, but how much of it is really our own?

Psychologist Erik Erikson is famous for his seven stage developmental theory, which describes people's gradual progression through life. As infants and toddlers, we learn the meaning of trust and establish relationships with others. During childhood, we develop social skills and learn what society requires of us. But from adolescence on, our self begins to think independently. No longer should it matter what others expect. Instead, we question our own thoughts and beliefs, wondering if they fit the person we are becoming, according to a Web site by Dr. C. George Boeree of Shippensburg University's Psychology Department.

However, in college, we recognize a change taking place. Cliques disappear and we are allowed to become individuals. We feel no pressure to think or act a certain way just to be accepted. In essence, our real voice begins to emerge, since it is finally allowed to do so.

Upon coming to college, many people tend to go through this transition. As freshmen, we arrive on campus, feeling like we have life all figured out. High school, compared to what is to come, was easy in comparison. Our worries were petty and small-in-scale, typically. It was almost expected to just "go with the crowd." However, in college, we recognize a change taking place. Cliques disappear and we are allowed to become individuals. We feel no pressure to think or act a certain way just to be accepted. In essence, our real voice begins to emerge, since it is finally allowed to do so.

With this newfound knowledge, we develop further. Interesting classes and the new people we encounter begin to shape our life perspectives. The world becomes much larger than before, if we allow ourselves to see it in such a way. The realities of today's society become more realistic, since with each year, we get closer to joining it as adults.

One would think, then, with this newly acquired maturity, people would begin to grow up. But, sadly, this is not always the case. Too often, individuals succumb to gossip. Those on the listening end fall victim to rumors and fail to think for themselves. Essentially, many are quick to forget about approaching adulthood and regress back to juvenile behavior. It is disheartening to think that otherwise good people could lower themselves to such a position.

As college students, we are the next generation to run this country. Yet, for some, believing made-up stories and incredulous lies makes more sense than thinking impartially.

What makes this issue ever sadder is that such behavior does not get left behind at college graduation. Instead, as we go through life, we will continuously meet manipulative people and those who they victimize. Certain individuals never seem to grow out of old habits and make life more dramatic than it ought to be. Others, who are not strong enough to stand up for themselves, find constant turmoil in their lives. In a way, it is as if some people never grew out of their adolescence. But without trying to change, how can they be expected to?

Essentially, if someone wants to be original, then do not just be another lemming following the crowd. Look at all issues with some level of impartiality. Realize that every argument has two sides: both of which should be considered with equal importance. If something is unfair, then speak up, regardless of how unpopular the opinion may be at the time.

Too many people are quick to believe anything they hear, whether it comes from a politician's mouth, a news anchor's broadcast or while sitting around with friends. But regardless of how credible the source may be, or thought to be, remember it is our job to think critically. If we do not, we set ourselves up only to be force-fed with lies. We become just as guilty for believing the rumor mill as the one who started it. And remember, if the tables are ever turned, would we not want to be innocent before proven guilty? Maybe if people remembered that talk is cheap, then fewer people would stop putting such value in it.

Think before you speak

Asif Khan

I was sitting on a bus the other day and heard some guys talking, sitting behind me. One of them said, "That's so gay man," and another replied, "yeah, man don't be a fag," and I started to think, what is so gay, and what does that even mean? Who got up one day and said I am going to take this word, which society uses to define homosexuals and make it into a slur which will be used whenever someone does something stupid or bad.

The same goes for fag, dyke and the list goes on. These guys are probably not homophobic, or maybe they are, who knows. I have heard gay people use it in the same way before. Most of the time when people say, "that is so gay," they don't even mean it in a homophobic sense, but it is still offensive and uncomfortable, whether you are gay, straight, purple or olive.

I am not one for labels and boxing people into different groups, but unfortunately society is all about that, and I am sure I do it too. You are either an Asian lesbian, or a gay Republican or a cultural Muslim, or all or none of those. Growing up with languages which did not have any words for race, gay or homophobia, all these labels were pretty alien to me till I started watching American television and later came to college in the United States.

Over here though, especially in college, labels of homosexuality, race and nationality are ever prevalent and one just cannot seem to escape from them. Not wanting to identify with any labels is also now ironically a label. I walk through the Campus Center and almost every table caters to a different click. Granted, people should have the opportunity to preserve and share their culture, religion and ethnic identity. However, at the end of the day, is all that really bringing people closer and bridging racial and sexual gaps? Or is it just creating more boxed identities and consequently more alienation and seclusion?

I spent the past year in Barcelona, Spain and Istanbul, Turkey. Barcelona is often thought of as a crazy, party city with some art and history thrown in and all in all, very encompassing and liberal. I would agree with that generalization to an extent. I did find it to be very open and not very "labeled." People would go out and live life not paying that much attention to where their friend is "really" from or who he or she chooses to date or sleep with. Istanbul, on the other hand, has a very different stereotype in most Americans' minds.

Automatically connecting Istanbul to Islam and the Middle East (and consequently repression and intolerance) some people are confused as to why I went to such a place. I laugh it off, because looking back at the year I spent there, it was the most amazing and liberating time of my life. Over there I honestly felt at peace with everything and no one cared about trivial details such as the ones I mentioned earlier. Turks, Americans, Africans, Slavs, gay and straight guys and girls were hanging out together and no eyebrows were raised when someone said ex-boyfriend instead of ex-girlfriend and vice versa.

Now I am not saying that Turkey is this liberal paradise where everything goes and the United States is this repressive, labeled society. Obviously the group I hung out with and the school I went to represent a minority and are privileged by virtue of economics and social status (which is only partly true because Turks had to pay the equivalent of $150 a semester at the university I attended).

That is also the case in Amherst; this whole area is also in no way representative of the whole of the United States, the Dakotas, Carolinas and Texas. It is, however, a cross section of American society, and many would say a very liberal, aware and advanced one. But walking around campus, some of the things one picks up are just mind-blowing sometimes. One starts to think if this is the situation here then God bless the "not so enlightened" parts of the country.

I guess the point I am trying to make is that you should try and get to know people as individuals, for who they are and who they portray themselves to you as. Yes, their race, upbringing, sexuality and nationality might play some role in that, but do not let those things play the primary role. They themselves are the primary roles in their lives. Next time you hear someone say, "that is so gay," tell them it's not and you don't know what exactly they mean by that expression, whether you are gay or not. If it is not OK to use countless other words that denote race and ethnicity in a negative way then the same should be true for sexuality.

No more 'bricks in the wall'

Colin Jones

The worst part of being held in a cell is the way time passes. It doesn't. Minutes stretch on for millenniums as you sit in a cold sweat, wondering how you ended up here.

In this dark box, with barely enough room to hold its rubber coated cot and metal toilet, there are no clocks. No windows. There aren't any lights either, but it's probably better that way. It makes it easier to sleep, if you can.

It finally happened. I thought I'd been there before. I was wrong. When you've lost a home, any sense of stability and any capacity for trust that you might've had, you also come to know a thing or two that most people never will. I'm talking about hitting bottom. Once, foolishly, I felt a twisted sort of pride, believing that such knowledge would make me stronger. And in a way, it does, but this isn't an example of strength as in power, it's more a case of adaptation as in defense.

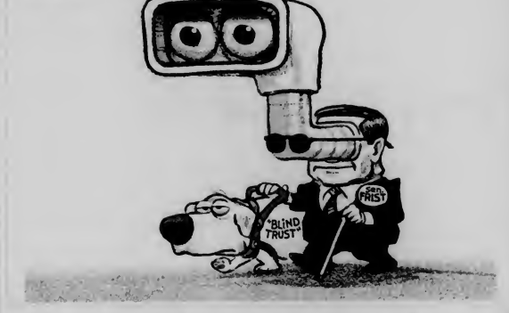
As I looked back on the course of events that brought me here, I was dumbfounded and disgusted. I used to be such a nice guy. Now, I'd had three jobs in three months. I'd lost any sense of personal integrity, alienated some of the few people I kept close to me and any vestige of self respect or value that I had somehow slowly flickered out, leaving only wisps of smoke in its wake.

But wait, let me start earlier. For our purposes, my life really began when I started school here four long years ago. In retrospect, I can't even recognize myself. I was so hopeful, but it was the kind of hope that inside you never believe will be realized. I had lived a life that gave me a unique kind of perspective; a kind of distance that I put between myself and everyone else. I always expected the worst from everyone.

I was and still am surprised when I see that my pessimistic view of human nature is ungrounded. In fact, I have seen that in most people, there is a basic goodness, a level of understanding which is an inherent component of who many people are. By the same token, I have seen the darker element of humanity firsthand, the results of which are most profoundly the knowledge of its existence, a loss of innocence and naivety that ages not the body but the soul.

I had lived a life that gave me a unique kind of perspective, a kind of distance that I put between myself and everyone else. I always expected the worst from everyone.

And sitting here, stripped of my freedom, pangs of guilt and fear alternately spiraling through my guts, I slowly saw a light begin to shine, shimmering far off in the distance of my mind's eye. I've seen what happens when people give into the bitterness that they hold within themselves. They were not robbed of their humanity unwillingly. Its strangulation may have been silent, but it was nevertheless the victim of a slow but purposeful erasure.



It is true what they say about the eyes being the window to the soul. I know this because there are people out there, perhaps you've met one, with eyes that once no doubt contained affection and hope, but now are empty, doll-like, devoid of any semblance of feeling or understanding. I'd always said I didn't want that to be me, but until this particular point in time, I'd never realized how much I meant it.

I am grateful for what happened. I needed to know what it could be like to lose everything, a harsh but strangely bittersweet dose of reality shot straight to my heart. For the first time in a long time, I actually felt something, and it was something good. Starting subtlety, stirring within me was a sense of hope for the future, love for those whom have meant so much to me, and gratitude for my potential place in the world, one filled with dreams that could be reached if only I were to reach for them. These sensations I could feel resonating deep within me, touching upon parts not lost or hidden but buried, so far down that I had forgotten they were there.

So now I know that though I had lost my way, I have found it again, and I can once again be someone whom I'm proud of. And sadly, it is true. There are those who seek to exploit the weaknesses or prey upon the fears of others. The cold reality of this can stifle even the most kind and gracious of us, but in our attempts to keep up barriers against them, we often separate ourselves from the closeness we want. Perhaps life is too short to build walls up so high. There is a lot of goodness in the world, and it's up to us to ensure its perpetuation.

Ernest Hemmingway once wrote, "This is a great world we live in, and worth fighting for." I agree with the second part.

Free speech cannot be silenced

Justin Jackson

As some readers of the Collegian may have already noted, students at Holyoke Community College engaged in countering the military's recruitment activities on that campus last Thursday, were attacked first by members of that school's Republican Club, and then the college police. One student, Charles Peterson, was maced in the attack. He has since been banned from the campus, where he also works. He was and has not since been arrested or charged with any crime, and has been banned despite college procedures that outline a judicial process of investigation before such bans can be enforced.

This matter should be a concern to all of us here at UMass and in the wider community, no matter what our individual opinions are about the justice of military recruitment or the justice of the War in Iraq. Without free speech, our democracy dies. As our college and university campuses increasingly become one of the few spaces in which citizens and students can express their political opinions freely, and engage in discussion and dialogue, it is ever more important that we all are vigilant and jealously protect our rights to speak freely.

As our college and university campuses increasingly become one of the few spaces in which citizens and students can express their political opinions freely, and engage in discussion and dialogue, it is ever more important that we are all vigilant and jealously protect our rights to speak freely.

This is not a controversial right. It is literally the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. This right, when not enforced or violated by different groups, including police and other representatives of local, state or federal governments or other institutions, has only been preserved when generations before us accepted the challenge to preserve it. As for students' free speech rights, Mario Savios of Berkeley and other campuses fought for years to preserve their rights.

If you think free speech is important, to you and to the health of our democracy, I urge you to please make an effort to join a rally and march for free speech at Holyoke Community College on Thursday, Oct. 6, at 11 a.m. The march will start at G Building and proceed to College President Messner's office, where the marchers will present Messner with a set of demands, including an apology for the police riot of last week, a repeal of the ban against Charles Peterson and the college's respect for all student free speech rights and acts.

As for the University of Massachusetts, we can only hope that the chickens of campus police repression do not come to roost here. The UMass Anti-War Coalition will soon be active in counter-recruitment work on our campus. Again, whether you agree with the politics of the War in Iraq or not, there are important questions that we must face, as members of the university community, about the myriad of ways in which our university and American universities as a whole are connected to, or complicit with, the United States government and its imperial foreign policies.

Should our university allow military recruiters to actively pursue students, some of them who may be vulnerable to recruitment, to come onto our campus and peddle information, or often misinformation, about the benefits of enlisting in the military? Should we allow an employer which has a policy banning gays and lesbians from enlisting to actively recruit at UMass, which has an anti-discrimination policy? Should we allow recruiters to come onto campus, where they can talk to and recruit, sometimes students who should be busy studying and be supported by UMass in their academic work, but may be having trouble with their studies or anxiety about future employment?

Additionally, should UMass be allowed to pursue various forms of research for the Department of Defense, when a majority of the Commonwealth's citizens oppose the current war in Iraq? Must our obligations as a public research, land-grant University include obligations to research which supports policies which are arguably illegal according to international war crimes laws? In 2005, UMass faculty members and departments received $9 million from the Defense Department for military-related research, in 2004, it received $15 million.

These are broader questions which UMass anti-war students will be raising this year. I hope you will express your opinion about these issues, whether you agree with anti-war students or not. Yet, if we don't support students here and on other nearby campuses who are fighting to maintain or regain their rights to free speech, we may one day look for that right and find that it has been forever extinguished.

'Torridity' draws inspiration from impoverished life in Africa

By Jacqueline Mercer
Collegian Correspondent

"Torridity," a series of drawings by artist Gretchen Beck now showing in the Central Gallery, depicts the trees that give life and parables to the impoverished people of southwestern Niger.

Located in West Africa and named the number one "least livable" country in the world by the 2005 U.N. Human Development Index, Niger is currently in the midst of a famine brought on by drought and locusts that threatens the lives of 3.5 million people, according to Rotary International.

Beck first went to the country as a Peace Corps volunteer in 1982. She had studied French, the official language of Niger, as an undergraduate art student at Valparaiso University and was looking for a place where she could develop her art and language skills while helping others. "It's about building a relationship with a place," she said of her time in the Peace Corps.

Her program worked on reforestation efforts that sought to make the land more fertile and able to support crops. The people of the area, known as the Djerma and Fulani, rely almost entirely on growing millet, a type of whole grain, for their livelihood.

After three years of volunteer work she returned home to become an art professor at Concordia University in Irvine, Calif., but has returned to Africa a number of times to help raise money to promote humanitarian efforts. "I try to go back most summers," she said. "It gets in your blood."

She is also able to use some of her time on these return trips to do preliminary work on future art projects. She said, "I interview people, take photos and do sketches. I study different aspects of the landscape. It's all a form of research for the images I produce."

It was during one of these trips that Beck first got the idea for her "Torridity" exhibit. "Your average Nigerian is really a survivor. Someone who endures great hardship," she said. "I was looking for a practical kind of metaphor to represent that theme."

Beck began to talk to some of the Fulani and Djerma people of the region about the trees scattered around the area.

The trees continue to give back to the people and thrive year after year despite the hot, arid climate that makes it almost impossible for most agriculture to grow. "Proverbs in this area compare the people to those trees," she said.

She points to a pen and ink drawing on the wall entitled, "Kobay." It portrays the braid-like roots of the Banyan tree; roots that will soon grow into an enormous tree, with as many as dozens of trunks descending into the ground from its branches.

The Fulani and Djerma, who are Muslims but practice a form of spiritual animism, pound the root into a paste and use it to cover their young children's heads, believing that as a result it will help their children's hair grow long and strong.

"A lot of them are old and dying," Beck said of the trees, whose roots, limbs and bark are represented all around the room, "yet people still glean from them. Just as the people continue to survive, so the trees continue to give of themselves and endure."

For the Djerma and Fulani, everyday life is about survival. For that reason, most do not do art in a traditional sense. Instead, it shows up in the rhythms of everyday life, in the weaving of mats and in the intricate designs of pottery.

"Their work is about functioning," said Beck. "It serves a purpose. I really tried to think about that."

"I have always objected to art for its own sake," she said. "Art really can do something and say something of substance. It can raise consciousness about a people and a place others might not be familiar with."

"Torridity" is a series of drawings depicting the trees used by the Djerma and Fulani people of poverty-stricken southwestern Niger.

'Fantasy' sacrifices plot for effects

"Final Fantasy VII: Advent Children"
Directed by Tetsuya Nomura and Takeshi Nozue
Starring Takahiro Sakurai Maaya Sakamoto
Square/Enix

Well, it's here. "Final Fantasy VII: Advent Children" has finally arrived (in Japan, at least) and I got a hold of it just for you guys, my dedicated readers, all four of you. This marvel of computer generated imagery has been in the making for years and fans have been salivating over the teasers and images for an equal amount of time.

Back in good old 1997 we marveled at the adventure that was "Final Fantasy VII." Not only was it the first of the "Final Fantasy" games to come out for the original Playstation, it was also the first video game to have a production budget of over a million dollars. That money was well worth the final product. The game was an instant classic. Anyone who played the game back then has a special place in their hearts for that title. We all marveled at the hugely epic scope of the world the player inhabited. The story was compelling to the very end, and we all remember being blown away and shedding a slight tear at the end of the first disc. Those who don't know what I'm talking about should run out and get the game at their nearest game store.

Today is eight years later and the characters we know and love are back to save the planet once again. This time, they aren't battling the big corporations or even giant comets. In this adventure the threat is a little smaller. After the events of "Final Fantasy VII," the world is ravaged by a plague that has infected most of the population; there is no one able to cure it, but a group of crazies seems to think that they can. For some reason, this involves getting a hold of the remains of Jenova (the main monster from the original game). These guys that want to get their hands on Jenova believe themselves to be the sons of Jenova and recruit orphans to form an army to battle what is left of the Shinra Company whom they believe found the remains of Jenova and are keeping her from them. It is up to Cloud, Tifa, Barret and everyone else to stop the punks from getting their crazy hands on Jenova.

The plot, as you can tell from my brief description, isn't exactly great. In fact, it is quite disappointing, considering the greatness of "Final Fantasy" plots. If you can get past the awful story, the movie is great. The visuals are unlike anything I have seen before and the concept of having our heroes team up with Shinra to take down a common enemy is pretty cool. The second half of the movie seems a bit rushed and confusing but, again, you get to see world of "Final Fantasy VII" in a new light. This is one movie no "Final Fantasy" fan should pass up. For those of you not familiar with the saga, at least you will get treated to some revolutionary eye candy.

The latest "Final Fantasy" movie, "Advent Children," has enough eye candy to please any fan.

Sidi Goma dance at Bowker

"Sidi Goma: Black Sufis from Gujarat"
Wed. Oct. 5
Bowker Auditorium
UMass
$10 for students

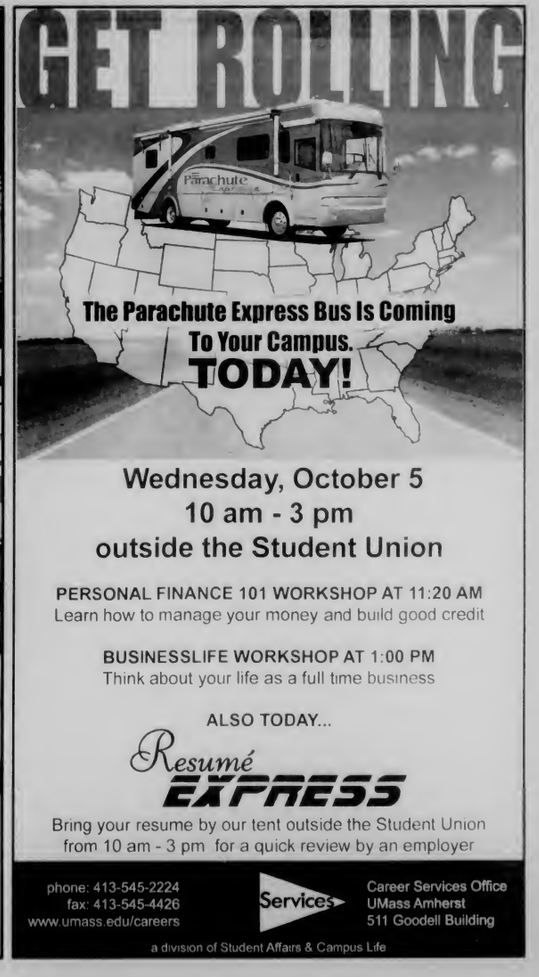
The Asian Arts and Culture Program at the University of Massachusetts is hosting an exceptional and unique series of events involving the Sidi Goma community, culminating in a music and dance performance entitled "Sidi Goma: Black Sufis from Gujarat" on Wednesday in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m.

A newcomer to the show can expect to experience the thrilling ritual of the Sidis, from the traditional Muezzin call to prayer to ecstatic African dance movements, the breaking of coconuts, drumming and peacock feather costumes. This is a rare opportunity to learn about and from the Sidis, and it is a special event for Indian and African communities and others.

The Sidi Goma are a tribal Sufi community of East African origin who came to India eight centuries ago and made the state of Gujarat in western India their home, forming a closed community. They carried with them their rich traditions of music and dance, as well as worship, and have kept these alive and flourishing through the generations, although virtually unknown to the rest of the world.

The Sidis are practitioners of Sufism, a peaceful, universal and mystic Islamic tradition that focuses on the pursuit of spiritual truth. This tradition comes through in their performances, and using chants in a mixture of languages including Swahili, Hindi and Gujarati, and instruments such as shakers, conches and drums, Sidi Goma sing and dance for their saint Sidi Mubarak Nobia.

A film by Beheroze Shroff, "We're Indian and African: Voices of the Sidis," was featured at the UMass Campus Center on Monday. This documentary film gives voices to the conflicts and dilemmas of the Afro-Indian Sidi community in a small village in Gujarat, India. As spiritual healers at the shrine in Gujarat, the Sidis there sell flowers and coconuts to devotees and pilgrims and perform their sacred Goma-Dhammal dance.



The filmmaker Beheroze Shroff, presently teaches in the Asian American Studies Department at University of California Irvine. Her most recent work on the Sidis is an ongoing project, a series that explores the multiple sides of life for the Sidis in India.

On Wednesday, a talk by Professor Amy Catlin Jairazbhoy of the University of California, Los Angeles on "Black Sufis of India and Africa" took place in Bezanson Hall. Professor Catlin has served as a curator for Sidi Goma and presented the group's first concert in September 2002 in England and Wales under the Ford Foundation.

Sidi Goma perform Afro-Indian religious dance and music using a variety of languages and instruments.

Taking the next step

Lovers Only

Hannah Drake

Relationships have many stages. The honeymoon phase is the greatest, and the most anxiety provoking. At this point, it's all about figuring out the other person, learning what your new love interest likes and doesn't like, how they liked to be touched, what makes them mad and how they communicate.

Every step towards your feelings being returned by your interests sets off a small feeling of euphoria. If both people feel this way and are both open to the idea of a relationship, then the two of you become a couple and start introducing each other as your girlfriend or boyfriend.

Sometimes the transition from seeing each other to being the couple is by the book. Someone asks someone says yes, and there you have it. Other times, it's not so simple. People who take it slow tend to be bound to run into the dilemma — after spending so much time together, it sounds silly to officially ask someone to be your girlfriend or boyfriend.

And it's girls, there's always the fear of bringing it up and scaring the guy away. Here's when you have to remind yourself that it's your life — don't let fear control you. If you want to know where a relationship stands and you've spent a couple weeks together, you have every right to know where guys. But don't grill the poor guy with a thousand questions — guys hate being interrogated; they feel like they're being attacked. To the guy's mind, if the relationship needs talking about, there's something wrong with it. But if you can't talk to the guy you're with, then you don't have much of a relationship, anyway. As much as guys hate talking about your relationship, if they care about you enough, they will.

Some people are too shy to ask, so they just start naming their relationship without ever officially having talked about it. Sometimes you find out that your guy has been introducing you as his girlfriend without you knowing it. Or, you're at a party, and someone asks, "Is this your boyfriend?" You say no, and he looks at you and later says, "I thought I was." On the flip side, if he laughs and says no, (as has happened to me,) it's a good idea to run far, far away, and never look back. On a side note, this is a good way to figure out how much your guy is leaning towards relationship land. Have one of your friends — that he hasn't met — ask your man if he is your boyfriend, in front of him. Then pay attention to his reaction. It's a subtle way of feeling him out, but if your man has read this article, then it probably won't work — at least not right away. Keep it in mind for a later date.

It's very important in the beginning of a relationship to know your terms — make that "some terms and conditions apply," phrase your motto. If your man (or girl) breaks your basic rules, it doesn't matter how hot he (or she) is, tell him (or her) to hit the highway. Otherwise, you'll look back and realize you set up your relationship by compromising how you really want to be treated — and that's not a good way to ensure you'll be happy three months down the road.

Girls, set a time limit on how long you're willing to be undefined with a guy. You don't want to be in the "I don't know what we are" phase for too long; it will start to damage your self-esteem. My limit is two months. I can move fast or slow, but if a guy hasn't figured out after eight weekends whether or not he wants to be with me, he doesn't deserve to be with me, and he's probably got some serious commitment issues that I don't want to deal with. If you don't set standards, you'll end up settling with someone who's much less than your ideal.

True, the higher you set your standards, the longer it's going to take to find someone you want to commit to, but in the end it's worth it. Generally, I think moving slower is better than moving quickly. You have a much better idea of what you're getting yourself into. But sometimes you click really well, the timing is right and you both decide to throw caution to the wind and just go for it and it works.

The bottom line? All relationships are different.

Dinner and 'Sexx' with Beck in Boston

By Kathleen McCann
Collegian Correspondent

Beck Hansen is a generous man. "I'd invite you all up here for a dinner party, but I don't think you'd fit," he said halfway through his set last Thursday night to a sold out crowd at Boston's Bank of America Pavilion.

The crowd laughed and cheered at his remark, but as he played an acoustic version of the obscure "Mutations" single "Tropicalia," his five-piece band took a break, gathering around a long table onstage and indulging in a mid-show snack. Apparently he wasn't kidding about the dinner party.

To the observer, this may have seemed like just another one of Beck's stage antics, like his dorky dancing while donning a hard hat or his DJ scratching DVDs to create swirling patterns on the big screen behind him. But partway through the song, the sounds of forks hitting glasses and plates emerged. What sounded at first like six-year-olds playing with their silverware turned into a full percussion section by the time Beck began "The Golden Age."

As Beck sang and played the harmonium, the band substituted the track's chimes and drums with their claps, silverware taps and rubbing glass rims. Every action could be seen in the back row of the Pavilion, as a bird's eye view of the band sitting at the table was shown on the big screen. The unusual accompaniment elevated the melancholy "Sea Change" song to one of the best of the night.

The band then rose from the table, picked their instruments back up and revamped the dinner party into a dance party, closing the show with "Sexx Laws" and "Mixed Bizness" from the electronic/hip-hop album "Midnite Vultures." After a quick break, the band came back and played the guitar driven "E-Pro" from this year's "Guero" album, forcing the crowd to step up their dancing and sing along with the infectious "na na nas" of the chorus.

Beck then invited people from the pit to join him onstage to dance. About twenty college age fans bolted onstage for the last song, "Get Real Paid." Beck pulled one lucky man wearing a Red Sox cap aside, inviting him to sing the challenging song with him into the microphone.

The show attracted all types, from hipsters to 30-year-olds who probably listened to "Mellow Gold" when they were in college. Even the least schooled Beck fan would find something to enjoy during the performance. One member of Beck's ensemble was onstage mainly just to breakdance and to hit the occasional garbage can lid. Perhaps the most comical event of the night was Beck's acoustic version of "Debra," during which he parodied the R. Kelly song "Trapped in the Closet."

Overall, the hour-and-a-half set was a faithful blend of songs covering Beck's eleven year mainstream career. It opened with "Black Tambourine" and "Girl," both from "Guero." Also from that album, he played "Que Ondo Guero," "Rental Car," "Hell Yes" and "Broken Drum."

Beck took the crowd back to 1994 with him with his first hit, "Loser," which prompted the crowd to shout along to the classic chorus, "Soy un perdedor. I'm a loser baby, so why don't you kill me?"

Aside from "Loser," the songs that got the most crowd reaction were those from "Odelay," such as "Devil's Haircut" and "Where it's At." Beck also played a stunning version of "Jackass," prefacing it by saying it was a request from earlier in the night.

The most surprising tune was the acoustic "He's a Mighty Good Leader," from "One Foot in the Grave," an album Beck recorded before "Loser" hit the charts.

Favre is not done in '05

By Michael Hunt
Knight Ridder

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Thirteen months later, the feeling entering this game could not have been more different had the Green Bay Packers been the collective victim of mass identity theft, a convenient if forgiving explanation for what had become of this team.

It was on opening night of 2004, a typical Monday evening spectacle much like this one under a pleasant Carolina moon, that anything seemed possible for the Packers, Super Bowl included. They annihilated the Panthers, embarrassed them at home, really, and their promise seemed limitless. At least, of course, until the Packers lost their next four.

Still, there would be the temporary redemption that came with another divisional title and the playoffs, a possibility for the '05 Packers that seemed as unfathomable as North Carolina's political hue suddenly turning from red to blue.

So how would these Packers react when given a chance for deliverance at the site of one of their most memorable achievements in more than a year?

A lot like the Packers of the previous three games of this ineffectual season for most of the game, except this time they tried, they really tried, in the face of utter hopelessness, because Brett Favre, contrary to popular opinion, is not done.

To early poor tackling, horrendous penalties and the inability to make plays that ultimately led to the mock 32-29 act of retribution by the Panthers, add the element that a team beset by the fragility of the Packers could not abide: catastrophic injury. And still the Packers could've won.

Even before the onset of the second quarter, the Green Bay offensive line had more holes than a Watergate burglar's story. First Mike Flanagan, then Chad Clifton and suddenly the line that had already been decimated by free agency and management inaction had the makeshift look of a castaway's home, only more vulnerable to the elements.

And when rookie Terrence Murphy was carted from the field after being struck in the head with a violent blow delivered by Thomas Davis, an incident that produced a long and tortured on-field silence and seemed to drain whatever resolve was left in the Packers, you had to ask yourself: What could possibly happen next? Another Na'il Diggs injury was what, and then the departure of Ahman Green, leaving even the most optimistic Packers fan at that point to question whether there was anything remotely salvageable about this team.

But even if an entire state had decided to retire at a reasonable hour because this one seemed finished by halftime, Favre rewarded those who stayed with it because he is, well, Brett Favre.

Effort? Oh, the Packers tried, and give them that, even if the endeavor to persevere isn't really a factor in the NFL. You either win or you don't in this league, regardless of circumstances, no matter if Ted Thompson's speed dial is being challenged today in an effort to locate able bodies.

You couldn't blame Favre this time for reviving his game, leading the Packers as he did on honest-to-goodness time-consuming drives (remember those?), tucking and running as he did (remember that?) because there was no one left to carry out the essentials. He made the early-to-retire Panthers pay for a turnover, threw four touchdowns and nearly rallied a team that seemed incapable of revival. But in the end, even Favre could not compensate for the earlier accumulation of boneheaded penalties that continue to define an undisciplined team.

And now the Packers are winless and running out of players. But if there is a glimmer at the end of this tunnel, it isn't necessarily the headlight of the unrelenting freight train that represents what is left of this season, not if Favre has anything to do with it.

Quarterback Brett Favre of the Green Bay Packers, has not been able to get his team going this season. The Packers now hold a record of 0-4.

Vinny gets one more shot

By Greg Cote
Knight Rider

The latest phoenix rise of Vinny Testaverde gives new legs — however fragile — to a notion that makes some actual sense yet has always been regarded as a lunatic thought. Not that it has ever even reached the point of honest consideration at all.

The Hall of Fame.

Take a moment to stop braying laughter and snorting incredulously.

Granted, anyone beyond the hardest core of Vinny's fiercest fans, or his direct relatives, might be invited to submit to a Breathalyzer at the mere mention of the possibility. If you are proposing Testaverde for the pro football shrine in Canton, Ohio, the one that just admitted Dan Marino, you might as well be the guy talking up astrology or tarot cards at a convention of scientists.

Testaverde, this minute, has zero shot at Canton. Throw around all the career passing stats you like; it wouldn't matter.

However, his latest resurrection — signed this week by the injury-wracked New York Jets a month shy of his 42nd birthday — potentially gives Testaverde one last shot with Hall voters. That feels good, too, and right. He has had a long, prolific and in many ways remarkable career since coming out of the University of Miami as the No. 1 overall draft pick.

Did he live up to being the top pick?

You'd have to say yes. A pretty fair starting point for Hall entry.

Bumping up to Hall standards won't happen, of course, if Testaverde never gets to ditch the sideline clipboard and get out from under the Jets ballcap in his hired role as the sage veteran, the insurance policy you hope you never need.

It could happen, though, if raw novice Brooks Bollinger isn't up to the onus, and if Testaverde is called on to do the cavalry thing and comes through in a way that becomes a league-wide story.

Imagine. Vinny comes off his couch in Long Island for one last hurrah with the team he grew up following.

Testaverde's agent, Mike Azzarelli of Tampa, Fla., had told us two weeks ago that his guy was waiting for precisely this type of opportunity.

He said "more than one" team had Vinny on a short list of emergency calls.

"We didn't want go through training camp and offseason stuff, throwing and throwing and throwing," Azzarelli said. "We wanted to wait and see how the season plays out. Select where you want to go. If it's meant to be, he can pick up anybody's offense real quick and play the next week."

Testaverde did it in 1998 in leading the Jets within one game of the Super Bowl.

And we thought he was old then.

The Jets' quarterbacks coach, Jeremy Bates, is 29. You know when Testaverde first met him? In 1993, with the Browns. When Bates was a ballboy.

Consider him.

That's all.

Just consider him, at least.

Testaverde has thrown for 44,475 career yards and 268 touchdowns. These are not Dave Krieg numbers. These are not totals you reach by just managing to hang around. These are numbers that have gotten anybody who's ever had them into the Hall of Fame.

Testaverde would be judged a first-ballot lock if pure numbers were nearly as important to football as they are to baseball.

He is sixth all-time in passing yards, trailing only Marino, John Elway, Brett Favre, Warren Moon and Fran Tarkenton.

He is eighth in TDs, behind those five plus two other guys named, let's see . . . oh yeah, Johnny Unitas and Joe Montana.

What was that about being judged by the company you keep?

Most quarterbacks currently wearing the mustard I fall jacket have numbers dwarfed by Testaverde's. Jim Kelly, Bob Griese, Steve Young, on and on.

The knocks against his Hall candidacy are real.

Only two Pro Bowls. No Super Bowls. A career spent with five clubs and mostly losing seasons. And never considered the best QB in the league.

The thing is, plenty of other Hall of Fame passers have overcome several of those factors. Did you know that Jay Fiedler's Dolphins QB rating (76.8) was almost identical to Bob Griese's 77.1? Did you know that Hall of Fame icon Joe Namath had a bunch more career interceptions (220) than TDs (173)?

There are echelons of Hall induction. The Marinos and Montanas and Favres are above and beyond debate. But some guys just barely get in despite knocks and baggage.

Maybe Testaverde should be one of those.

Maybe, if this latest reincarnation turns into anything special, he'll at least be considered.

Gretzky to begin his new career

By Bob Baum
Associated Press

GLENDALE, Ariz. — Wayne Gretzky was lured to coaching by the most basic reason: a love of the game.

Hockey's greatest player knows his Phoenix Coyotes are not blessed with his amazing skills. But, on the eve of his regular-season debut as an NHL coach, he insists he has the patience and drive to build a winner in the desert.

"When you're playing, there's nothing like it," Gretzky said Tuesday in an interview with The Associated Press. "You know you can go out there and affect the outcome of the game each and every night. Now the effect I can have on the game is very different, but the passion I have to help this team win is still the same I had as a player."

All 30 NHL teams will play Wednesday night, marking a return of a sport that lay dormant during a year of labor strife. The Coyotes play at Vancouver, a fitting location for Gretzky's debut, because in Canada his fame is virtually without limits.

Phoenix captain Shane Doan grew up in Alberta during Gretzky's great years with Edmonton.

"In America, nobody has any idea what Wayne is," Doan said. "If you took Michael Jordan, Shaquille O'Neal, Derek Jeter, Brett Favre and kind of put them all into one, that type of following would almost be the same as what Wayne has in Canada."

Brett Hull, who at 41 is the NHL's No. 3 career scorer behind Gretzky and Gordie Howe, signed with Phoenix because he knew Gretzky was going to be the coach.

"There's no one more competitive," Hull said. "He's the ultimate champion and competitor. He's going to have to really fight that when things don't go as great as he wants them to. I think it's going to help us players to have that. He's not going to settle for people going through the motions or not executing."

Coyotes general manager Mike Barnett is Gretzky's former agent and has known him for 25 years. When Gretzky was still playing, Barnett said, the two were in Indianapolis for a charity appearance and attended a Pacers game where Larry Bird was coaching.

On the plane ride out of town, Gretzky spoke of how he admired Bird's style.

"He said, 'You know I really like the way Larry Bird's team plays and I like the way he's coaching that team. It's playing the game the way he played it,'" Barnett recalled. "He said, 'That might be something when I retire I would consider doing.'"

Gretzky became a part-owner of the Coyotes, and Barnett reminded him of that conversation when talk turned to finding a new coach following the 2003-04 season. The NHL lockout ensued and months went by before Gretzky told Barnett he would take the job.

"From that day on, I haven't seen him as recharged and excited since he retired," Barnett said. Gretzky said he simply missed the game.

"I think that everybody has to have a purpose in life," he said. "My enjoyment of so-called working was to be around hockey. The closest thing to being a player is to be able to coach. It has been as enjoyable as I thought it would be. It's an experience that I've relished.

"We've got a lot of work to do and there's a lot of tough days ahead, but everybody's on the same page."

He knows that he can't expect players to perform at the level he set for himself.

"I think every individual athlete is unique, whether it be Larry Bird, John McEnroe or Wayne Gretzky," he said. "There's something unique about each part of their athleticism. I understood the basics of the team concept, how much you have to respect your opposition and how much you have to respect and rely on your teammates. That's what I'm trying to teach my players."

He wants an up-tempo, aggressive style on offense with discipline on defense.

"No matter how exciting your team is, no matter how much fun it is to watch or how many goals you score, if you can't keep the puck out of your goal and your team is not disciplined defensively, then you're not successful," Gretzky said.

"I came from one of the most powerful offensive hockey teams maybe ever, and yet when it came playoff time, we knew we were going to have to win a 2-1 game and we were responsible for it," Gretzky said he played for all kinds of coaches, ones who shouted and others who were "more mellow and quieter."

Retired NHL star Wayne Gretzky will return to the ice as a coach for the Phoenix Coyotes.

In eight of its last nine seasons, UMass has made it to the A-10 Championship. One of those seasons was last year, when the Minutewomen went 4-2 in conference play, after beginning the season with a 2-10 record. They then made it to the A-10 Championship, where they lost to Richmond on their home turf.

With the 2005 Minutewomen having improved from last year, they should fare well against the rest of the A-10, as conference play gets closer by the day.

Their 3-8 record should not play a factor in the games, but with five of their seven A-10 games on the road, you would think there would be some concern.

Coach Shea doesn't believe it will be a problem.

"We set this up purposely," Shea said. "We knew we would be at a disadvantage now, but we knew in the long run we would be at an advantage come conference time, which is what our emphasis is because that is your ticket into the conference tournament and the NCAA tournament."

Shea believes fatigue plays a part on every team, but she knows her team is healthy and has plenty of depth, and that will help them in conference play.

If you just look at their 3-8 record, things don't look too promising for Maroon and White.

But if you look at their past success in conference play, you'll find a much-improved Minutewoman team that is on track to return to the A-10 Championship in 2005.

Texas awaits Sooners

responses to OU-related questions after Saturday's 51-20 rout of Missouri. Players insist this team no longer is plagued by the ghost of OU failures past.

"We don't want to dwell on the fact that we're on a losing streak (against OU)," said defensive tackle Rod Wright. "It's a totally different game, a totally different team. And the attitude is definitely different."

Tailback Selvin Young, a junior, considers this the best and most confident Texas team he's seen headed to Dallas.

"Going into Oklahoma, going into ... each and every game, we're going to be confident," Young said. "We feel like if we just keep doing the things that we're doing, then, at the end of the game, the score is going to take care of itself."

OU? In Texas' heads? No way, says offensive tackle Jonathan Scott.

"It doesn't have anything to do with the mental aspect. Intimidation never is a factor," Scott said. "It has to do with focusing on your techniques."

By cleaning those up, Texas plans to reverse the curse. Color the Sooners skeptical. By Saturday, we'll all know for sure.

Texas quarterback Vince Young has guided the Longhorns to a 4-0 record this season. Young has completed 54-of-82 passes for 780 yards and seven touchdowns.

Leyland returns to Detroit

Philadelphia's managerial job by Charlie Manuel last winter. He has said he wanted to manage again close to his Pittsburgh home, which is about a five-hour drive from Detroit.

Leyland was a two-time NL Manager of the Year with Pittsburgh, where he won three division titles on teams that featured Barry Bonds.

Leyland signed his first pro contract and began a winding road in the Tigers' system as a catcher with no pop in his bat. He didn't bat higher than .243 and never hit more than one home run in a season.

At 27, when it was clear he was not going to make it as a player, Leyland began his managing career at Bristol of the Appalachian League in 1971. He also managed other minor league clubs for the Tigers, taking teams into the postseason six times.

After coaching third base with the Chicago White Sox, Leyland finally got a chance to manage in the majors in 1986, but he ran into some of the economic realties of the game.

Leyland asked out of his contract in Pittsburgh so he could go to a contender and he landed in Florida. The Marlins came through on their pledge to spend money — for one season — and Leyland helped them win a championship. Then, their owner decided the title cost too much and ordered the payroll cut.

Cardinals dominate in Game 1 of NLDS

six NLDS openers. That includes a victory in 1996 when the Cardinals swept the Padres.

The 37-year-old Sanders was on pace for the first 30-homer, 30-steal season of his career before missing 54 games after breaking his right leg in an outfield collision with Edmonds in mid-July. Sanders rediscovered his stroke in the final week of the regular season, driving in 10 runs in the last six games and homering three times in the final four.

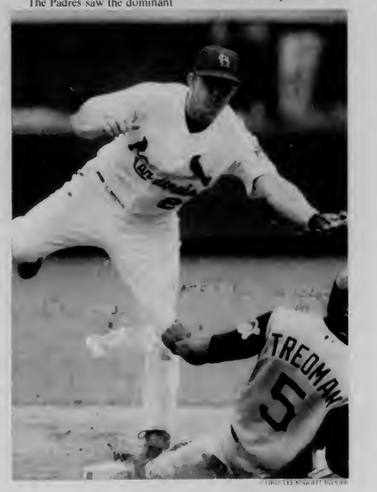
Against Peavy, Sanders had both of the key hits. His two-run single off the glove of diving first baseman Mark Sweeney put the Cardinals ahead 4-0 in the third, and his grand slam into the left-field seats on a 3-0 fastball chased Peavy in the fifth.

Carpenter was 21-5 with a 2.83 ERA, the ace the Cardinals lacked in the playoffs last fall when they were swept in the World Series by the Red Sox. But he struggled in the final month, with a 9.14 ERA in his final four outings, and said he lost motivation after the Cardinals clinched the Central with two weeks to spare.

"It feels nice to get zeros and get a win," Carpenter said. "You go out there to execute pitches and give your team a chance to win and I was able to do it all day."

The Padres saw the dominant Carpenter again. He allowed only three singles while benefiting from three double plays from the team that led the majors.

"Our key is to make him throw pitches and get him out of there," San Diego's Ryan Klesko said. "He pitched himself out of a couple of jams."



Carpenter's biggest battle was with the weather. It was an unseasonably warm 84 degrees at gametime and 86 when he experienced cramping in his right hand while warming up before the seventh. The Cardinals said dehydration caused the problem and took him out as a precaution.

Carpenter said his lingers started cramping when he put on his batting glove before striking out in the sixth. He also said his hamstrings and calves were cramping.

"It only happened twice," Carpenter said. "But they weren't going to take a chance."

Peavy appeared to be the Padres' best shot at postseason success after going 13-7 with a 2.88 ERA — only five points behind Carpenter — and leading the NL with 216 strikeouts. But he couldn't make it through the fifth, his second-shortest outing of the season, and gave up eight runs on eight hits.

The Padres had been planning to pitch Peavy in Game 4 on Sunday in San Diego on regular rest if the series goes that far.

Guillen apologizes for choke act

By Andrew Seligman
Associated Press

CHICAGO — White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen said he didn't mean to offend the Indians or their fans with his choking gesture during Sunday's regular-season finale in Cleveland.

Guillen was "playing around with fans" when he wrapped his hands around his neck during a pitching change in the sixth inning.

"We joked almost all the game," he said. "And all of a sudden the mascot does the sign, and all of a sudden I put my hands like that. And all of a sudden everybody in the nation thought I was telling the fans to choke. I respect this game and respect the Cleveland Indians."

After building a 15-game lead in the AL Central, the White Sox held off a charge by Cleveland over the final two months and won the division by six. They swept three games against the Indians last weekend, including a 3-1 victory on Sunday.

"It was one lady and six guys sitting next to me, and we were just playing around all game," Guillen said. "And (if) they take it the wrong way, that's fine. I know the last couple of days I slept pretty good about it because I don't have anything in my conscience to make me feel guilty about it."

Guillen praised the Indians and their fans, saying, "I never saw anybody lose a game and get a standing ovation. ... They made the Cleveland fans really excited. They made baseball great to watch."

UM a better team in '05

By Danny Picard
Collegian Correspondent

Racheal Mervine and the UMass field hockey team have improved their numbers since 2004, despite having a record below the .500 mark.

If you were to take a look at their record, you would think the Massachusetts field hockey team's season was a lost one.

But if you were an avid fan of the Minutewomen (3-8), you would know that is definitely not the case. Sure, they are on a four game losing streak and are currently sporting a dismal 3-8 record, but don't count the Maroon and White out just yet.

The Minutewomen will begin Atlantic 10 conference play on Friday afternoon when they face-off against the No. 19 Richmond Spiders (5-5) in Virginia. And if the past plays any role in the 2005 campaign, UMass has a lot to look forward to.

Through their first eleven games, the Minutewomen have improved dramatically from last season, even though their record does not show it. Offensively, they are putting up much better numbers at this point of the season when compared to 2004.

UMass has more than doubled its number of goals through 11 games with 15; nine more than last year at this point.

Also, the Minutewomen were shut out seven times in their first 12 games last season, while they have been held scoreless only twice in 2005.

While the Minutewomen's offense is stronger this year, UMass coach Patty Shea believes it is their improvements on defense that have paid the biggest dividends.

"Defense is one of our strongest parts," Shea said. "We have made dramatic improvements from last year to this year. We weren't even close to being listed in the A-10 stat sheets last year, and now we're consistently within the top three. We have cut more than in half the number of defensive penalty corners that we are giving up, and we are gaining scoring opportunities."

The much-improved UMass defense has held its last eight opponents to two goals or less, and has only let up 23 goals through 11 games. Compare that to the 36 times they were scored on at this point last season, and you have a Minutewoman team that is much better than last year.

So now what?

The bad news for UMass is that with all of this improvement, they still have a 3-8 record, only one more win than last year through 11 games.

The good news is that A-10 conference play begins at the end of the week, and the Minutewomen look to continue their past success in conference play, and ride it into the postseason.

New England football is unlike any other

Eric Athas

Football in some parts of America carries somewhat of a mystic with it. In states like Texas and Virginia, football is more of a cult than a game. In the same sense, California and New Jersey produce some of the best prospects in the nation. The list goes on — Nebraska, Mississippi, Alabama and Tennessee all hold a certain type of aura that can only be described by those who have been lucky enough to experience it.

And then there's New England.

Breathe in the air in New England on a crisp fall evening, and you have just taken a breath of football.

Football — high school or college — may not be a life or death situation to everyone up here in the northeast, but it is a representation of some aspects of life — the changing of seasons, the beginning of a new school year, the anticipation of another bully of a winter.

Since it is October, the heart of New England football is upon the six states that it is composed of, and it doesn't really matter where you are, there is a team, a town, or a player to simply hope for.

After all, hope and faith are truly the two factors of what fans have to ride on.

That is true as well for the Massachusetts football team, as fans are focused and anticipating whether or not the Minutemen have what it takes to do what they did in 1998. The fans hold hope of a "w" on Saturday afternoons. They have faith that this season will live up to the expectations that people are stamping on it.

Football here at UMass is a piece of the tradition enriched throughout all of New England. It is that hope which brings fans to games and sends them out of their seats on a big play and keeps them in their seats when the temperature reaches a dangerously low point.

Businesses do not shut down because of a football game in small towns around New England, and the head football coaches are not always God walking among mortals. Conversely, in New England, football is the environment. It is the auburn leaves that descend from their branches and drift across the cold ground. And again, the air changes when fall comes around, and that too is what football feels like in New England.

I cannot describe to you a Friday night football game in Odessa, Texas. Nor can I tell you what it is like to be a part of a state championship in Florida. I can, however, tell you what it is like when the illuminating lights over a football field gradually warm up on a cool evening in Massachusetts.

In America, football is merely a game to those who are logical and step back a little bit to see the big picture. But you don't have to be a dichard football fan to know what your region of the country signifies when it comes to the sport of football.

But New England football certainly has a life of its own.

And right now, as the fall atmosphere is in full gear, the heart of that life is beating.

Sox rocked in Game 1

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

CHICAGO — The streak is over, and Boston's defense of its World Series title got off to an awful start.

Matt Clement allowed three of Chicago's five homers, and the White Sox beat the defending champions 14-2 on Tuesday to win the opener of their best-of-five playoff series and end Boston's postseason winning streak.

The Red Sox trailed the New York Yankees 3-0 in last year's AL championship series before an unprecedented rally to win in seven games.

Boston then swept the St. Louis Cardinals in the World Series to bring its playoff winning streak to eight.

But the attempt to extend it faltered early. Clement hit two of the first three batters, gave up a couple of singles and then A.J. Pierzynski's three-run homer that made it 5-0.

The Red Sox had not trailed in the playoffs since the fifth game of the Yankees' series.

Paul Konerko hit a solo shot in the third, and then the White Sox inflicted some theatrical pain on Clement to add to the emotional distress.

Carl Everett hit a line drive off Clement's right thigh, sending the Red Sox starter to the ground.

Clement, who missed a start at the end of July when he was hit in the head by Carl Crawford's liner, was OK this time.

Juan Uribe hit a two-run homer in the fourth to chase Clement and make it 8-2. In all, he was charged with eight runs on seven hits and two hit batters in just 3 1-3 innings.

The only way it could have been worse for the Red Sox is if Clement had started in a playoff tiebreaker, as scheduled.

Because if he pitched then like he did on Tuesday, Boston might not have made it into the postseason at all.

The Red Sox had to fight for a playoff berth until the final day of the regular season, finishing tied with the Yankees in the AL East. If Cleveland had won its last two games, Clement was scheduled to pitch in a one-game tiebreaker.

In Game 1 of the ALDS, David Ortiz recorded two hits and no RBIs. The Red Sox were not able to get anything going, losing to the Chicago White Sox 14-2 last night.

Sanders shines in Cardinals win

By R.B. Fallstrom

ST. LOUIS — Reggie Sanders, Chris Carpenter and the St. Louis Cardinals looked every bit like the best team in baseball — even with a shaky ending.

San Diego played as poorly as its record suggests for most of the day. And now, with ace pitcher Jake Peavy out for the postseason with a broken rib, the Padres might be overmatched.

Sanders hit a grand slam and set an NL division series record with six RBIs, Carpenter pitched six scoreless innings before being pulled as a precaution and the Cardinals built a big lead and held off the Padres 8-5 Tuesday in Game 1.

"It's huge," Sanders said. "Let alone getting one RBI in a week, you get six in one day and especially under postseason pressure. It's a great day.

"But it's not over, we've got a long way to go."

Facing a team that won the West despite an 82-80 record, the Cardinals — who led the majors with 100 wins — opened an 8-0 cushion in the fifth inning against Peavy. He pitched with an injury that worsened in the third and was taken to a hospital after lasting only 4 1-3 innings.

An MRI showed one broken rib on his right side and the possibility of a second break. A Padres spokesman said the injury would take four to six weeks to heal.

"He felt something on his right side," manager Bruce Bochy said. "He said he felt it during the course of the game."

Peavy thinks he might have bruised his ribs during a celebratory scrum on the field after the Padres clinched the NL West on Wednesday. He said the injury was probably worsened when he caught a spike on the rubber on a wild pitch in the third that didn't even make it to the dirt.

"I thought I had bruised ribs, I never imagined it would be this," Peavy said. "It's weird. It's been a little bothersome but it was nothing we thought would get in my way.

"I knew it was pretty bad when I came out of the game."

Even without Peavy, the pesky Padres weren't done. They scored once in the seventh, added another run in the eighth and then got right back into it in the ninth. San Diego scored three times and loaded the bases with two outs before closer Jason Isringhausen struck out Ramon Hernandez.

"We're playing a tough team," Sanders said. "As you can see, they fought to the last out."

Mark Mulder will oppose San Diego's Pedro Astacio on Thursday in Game 2 of the best-of-five series.

Jim Edmonds helped St. Louis with a home run, double and single. Eric Young had a pinch-hit homer in the eighth for San Diego and an RBI groundout in the ninth.

Detroit hires Jim Leyland

By Larry Lage

DETROIT — Jim Leyland's baseball career has come full circle.

The Detroit Tigers hired Leyland on Tuesday as their manager to replace Alan Trammell, fired a day earlier after three seasons.

The 60-year-old Leyland started his baseball career as a catcher in the low minors for the Tigers. He guided the Florida Marlins to the 1997 World Series championship, but has not managed since 1999 with Colorado. "That passion that Jim Leyland has had throughout his career is back within him to manage," Tigers president and general manager Dave Dombrowski said. "The decision to name one of the top managers in the game of baseball in recent time, to bring him back to this organization, is a very big day for our franchise."

In an interview with The Associated Press earlier Tuesday, Trammell said he thought Leyland was a good choice to replace him.

"He has ties with the Tigers. He was there when I signed," Trammell said. "Whether I'm there or not, I'll always be a Tiger, and I'll always root for the Tigers, because I'm a part of their history, and I'm proud of that."

As a three-sport prep star in Perrysburg, Ohio, Leyland grew up in the middle of Detroit-Cleveland territory. His first 18 years in professional baseball were in the Tigers' farm system — six as a player, one as a coach and 11 as a manager.

"I was a Tigers fan growing up because I was a little closer, 90 miles west of Cleveland and 50 or 60 south of Detroit," Leyland said in 1997.

Longhorns try to avoid curse

By Jimmy Burch
Knight Ridder

FORT WORTH, Texas — This week, we learn whether an 11-game winning streak equates to an exorcism for the Texas Longhorns.

No. 2 Texas (4-0) returns Saturday to the Cotton Bowl, where the Longhorns will find unranked Oklahoma (2-2) waiting. The Sooners, understandably, consider their five-game winning streak in the series to be a noteworthy trump card they can play to offset a shortage of experienced playmakers.

Oklahoma coach Bob Stoops wasted little time Sunday in tapping in to the mental mojo factor, saying the Sooners' recent dominance of the Red River Rivalry "gives you confidence that we match up well against them and we understand what they like to do. Our players get a sense of that."

So do frustrated Texas fans. Otherwise, bracelets and hats emblazoned with the phrase "Operation Orange: Reverse the Curse" would not have been hot sellers for the past month in Austin. The souvenirs bear the logo created for Saturday's 100th renewal of the Red River Rivalry.

Buzz phrases are catchy. But the burden to reverse the curse falls on Texas coaches and players, who swear this team has reinvented itself over the past year and no longer is subject to mental meltdowns at the mere sight of the Sooner Schooner.

Without question, the swagger and body language is different with these Longhorns, who are 11-0 since leaving the Cotton Bowl after last year's 12-0 loss to Oklahoma. That has been true throughout 2005, from the Rose Bowl victory in January to the

Senators sworn in at SGA meeting

By Matt Belliveau

In the year's first meeting of the University of Massachusetts' Student Government Association, 39 newly elected senators were officially sworn into office in the Cape Cod Lounge last night.

The meeting also motioned to break a tie in the Commuter Senate between four candidates, electing Brian Whalley, David Synnott and Jaimie Corliss.

In his introduction to the Senate body, President Pavel Payano congratulated the newly elected senators for their dedication to helping students and asked that the legislature improve the methods by which policy is passed and the organization of the SGA in general.

"In this University we have two governing bodies besides our own, the Faculty Senate and the Graduate Student Senate. A lot of the policies brought to the administration by these two bodies are passed," said Payano. "We must ask ourselves, 'Why is this so?' The answer? Because both of these bodies are organized. They speak as one body.

"In essence, when other governing bodies put forth something, they have the support and weight of their constituents. And that is how the SGA should be. And that is the road that the student body has elected me to push for."

Payano also went on to criti-

Four weeks later, students still in hotels

When he moved into the Howard Johnson Inn at the start of the semester, Brandon Rawnsley expected he'd be living in a donn within the month.

"When I called, they said one or two weeks [in the hotel] at most, and then you'd be gone," said Rawnsley, a sophomore English and Philosophy major who transferred this year from the College of Wooster in Ohio.

However, Rawnsley is one of 59 University of Massachusetts students who will spend the remainder of the fall semester living in the Howard Johnson on Route 9 in Hadley.

An incoming freshmen class of about 4,400, up from 4,222 last year, coupled with more upperclassmen choosing to live on campus, has created a housing crunch and forced administrators to place some transfer students and students who missed the housing deadline into hotels.

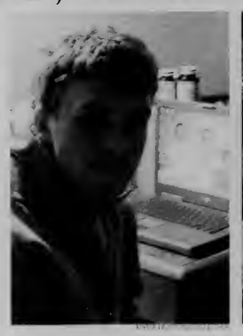
Ed Blaguszewski, the Director of News and Information at UMass, said the increased demand for on-campus housing shows that more students are interested in coming to the University.

"In some ways, that's a good problem to have," Blaguszewski said. "People want to come to UMass. On the other hand, we want to be as accurate with our projections as possible."

UMass is paying an extra $2,000 per student staying in a hotel this semester, as well as paying for the additional transportation costs. Housing students at the Howard Johnson costs about $3,700 total per student, per semester, while a double occupancy dorm room on campus costs only $1,702 per student.

However, UMass anticipates that the higher occupancy rates this spring should make up for the extra expenses. UMass typically has 500 empty beds in the spring. "We'll see how it shakes out, but we're expecting it'll be a wash, or maybe a little better," Blaguszewski said.

At the start of the year, 315 students were living in four different hotels: the Campus Center Hotel, the University Lodge, the Hadley Quality Inn, and the Howard Johnson. Students have been moved into on-campus housing as space becomes available, and last Thursday all students still living in hotels were consolidated into the Howard Johnson.



The "Hojos," as the students have dubbed themselves, are clustered together on the first and third floors. Four resident assistants live in the hotel, and last night the University held a dinner for students in the hotel lobby.

"We try to provide some sense of living with your peers, as close to a residence hall community as we can create out there," said Blaguszewski.

However, students say it's difficult to foster a dorm-like environment in a hotel.

"They try to do stuff, but it's definitely not as easy to meet people here as it is on campus," said Jessica Saporito, a junior in her third semester at UMass who did not submit her housing application by the deadline. "A lot of the kids here don't keep their doors open."

Sophomore Josh Boyden, a transfer student from Syracuse University of New York at Cobleskill, said that it's hard to replicate dorm life with only five dozen students. "If they had more people, it might be more of a good time, but you don't get the on-campus feeling," he said. "It's more of a private life here than it is in the dorms."

Grad tours devestation, starts relief efforts

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts graduate student has become the voice of the hurricane victims in the south. Rebecca Brittenkamp, who has family in Louisiana and Mississippi, is working to get supplies to rural areas of the two states which are being neglected by larger relief organizations.

"My cousin Meco Carlos has been working in the Houma, which is 60 miles from New Orleans, and New Orleans areas since Katrina hit, delivering supplies and food to the most needy people," Brittenkamp said.

Brittenkamp was at a conference with her husband in Washington, D.C. when she heard of the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina.

"It was a Monday morning when I found out. I was at the hotel gym," Brittenkamp said.

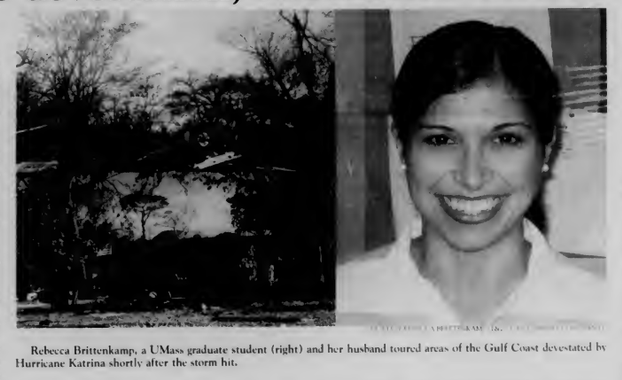
Concerned for family members, Brittenkamp and her husband caught the next plane to the area.

"We arrived at midnight in Texas. We rented a Suburban and bought a generator. The Louisiana/Mississippi border was the last place we could get gas, so we bought one gallon gas containers and filled those up. We had to roll down the windows so that we weren't affected by the fumes," Brittenkamp said.

After finding her relatives alive, Brittenkamp and her husband drove south for about two hours.

"We were nervous because the radio stations reported that the roads were closed. We just figured we'd go as far as we could," she said. "Luckily, we found out the roads weren't really closed; they were probably just trying to keep the roads clear.

"When we got to our next destination, people were swimming for their lives. The Mississippi water had receded because it's above sea level. Only foundations were left of most houses. Usually the first floor was gutted. It was weird because you could see closets with clothes still hanging in them from the outside. One house had been boarded up, but had collapsed onto the first level, so the front steps led up to the second floor.



"We had no power, no water, no phone. The temperature was in the mid to upper 90s with really high humidity. I forgot how hot it is without air conditioning. Most people couldn't sleep because they were too hot," she said.

While giving her family basic needs like food and water, Brittenkamp and her husband realized that there were plenty more people in need, and drove to Alabama to get more supplies.

They returned to Louisiana to find everything in disorder.

"Baton Rouge was a mess; the popu-

Noise problem expected Friday

Renovations at the University of Massachusetts Physical Plant will cause loud noise and minor traffic problems tomorrow, said the plant's Communications Manager, Jim Hunt.

In a routine procedure, the pipes that were recently installed around the Campus Center Garage need to be cleaned of debris. This will be done though what is called a "blow down." During a blow down, steam is blown though the pipes at an extremely high pressure (about 600 lbs/min) for about four to five minutes. The release of steam is accompanied by a very loud noise.

The noise, at the point of discharge, will exceed 100 decibels — about as loud as your average rock concert. However, the noise will decrease as you move father away. From thirty meters away, the noise will only reach 90 decibels, which is comparable with a washing machine.

The location of the power plant will add to the noise, explained Hunt. "Because of where it is, tucked in a little valley," the noise will resonate and could possibly be heard at low levels throughout campus and beyond.

The buildings that should be affected by the noise the most are the ones located closest to the blow down, which include Thompson Hall, Machmer Hall, the Campus Center Garage, Flint Lab, Chenoweth Lab, the Agricultural Engineering Building, the Physical Plant and the Textbook Annex.

The first blow down will occur at 8:00 a.m. tomorrow, but the time of the ones to follow is uncertain. Due to the high temperature of the steam, the pipes must be allowed to cool between

Amherst police cracking down on underage drinking

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Correspondent

The last few weekends have seen high levels of noise complaints, vandalism and other disturbances in the area around Hobart Lane, N. Pleasant Street and Pufffton Village. This has led the Amherst Police Department to reassert its commitment to combat these problems by focusing on the illegal distribution of liquor.

"We have always taken a hard stance on the illegal distribution of liquor," said Det. Ronald Young.

Young says the department has been involved in constant efforts to curb the practice of informal bars and persons of age purchasing alcohol for minors. In addition, community policing officers are regularly sent out to meet with landlords and apartment complex owners in areas prone to disturbances. He says the goal is to prevent the police from having to come back later during the weekend.

According to crime statistics released by the department, there were some 466 incidents of liquor law violations in the period from July 2003 until July 2005. 422 of these incidents occurred while college classes were in session.

A 2003 survey of students at the University conducted by the Student Assessment, Research and Evaluation Office found that 46.6 percent of those interviewed thought that alcohol use was a problem at UMass to "some extent" and 24.8 percent felt that the problem was to "a very great percent."

The survey also contained other statistics related to the negative impact of alcohol abuse. 25 percent of respondents reported experiencing pushing, hitting, or unwanted touching by an intoxicated student. 61.5 percent reported that residence hall furniture had been damaged by students who had been drinking, and 22.4 percent reported that students who had been drinking had damaged their personal property.

The department will host a special training course conducted by SRR Traffic Safety Consulting and Training titled "Alcohol Sting Operations: 2005 Updates and Guidelines" to help equip officers with information on how to conduct various sting operations and engage in procedures designed to prevent the collateral effects of alcohol abuse. The course takes place on October 14 and is open to all law enforcement officers.

SRR Training's Web site claims that liquor laws are some of the "least understood laws in the Commonwealth by law enforcement agencies" but the violations of these laws can create a large portion of an officer's work. "Underage drinking, lation had doubled. Lafayette had 50,000 extra people who stayed in hotels and motels, with relatives, and in churches, it was just chaos," said Brittenkamp.

After the second run, Brittenkamp and her husband were dangerously low on gas. They decided to head back before they were stranded in the area.

"On the way back, we were asked to do a favor for a friend — a rescue mission. They had left the house, but left their two rabbits behind. We didn't think the rabbits would have survived in the heat, but we figured we'd at least look," Brittenkamp said.

When they arrived at her friend's house, Brittenkamp and her husband found themselves facing a sign in the neighbor's yard that read, "You loot we shoot."

The two explained to the neighbors why they were there, and then broke into the house, as Katrina had washed the key away from the back step.

"There was mud everywhere inside, and it was unbelievably hot. The funny thing was the upstairs was perfectly fine. The two rabbits were fine, even though it was probably 110 to 120 degrees up there," Brittenkamp said.

After the rescue mission, the Suburban was almost out of gas. Brittenkamp's grandfather dropped her off with her husband at the Jacksonville Airport to catch a plane.

They were back in Massachusetts on Saturday night.

"I just thought, we have to find some way to help. Since I have local contacts, I knew I could get specific information on what they need," Brittenkamp said.

Since the First Baptist Church of Amherst was already planning to take donations, Brittenkamp decided to help.

"People wanted to help, but didn't know how, besides with monetary donations — and not everyone has money to give. I sent an e-mail out to everyone at my church, my group on campus, girl scout troops," said Brittenkamp.

The donations go to the poorer areas of Louisiana, because most organizations are focusing their relief efforts on New Orleans.

"A lot of [evacuees in rural areas] are foreigners who were displaced and didn't know where to go. Most of the time people think it's poor people who need the help, but [volunteers] were feeding doctors and lawyers who had lost family and had no where else to go."

Eventually, Brittenkamp discovered that a trucking company in Springfield was willing to take extra pallets of donations for free if a truck of theirs was going to the area.

"Two weeks ago we sent eight pallets worth of stuff for [two of the churches]," she said.

Another trucking company in Fitchburg, Compassion Alliance, took a full truckload to a church in Gulfport, Mississippi.

It's not only monetary support that the evacuees need. Their entire lives need reconstruction.

"Churches and organizations are joining the Foundation for Hope and adopting one or two families, setting them up with an apartment or house, helping the main provider find a job, putting their kids in school in the new area, and offering support besides material donations," Brittenkamp said.

"The cool thing is the cycle of poverty is breaking because of this. A lot of the people were really poor; some would have never have the opportunity to get out of the cycle they've been in for so long. Now they're being placed in better economic conditions because of this program.

"People like working with us because we come back with pictures of the area, faces that show the reality of the situation. To see people benefiting from generosity makes it a lot more real.

"This isn't something that's going to be taken care of in a few weeks or months — especially at the holidays, the need seems even greater. Keep [evacuees] in mind; parents won't have gifts to give their kids. It also puts things in perspective. No matter how bad your day is going, you know that people are going through wor-," she said.

Right now, Katrina victims are still in need of the basics. They also need cleaning supplies, flip flops, baby items, tote bags, backpacks, basic hygiene items, school supplies for their children, small luggage, and small furniture. Students can help by putting together a kit like a shower caddy with all the necessary items, or donating a backpack with school supplies for the children, and dropping it off at Brittenkamp's office, Conte A627.

Students with SUVs are welcome to help drive supplies out to Fitchburg. Community service organizations, sororities and fraternities are encouraged to contact Brittenkamp at rebecca@mail.pse.umass.edu for more information on how to help.

59 students still in hotels

Although the University has arranged for a bus to stop in the Howard Johnson parking lot, students say transportation is one of the biggest inconveniences of living off-campus.

The hotel offers a free continental breakfast, but students' meal plans force them to eat lunch and dinner on campus — or skip real meals entirely. "We don't really eat [living] here. It's so hard to get back and forth for a meal," Rawnsley said.

His roommate Eric Zavadil, a sophomore political science major who transferred from Wichita State University, agreed. "If it's not Ramen, it's probably peanut butter that we're having here," he said.

Zavadil says he sometimes gets sick of eating the same food provided by the hotel everyday. But eating breakfast on campus can be a huge hassle.

"All I did was wait for the bus, eat breakfast, wait for the bus again, and walk back from where they drop us off, and it was two and a half hours from door to door," he said.

Other students opt to spend the entire day on campus. "If you have a couple of hours in between classes, it defeats the purpose of coming home," said Saporito. "My roommate is there all day. She'll go to the library and hang out 'til 5:30."

Students have also complained about a lack of clear information from housing authorities.

"There's no communication," said Zavadil. "The things that we hear from the administration are all very orchestrated to not give out any information."

Saporito, Zavadil and Rawnsley are waiting for a desk and chairs that were supposed to arrive Monday. "They're supposed to give us a MicroFridge, but we haven't seen that either yet," Saporito said.

Despite the inconveniences, students are enjoying several aspects of hotel life, including the air conditioning, large rooms, twice-a-week room service, larger beds, and private bathrooms. Students can also use the fitness room at the hotel, and they had access to the pool until it closed this week.

"There was a TV already here, we didn't have to lug TVs in," said Saporito. "It's nice that it's [the room] so big."

And Zavadil said the hotel staff has gone out of their way to help students. "They know we're in a messed up place, and they're really accommodating," he said.

Blaguszewski said the University appreciates students' patience and flexibility. "We know it's an inconvenience, and it can be a hardship for students to live off campus, and we're trying to do right by the students as best we can during the course of this semester," he said.

The hotel's four resident assistants have been holding weekly social events with food, and resident assistant Jason Bissonnette, a senior mathematics and statistics major, even e-mailed the popular college social network "the facebook.com" to have Howard Johnson added as a UMass residence hall.

"We're trying to make it home on whatever level we can, even if it's something as small as clicking on what dorm you live in on facebook," said Bissonnette.

Bissonnette has also created a website, http://hojo.jaybiz.net, which will offer resources and a message board for hotel residents.

Although the situation may not be ideal, students are making the best of it.

"If they could put me in Central or Southwest tomorrow, I'd do it like that," said Zavadil, snapping his fingers. "But at this point I can't be disappointed that I was put here, because all the people I know on campus I met here or through people here."

"We're getting used to it. We kind of have to," Saporito said. "We make it dormey like, but at the same time I do wish I was on campus."

Discussion of war
Members of the UMass Anti-War Coalition met with Vietnam War veterans last night in Campus Center room 817 to discuss the current situation of the war in Iraq.

Professor receives $22 million grant

A University of Massachusetts microbiologist was awarded nearly $22 million in federal money for research that could lead to new methods for harvesting energy and cleaning polluted sites.

Derek R. Lovley will lead a team of researchers from UMass and other institutions to study the microorganism Geobacter. The bacteria, which live naturally in soils and waterways, exist without oxygen and use metals or minerals, such as iron, for energy.

The investigation could lead to the harvesting of electricity from waste matter, and remove contaminants from underground petroleum spills or remove uranium from contaminated groundwater, researchers say.

Lovley discovered Geobacter — from the microbial family Geobacteraceae — in 1987 at the bottom of the Potomac River in Washington, D.C., and has been studying it ever since.

The 5-year, $21.8 million grant comes from the U. S. Department of Energy. Lovley's team will collaborate with The Institute for Genomic Research in Rockville, Md., the University of Tennessee, Indiana University, the University of California-San Diego, Genomatica in San Diego, Calif. and the Argonne National Laboratory in Argonne, Ill.

each blow down, and then the pipes must be inspected to see how effective the blow down was. The Physical Plant is also unsure how many times steam will be released because it greatly depends on the success of each blow down and the cooling time between each one. It could take up to 12 hours to complete the cleaning with up to five or six blow downs.

Pedestrian traffic will be restricted in the area surrounding the blow down to avoid injury and property damage. Campus Center Way will also be closed during the times when steam is actually being let off, but not for the entire day.

Bush: US must 'stay on offense' in Iraq

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush promised Wednesday to "stay on the offense" in Iraq to prevent insurgents from disrupting next week's referendum on a new constitution.

His spokesman welcomed Iraq's decision to back away from last-minute election rule changes that the United Nations said were unfair.

"We fully understand they intend to disrupt the constitutional process, or will try to do so, as well as stop the progress of democracy," Bush said of the insurgents after a briefing at the White House from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other Pentagon officials.

"The Iraqis are showing more and more capability of taking the fight to the enemy," the president told reporters. "As they become more capable, we will be able to bring folks home."

Senate Democrats assailed the administration's strategy in Iraq and prodded the president to change it. "We will not accept staying the course," said Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

In a letter to Bush, Senate Democrats said that continuing along the same path in Iraq "could lead to a full blown civil war." They asked the president to answer specific questions about the U.S. strategy, including exactly how strong Iraqi forces must be before an American withdrawal can begin.

"He has to tell the American people what the plan is," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del.

Democrats also cried foul over the cancellation of a briefing on Iraq that they said National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte was supposed to give. Republicans and Negroponte's office say the briefing was to be provided by National Intelligence Council members, not Negroponte.

Sunni Arab leader Saleh al-Mutlaq spoke of changes in the Iraqi constitution to the media at a press conference yesterday.

Bush later visited wounded troops at the Army's Walter Reed hospital, which has received over 4,450 patients injured in Iraq since the war began in March 2003. He visited with 29 troops and presented eight Purple Hearts.

cize the former administration's claim that SGA's struggle to move along policy was attributed to the fact that they were not taken seriously by the administration or the student body.

"For all too long, they have seen the Senate and the SGA as a bunch of kids playing pretend. We need a change. And I wouldn't be here if I didn't think it could be done," said Payano.

Payano continued to state that Registered Student Organizations need, and deserve, more funding. He also said textbook prices are too high and tuition prices need to be lowered.

"We need more professors, we need more funding," said Payano. "I put my confidence in you, the Senate, because together we can achieve what the student body has elected us to do."

Speaker Sean Bliss demanded of senators that any motions given to the administration be done with the utmost effort.

"Motions that have no substance end up in a pile somewhere," said Bliss. "We all need to do the legwork necessary to help these motions go through."

"Working with the administration, truly representing the student body, working with the RSOs advocates our fellow students," said Bliss.

In response to the apparent police brutality incident in Holyoke Community College, James Fiorentino, a member of the International Socialist Association, made a plea to the Senate to draft an official resolution of support of UMass students and their ability to protest peacefully without fear of police brutality.

Fiorentino hinted towards a possible partnership with the UMass organization Take Back UMass, and said that many UMass professors have already voiced their support to their cause.

Studying abroad worthwhile

Gilad Skolnick

As amazing as UMass is, with its great selection of classes and its amazing library, I highly recommend you take advantage of opportunities to study in other locations, and not just through the five college student interchange. I spent my junior year studying abroad at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and it was wonderful.

Hills House is nudged somewhat in between Franklin Dining Commons and Central, and if you take the notoriously slow and creepy elevator to the fourth floor, you will find a very friendly staff ready to help you study anywhere in the world.

The best part about studying abroad is the cool T-shirt that UMass gives you when you come back: 100 percent cotton, beautiful color, soft comfortable feel. It's awe-inspiring, but there are other perks as well.

One of the best bonuses of studying abroad is the opportunity to possibly take a class with a celebrity. In my Arabic classroom I sat next to Natalie Portman, who apparently also has good taste and chose to study abroad at Hebrew U. Very down to earth and brilliant, it was really cool that the Harvard alumna also understood how much Jerusalem has to offer. Going by Natalie Hershlag, her real last name, it was fun to have her be the one to recognize me and stop to say hi in a cafe rather than the other way around.

Another nice bonus is being close to so many fascinating places. A few hours by bus and I was in the ancient city of Petra, a city carved entirely out of stone from the mountains, pictured at the climax scene of "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade" where Indiana enters to fetch the Holy Grail.

A short walk from my Hebrew University dorms was the old city of Jerusalem, an ancient city of alleys, obscure shops, museums and cultures. Turn down one mysterious alley and you end up in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, where most Christians believe Jesus was crucified. Walk down an alley for a few minutes, and you reach the place where Mohammad is believed to have rose up to heaven, and the remains of the foundation of the second temple, the holiest spot for Jews in the world. If all that isn't enough, with a few hours' drive you'll reach the holiest place in the world for the Bahai religion, surrounded by beautiful perfectly symmetric gardens.

Hebrew U. has an entire school, the Rothberg International School, devoted to study abroad students. Delicious food and ample clean bathrooms, a great staff, and a wide selection of classes taught in English were just some things that made the Hebrew U. program so great.

I took an archeology class that was often taught on site. Together we explored 3,000-year-old tunnels carved by the Jebusites, and attended lectures held in a 2,000-year-old Roman amphitheatre. My communication class taught us about Israeli radio, newspaper and TV by taking us to the production rooms, studios and offices of these places.

Another nice bonus was being close to so many fascinating places. A few hours by bus and I was in the ancient city of Petra, the city carved entirely out of stone from the mountains that Indiana enters to fetch the Holy Grail in the climax scene of "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade." There I was taught by the friendly locals that there was no point to a democracy because they would vote for the king anyway, who never makes a mistake. A bit longer by bus and I was in Cairo, exploring inside the great pyramids, walking by the occasional sphinx or wandering around on camel back.

Another advantage was the priceless opportunity to meet people my age from completely different backgrounds. In the dorm next to me was a Muslim Israeli named Kujan who was proud to state that he had just finished spending several years in the Israeli army as an elite paratrooper, and then several more years as a bodyguard for Israeli politicians. He proclaims that Israel is the only Middle Eastern country that allows total freedom of religion, and that's one of the reasons he stands with Israel.

My roommate was studying abroad from South Korea, my flatmate from France. Israelis from all over the country were drawn to Hebrew U. as well, along with the students from dozens of other countries.

Nearly every weekend Hebrew U. had an optional trip somewhere in the country, but many of us preferred to travel together on our own, swimming in the warm Mediterranean Sea, floating in the Dead Sea where it's so salty that I literally fell asleep while floating on my back, or spending a weekend in December hiking through the craters in the warm desert. On a moment's notice I would leave for a few days for a hippie festival in the desert where I lived on rice and sprouts, a several-day music festival on the beach, or a World Cup qualifying soccer match against some European country.

Priceless memories filled my head and the memory card of my digital camera every day, from haggling for lemons in the open market to encountering mating wild ibexes (a type of rare mountain goat). I watched former Prime Minister Netanyahu lecture about economic policy, navigated through thousands of protestors outside the Israeli parliament building, and walked in a medieval crusader city, protected for 800 years by sand, in the port city of Acre.

I urge you to stop by the study abroad office, or at least take an opportunity to travel to someplace with a different culture, whether it be Pyongyang, Madrid or Toronto. I've often found that a few days of travel can teach me more than an entire class can. Expand your mind — travel.

Let's be original, people

Jon Brandt

There has been a problem spreading throughout campuses everywhere within the last few years, and while this problem could easily be fixed by the students themselves, there seems to be no end in sight. The issue is not something as obvious as drinking or gambling, and it is not even something as trivial as skipping class to sleep in. It is a matter of lying, cheating and stealing. I am talking about plagiarism.

Honesty is an important part of most college students' academic integrity, and a great number of them would rather stay up late writing a paper that they can proudly present as their own rather than copy someone else's. However, in the past few years there has been a steady increase in plagiarism by students. I do not know if it is because the Internet has made it that much easier to copy someone else's ideas, but there is definitely correlating evidence which points to the Internet as a main reason. The most pathetic thing of all is the fact that we have been told since we were young that this is the worst and most treacherous thing you can do academically.

Last week I had an entire class dedicated to explaining what plagiarism is and how to use proper citation. If it were an English class it would have made sense, but this was History of China. Not only that, but I have had several classes spend at least a quarter of the class going over plagiarism and citation. Let's face facts here. We have all lied or cheated on something in the past, and while that is nothing to be proud of, it is a testament to the fact that we are all human.

However, I think there is something severely wrong in copying and pasting someone's entire article or essay and passing it off as your own. To me, that is the absolute definition of lazy and unoriginal. If you couldn't even think of one thing to write for your paper, then you either should not be in that class or you shouldn't be in college altogether. The point of being at school is to express your ideas and share them with others in an attempt to enlighten those around you to new and hopefully better ideas.

I think there is something severely wrong in copying and pasting someone's entire article or essay and passing it off as your own. To me, that is the absolute definition of lazy and unoriginal.

If we just keep regurgitating the same ideas over and over again, then in the end, no one will be creative or have thoughtful outlooks. There is nothing that even clarifies that the document you are copying is any good in the first place. The author might claim to have gotten an A on their paper, but do you know the professor who graded it? If you are at the stage where you are just buying or stealing essays, then you clearly are not qualified to judge whether or not they are good. The essay you copy could be a piece of junk that when read by your professor would give you a C.

The thing I find the most amusing by all of this is when a complete moron suddenly writes a paper that is good enough to be published and thinks he is going to get away with it. "Hey Ox, I know you couldn't spell napalm last week, but that was a great piece on the political and social aspects of the Vietnam War." This may seem cheesy or elementary to many of you, but if you are one of those students considering copying someone else's work so you can save time, I urge you to reconsider. As much as you may try to justify it — whether you claim that you just do not have enough time or that you can't think of anything good to write — you need to seriously consider why it is you are at college in the first place.

For me, I know that there have been plenty of times when I have had a paper due and it would have been much easier to Google something on my topic and instantly come up with 50 ways in which to get the job done. While this would be the easy way out, it is not the honest thing to do. While a good grade is the driving force for anything I do for a class, I would rather work hard and earn the grade. The only way this problem can be solved is for students to realize it is not the grade that matters, but what they put into the class and get out of it that matters, because nothing that comes easy is worthwhile.

A little restraint, please

Joshua Kistler

As the playoff atmosphere is once again upon us, there are just a few things I'd like for you to keep in mind. Since you're large in numbers, and emotions run high this time of year, things often tend to spiral out of control. That is why I plead with you, for the sake of everyone involved, to use a little restraint. Yes, I'm talking to you, the men and women of the UMass and Amherst Police Departments.

Now, don't get me wrong. I understand that a bunch of drunken 19-year-olds can be threatening — especially when all you have to defend yourselves are a gun, a knight-stick, some pepper spray, a fleet of horses and bike-mounted comrades and two tons of paramilitary riot gear. But think how much easier your lives could be if this year, you didn't initiate the aggressive behavior. Think how much better it could be for everyone involved if you just used a little restraint.

Not to get off topic, but there's this place called UConn (you may have heard of it) where a campus-wide spring party is held every year without incident. At this event, literally thousands of students gather and celebrate in an outdoor area, while the police stand on the outskirts in full force, waiting for someone to actually do something wrong before they take action. Now I know that's not as much fun as what you guys do, but maybe that way we won't have to listen to you whine about all the money spent on overtime (that $100/hour must really sting when it hits your bank accounts).

And lest you forget what happens when you get carried away, just think back to last year and what went down in Boston. Granted, the cops that killed that Snelgrove girl got off, but you might not be as lucky, especially if it happens for a second time in two years. Besides, if somebody were to get badly hurt (or even killed) by you, you may never get to use those fancy TASERs you've been training for. Now you wouldn't want that, would you?

Now before you get all angry and righteous on me, I will acknowledge that there are some students who act inappropriately, and yes, probably deserve a baton upside the head. But before you indict us all because of the actions of a few, how about trying that crazy UConn method and waiting until those students do something wrong? Again, I know that's hardly your style here in Amherst, but in fairness to the innocent students who pay a lot of money to go here and are merely celebrating their team's victory peacefully, could you maybe give it a try?

Now before you get all angry and rightous on me, I will acknowledge that there are some students who act inappropriatly, and yes, probably deserve a baton upside the head. But before you indict us all because of the actions of a few, how about trying that crazy UConn method and waiting until those students do something wrong?

Just remember that we're all in this together, and the more restraint you show, the easier this will be to get through for everyone, yourselves included. After all, you are the adults, and you are the authority figures here. How about a good example for the rest of us? Nobody's asking for cart blanche permission to do as we please. All I'm asking is that you, the police, use a little restraint.

Who knows? If everything goes smoothly (as I know it can), then you may just have time for the leftover petty issues, like, say, the stabbings and armed robberies that took place on campus this first month.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

LESS TALK, MORE ACTION

Should we be driving less? An Op/Ed on Oct. 3 urged readers to cut back on our driving given the current situation in New Orleans and the war in Iraq. But I think that it is just as valid to say that we should cut back on our oil consumption in general and move towards more viable long-term sources of energy. We should not simply think about oil when it is at $3.50 for a gallon of gas. For once, we should make a pre-emptive strike for the good of the environment.

Oil production is at its peak right now, which means the end of oil production could be in our lifetime. For too long the United States, under the pressure of oil companies, has refused to respond to the threat associated with oil consumption. Technology for renewable energy is moving forward with leaps and bounds. Hybrid vehicles, for example, are available right now. Instead of short-sighted solutions based on burning non-renewable resources, we should be investing in clean energy technology. It is time for us to stop talking and start acting.

FRATERNITY SPEAKS OUT

My name is Long Tran and I am the president of the Pi Delta Psi fraternity, Xi Chapter, at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Our chapter's house is currently located on 389 North Pleasant St., and I am writing on behalf of my fraternity brothers who occupy that residence, along with my fraternity brothers who live on-campus and elsewhere.

This letter concerns the incidents that occurred on the night of Oct. 1 on North Pleasant St., where several fights broke out that resulted in the stabbing of an unspecified number of people. We understand that the crimes are still under investigation, and we do not know many of the details of the events that occurred, but as a fraternity, we would, first and foremost, like to extend our sympathies to those who were injured that night in such a barbaric fashion. As a fraternity, we collectively believe that violence should never be used as a means to solve problems, and we condemn the senseless brutality that occurred that night.

Secondly, the brothers of Pi Delta Psi would like to respond to reports and images in the media that have portrayed North Pleasant St. as a dangerous place to be. More specifically, we feel that by showing images of our fraternity's letters, news programs like 22 News and Fox 40 are unfairly implicating these events to our fraternity and the members within our chapter. More recently, it was reported in the Oct. 5 Daily Collegian that, "The fight involved members from … the Pi Delta Psi … fraternity." Besides being a baseless and damaging statement, it is also absolutely untrue.

The members of my chapter and I have convened to discuss the fights, and I can assure that not a single member of our fraternity directly or indirectly instigated, exacerbated or participated in the fighting that took place. We are willing to work 100 percent with the police department in any and all investigations, in order to assist them in hopes of finding the criminals involved and punishing them to the fullest extent of the law.

We also feel it necessary to express that we believe North Pleasant St., also known as "Frat Row," is in no way a dangerous place to live. We feel that the entire reputation of the Greek life on "Frat Row" should not be determined by these isolated incidents, and it is unfair to prematurely associate the image of specific Greek letters to the incident while the investigation is still pending.

Long Tran

RALLYING BEHIND FRAT ROW

As a former UMass student, a member of a sorority and the future wife of a member of the Zeta Beta Tau Fraternity at UMass, I must say I am outraged at the negative press being given to "Frat Row" and the UMass Greek System. I am a personal friend of the two brothers who were stabbed in the incident and know them to be responsible, kind and hardworking members of the fraternity. This incident should be treated as an isolated fight not associated with fraternal behavior.

Furthermore, I think it was irresponsible journalism to interview students who are not members of the Greek System, but rather random students who occasionally frequent "Frat Row." How can they give an honest opinion about the men and women of UMass's Greek System if they aren't involved in it? I encourage every UMass student, Greek and non-Greek, to rally behind the injured students in a stand against violence instead of making unfounded comments that speak of a new "fear" of frequenting "Frat Row."

I speak from experience in saying that most fights and illegal activities on "Frat Row" are started by non-Greek UMass students and Amherst residents. The lives of your fellow students were put in danger by a non-UMass student. Don't let UMass administrators (most of whom fail to see the good aspects of the Greek System) use this incident as more ammunition to end the Greek tradition at UMass.

Incidents such as campus rapes, fights and drug abuse have been present on our campus, outside of the Greek system, for a long time. Students fought against those incidents, and now it is time to bridge the gap between "Greek" and "non-Greek" and stand up for your fellow students. And, as a successful graduate of UMass and the Greek System, I encourage students and faculty alike to remember the countless hours of community service that the fraternities and sororities perform each year, as well as the values of leadership, tradition and friendship that are gained through membership in the Greek System.

ONE BAND FOR ALL

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Few bands are able to survive the "sophomore slump." Fewer can consistently create memorable, multi-platinum selling albums. U2, however, is one of those elite bands, and its talents are used not only for gaining capital, but also for a political cause. Members of U2's congregation, fans young and old, flocked to the TD BankNorth Garden for the latest service.

Sen. John Kerry and Patriots' quarterback Tom Brady were two of the more famous members in attendance.

As the lights blacked out, the indie-rock anthem "Wake Up" by the Arcade Fire filled the arena as a way to prepare the fans for the coming evening. But nothing could prepare them for the message Bono had to preach — one of love, peace, and ending poverty in the world, words of a true humanitarian.

The set kicked off with "City of Blinding Lights" and "Vertigo," hits from the band's most current album. The 300 fans who were lucky enough to be encapsulated in the central pit of U2's elliptical stage were showered with confetti.

The first half of the show continued with some familiar favorites, including "Elevation," "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," "The Electric Co." mashed with lyrics from the Smashing Pumpkins "Bullet with Butterfly Wings," and a version of "Beautiful Day" melded brilliantly with the Jimmy Cliff classic "Many Rivers to Cross."

"Have faith in the future," Bono told his parishioners. "We owe so much to scientists who are going to make a better future." He then went on to dedicate the next song, "Miracle Drug," to scientists who are working on finding a cure for AIDS and treatments for people infected with the virus. The reflective ping-pong ball-like curtain of lights that surrounded the stage projected spinning DNA strands of vibrant color.

"Sometimes You Can't Make It On Your Own" began the theme of work vs. identity, featuring a figure reminiscent of a image you'd find on a men's room door, but dressed in work attire. Drummer Larry Mullen moved front and center to a marching-style drum on the tip of the ellipse for "Love, Peace, or Something Else," but rushed back to his set when the time came for "Sunday Bloody Sunday," which was the first of many call and response routines between the audience and the band. Bono muttered a sort of improvised prayer during the war anthem, singing "Father Abraham, what have you done, please no more."

The emotion set lunged into "Miss Sarajevo," as Bono told of the song's origins during the Bosnian conflict. A beauty pageant was held in protest of the war in the city, featuring Christian and Muslim women dressing beautifully as snipers and mortar fire raged on.

"Sarajevo was the perfect example of co-existence," he said. "Christians and Muslims lived together in peace, but evil wanted to destroy it." It was a rare time during the show when Edge left his guitar for another instrument, the piano.

Before the start of "Pride (In the Name of Love)," a bill of human rights was displayed on monitors and the curtain of lights, as a woman read off the various articles. The crowd began to chant along with the band, with their fists pumping into the air.

Bono, who has been nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize (winners of which will be announced tomorrow) for his efforts to end poverty in the Third World via his contributions to the ONE Campaign, pushed for the crowd to become a singular voice. The Campaign seeks for the United States to give one percent of its total budget to the nations of Africa, in a plan to "make poverty history."

"This is not just an American dream or a European dream, but also an Asian and African dream," he preached as the crowd's voices soared and Edge broke out into a guitar solo, leading into "Where the Streets Have No Name." Emotions ran their highest, as flags of African nations scrolled down through the lights and monitors, and Sen. Kerry and Tom Brady were visibly feeling the crowd's emotion as they jumped up and down too. The crowd didn't settle after the epic finale of the song, either, as every band member could be seen muttering "wow."

"The right must meet the left, because we are stronger when we are one," Bono said, clearly addressing Sen. Kerry and other politicians in attendance. Tom Brady had signed up for the ONE Campaign earlier in the evening, Bono told his flock before dubbing into "One" with the rest of the band.

The encore set featured an acoustic version of "Wild Horses" and "With or Without You," where Bono swooned a woman by pulling her into his arms up on the stage.

After the encore set, Bono paid his respects to the Fenway faithful, donning a blank Red Sox jersey before the final songs, "Yahweh" and "40." Religious iconography filled the stage, as everything from the Star of David to the Crescent Moon morphed into one another.

As the show came to an end, each member slowly left, until only Larry Mullen, the sometimes overlooked founder of U2, was left to play on set. The crowd responded with the lyrics, and in that moment, the crowd and U2 played as one.

THE CAMPAIGN TO MAKE POVERTY HISTORY

Cronenberg's 'Violence' is captivating with a wholesome feel

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Correspondent

The unassuming setting and populace of middle-class America has always been fodder for acerbic satire. The nasty-underbelly-of-supposedly-innocent-small-town genre reached its pinnacle with Lynch's "Blue Velvet," although many have attempted to resurrect its inherent shock. Unfortunately, the polished façade of Happytown, USA can only be blown open so many times before the schtick gets old. Yes, there can be rotten forces at work in my carefree neighborhood, audiences might have been heard to say; there's no further need to remind us. But some try nonetheless, and it's a surprise that one of the most notoriously original directors is the latest to cash in on the formula.

David Cronenberg directs "A History of Violence," based on the graphic novel by John Wagner and Vince Locke. Tom Stall (Viggo Mortensen) is the owner of a quaint coffee shop in what must be the quaintest part of Indiana. He has a wife, a teenage son, and a cherubic young daughter. By day, he serves coffee and pie with a warm smile; by night, he performs cunnilingus on his wife (he gives as much as he receives) while she's dressed as a cheerleader (the cute kind of fetish, not the creepy kind). Tom leads a normal, wholesome-than-wholesome life until he stands up to a couple of mysterious robbers at his shop and demonstrates some extraordinary fighting skills in the process. After the media proclaim him a hero and saturate their outlets with his story — perhaps just the normal prediction of the media's response, perhaps commentary on how the American people are nowadays desperate for reaffirmation that there are indeed heroes in their midst — he draws the attention of an intimidating gangster, Fogarty (Ed Harris, "The Right Stuff," "The Truman Show"). Fogarty insists that Stall is living a lie, and he has had a past live in the mafia. His family is at first angry at Fogarty for accusing Tom and dropping vague threats, but soon the doubt begins to shift towards Tom himself.

A great deal of Cronenberg's success can be traced to the "can they actually show that in a movie?" factor — his temerity to depict the unsavory on screen, from sonic fissures in a man's stomach to exploding heads. Apart from a scene on a staircase that may inspire those sympathetic to the feminist cause to leave the theater, and an offscreen shooting of a young girl that may or may not be a dream, there are no truly unpleasant sequences in "A History of Violence." Perhaps Cronenberg took the project to prove he can be just as riveting without the shocks.

In that sense, he has succeed-

Have you ever wondered what it would be like if your favorite movies were shown in 30-second intervals and re-enacted by bunnies? Well your incredibly specific and oddly coincidental dream has come true. Using flash animation, this adorable acting troupe performs a wide range of cinematic gold. The collection includes movies from "The Big Chill" and "Pulp Fiction" to "The Exorcist" and my personal favorite, "The Shining."

4. Remixed Trailers
links off of www.twit.tv

Speaking of "The Shining," have you ever wondered, What if somebody rehashed the plot from a bloody psychological thriller to a light-hearted family comedy?" Well, you are. 2-0, my friend! ACF offers a site that's not as much extreme as it is X-TREME! For some unexplained reason you'll find, in between the links to Ann Coulter's website and Bush Country T-shirts, three remixed movie trailers. Along with "The Shining," there's the "West Side Story" zombie trailer and the classic horror "Titanic."

These are so cleverly and carefully edited that if you've never seen any of them, you'd swear they were the real things. I especially loved the use of Peter Gabriel's "Solsbury Hill" to show the kinship between Jack Nicholson and the family.

ACF is really hard to navigate, so I found some links off of www.twit.tv. You'll find them in the October 2 topics.

3. The Greatest Pop Culture Site on the Web
www.retrocrush.com

By far, retroCRUSH offers the most distinct and hilarious look at pop culture from today and the past. Each week the site features articles that cover all parts of pop culture. Topics range from Disney's obsession with killing off the parents or orphaning its main characters to the fifty greatest monkeys of all time to and the items in the 1978 Sears Catalog (much like today, it was 70% bras and pantiest). The Webmaster does a few Podcasts a week, and there's a large section dedicated to pin-ups through the years. You should definitely check it out. It's the kind of site you can get lost in for hours.

2. Christopher Walken for President 2008

The creepiest — or most brilliant — actor of our times, Christopher Walken, is "running" for the 2008 presidential ticket. He's seen the current state of this country, and has decided its time for a change! He's ready to take on hot button issues like stem cell research and gun control. No Washington lobbyist can buy him off. Yes, America! We need our Walken!

I still can't tell if this is a real site or not. The design and layout is so generic, it's hard to tell if it is in fact a parody or if Walken really is running. After all, it's not like something he wouldn't do. Among the site's features is a detailed downloadable PDF of Walken's political platform and poster, which viewers are encouraged to plaster up in as many places as possible.

1. The Mario Opera

Imitation is the best from of flatters. The same could be said about illegal copyright infringement. In his long career, the arguable biggest and most positive Italian stereotype, Mario, has squashed a lot of turtles and dodged many barrels. He is an avid tennis and go-cart participant, a licensed pharmacist, and a very dedicated boyfriend. He has acting creds on both the small screen and the silver screen (unfortunately), but has never graced the stage. Until now!

Simply titled "The Mario Opera," it tells the heroic tale of Mario's quest to save his Princess from the evils of the Koppa King. It's really not so much an opera as it is an acoustic guitar tribute. Even so, it's surprisingly good. Los Angeles musician Jonathan Mann wrote the musical using the classic riffs and tunes of the game. The best song has to be "Things are Familiar," where Toad gives Mario a much needed boost of confidence and gaming tips.

The website features a link to a QuickTime trailer, interviews with Mann, and the MySpace Music site where you can listen and download the first act for free. And since Mann didn't get permission for the rights, check it out before Nintendo catches wise and shuts it down.

As a side note, I found this fan fiction timeline while doing research. It's a really detailed and humorous view of the Mario universe. Check it out at www.smbhq.com/timeline.htm.

'Mr. Muo' entertains

by Leann Leake
Collegian Correspondent

We first meet our hero on a crowded train in modern-day China, making his way home after years of study in France. He's an unassuming fellow — short, middle-aged, with beat-up round glasses and a briefcase that he guards with almost religious fervor. And with good reason — inside are his books of Freud and Lacan, as well as his almost uncountable notebooks of dreams (his, and those of others). The power to analyze dreams is what he carries back with him to China, a modern tool that he hopes will transform his country.

So begins "Mr. Muo's Travelling Couch," a new novel by Dai Sijie (translated from French by Ina Rilke). It's a kind of modern fantasy, full of quasi-magical elements despite its protagonist's unshakable faith in science, with a plot that shoots along haphazardly but is entertaining nonetheless (at moments sometimes only because the reader is constantly amazed at how the thing keeps going). From the outside, it could be a moral, uplifting, even romantic tale — Muo, we soon find, is on a quest to free his college friend Volcano of the Old Moon who has been imprisoned for giving photos of the Chinese government's injustices to international reporters. The only way to release her would be to bribe Judge Di, but he's too rich to notice any offers of money. What he wants is a night with a virgin. And so we find Muo traveling from rural village to rural village on his battered bicycle, analyzing dreams for a song, hoping he'll encounter a virgin.

These are elements of what, in other hands, could be a compassionate story of justice, a stark picture of modern China, a love story about Volcano of the Old Moon, a social commentary on modern China, even (easily) a sympathetic portrait of human sexuality (at the story's opening, Muo, too, is a virgin). We have a corrupt judicial system, a prisoner with a real Amnesty International-caliber cause. Everything points to tender, sensitive scenes with the young woman that Muo will find — must find. Every turn offers Muo life-changing experiences that should, by all the rules of convention, help him grow as a person. But Sijie would never be so easily predicted or pinned down. This is, instead, a strangely frivolous off-kilter little story where the plot and all the characters stumble around in the tiny details of life with hardly a glance to their surroundings. Characters who seem terribly important indeed are dropped without a mention, plot points abandoned at random. Everything is infused with a standoffish sort of humor that laughs at all the characters but takes itself very, very seriously. It can be frustrating for the reader, so prepared by modern/Western ideas about characters and plot, so ready to feel affection for Muo, so prepared to invest emotionally in the plot.

What is a reader to do? All that he or she can do is laugh a little and not peer into the work too much. Sijie delights in pointing out the reader's follies, in not coming through with things that his work form practically promises. The whole story is a great "got you!" Sijie seems to find gleeful, impish delight that you've spent time with the silly thing.

Withholding all these criticisms, it's an entertaining and very inventive tale. Sijie's sketches of modern china are fascinating. If almost always bafflingly alien to the modern reader. If you enter the book with an open mind, ready to take what comes your way simply at face value, you will probably enjoy this novel. With any more expectations though, you'll probably just be annoyed at Sijie's weaving little narrative. The book refuses to reach any conclusions or adhere to any logic which, in its own way, does reach a sort of conclusion about the world: that nothing really matters, that ideals are silly, that grand goals are hardly ever achieved. This is completely contrary to the feel-good promotional quotes that decorate the cover: "touching," "poetic and affecting." "Muo's a charmer." What Sijie has really created is a world where the reader must stand outside and jitter at the goings on, or forever be ashamed by his culpability.

ed "A History of Violence" is a gripping film, with sharp and sometimes darkly funny dialogue (a mobster's line after a bungled whacking attempt registers a "David Mamet" on the memorability scale), grimly wary acting, and a tightly wound plot. A great deal of suspense is generated with the question of Tom Stall's true identity. Is he the victim of a mistaken identity, with potentially fatal consequences? Was he subjected to a "Total Recall"-style brainwash? Or could it actually be that he has been living a double life, and his loving family has placed their trust in a ruthless gangster? And if he is, has he truly changed, or can wisps of his past life seep through his new identity?

But there is one definite problem with "A History of Violence." Given the film's tone, one gets the sense that the filmmakers have assumed that the concept of evil lurking in a seemingly wholesome setting would in itself be enough to deliver chills. Such a concept might have delivered a punch three decades ago. However, after scores of blue velvets and American beauties, the act seems old hat. If we were to ignore the film's attempt at mesmerizing the audience by slicing apart the small-town-folk archetype, "A History of Violence" is a solid story bedecked by skilled craft. But if the filmmakers expected it to compel on the basis of its satire of everyday American life, they are in for an unwelcome surprise.

suit against UMass. Long story short, Brown was banned from the sidelines during his first three games, and UMass had to cut a $125,000 check in reparation.

When the action on the actual field was over, the Minutemen quickly left Parsons Field – or what former UM coach Mark Whipple called "The Big House" – jumped on the team buses and left Brookline with a 26-22 comeback victory. They wore wry smiles that came with giving their coach his most – although he won't admit it – satisfying win of the season.

The feel of this week is different. The players can concentrate on football, and the feature story on Saturday will be the game, not the sideshow.

Both teams are entering Saturday's game with plenty of rest, as both are coming off a bye week. And both are coming off wins, though of different varieties.

Northeastern earned the first victory of its season by surviving a 56-41 shootout with Towson while the Minutemen won a close 14-6 battle with Rhode Island.

The Huskies' offense is starting to get on track, but it will get a chance to really see how good it is against UMass, which is ranked first in the NCAA in scoring defense (17.3 points per game), passing defense (93.0 yards per game) and total defense (184.5 yards per game).

Northeastern's passing attack, which has averaged 250.2 yards per contest, is led by senior wide receiver Cory Parks, who has already caught 26 passes for 447 yards and one score in four games.

"That is the challenge for our guys," Brown said of his former wideout. "I like to think our secondary is pretty solid, but you want to make sure you control the matchups that he is going to have during the course of the game and try to make sure that he goes into a matchup scenario that you feel comfortable with as a coach. That is really the big piece for us."

Solving UMass' complex defense isn't the only thing NU has to do. After changing defensive coordinators in the offseason, the Huskies have had tons of trouble stopping teams, giving up 41 points in a loss to Georgia Southern, 35 in a loss to Youngstown State, 38 in a loss to Villanova and the 41 to Towson.

With all of UMass' offensive weapons, red-shirt freshman quarterback Liam Coen is looking forward to getting back on the field for his latest test.

"They are a pretty simple defense, schematically," Coen said. "So we are going to try to keep it simple and just compete."

Senior free safety Shannon James has led a UMass defense that is ranked first in the NCAA in scoring, yards allowed and passing yards allowed.

O-line rests up during bye week

very courageous the way he's gone ahead and performed," Brown said. "I think we're getting a little bit more consistent there. I think it's been fairly solid. We'd like it to be a little bit better, but they've hung together."

The loss of two seniors and other veterans has forced some of the younger linemen to step up and fill some of the big shoes. Redshirt freshman Sean Caliechio has seen his share of playing time in 2005, and redshirt junior Brandon McAfee has become familiar with the offense as well. Sophomore Chris Hopkins is another young player who Brown has been getting involved in the lineup.

Although the O-line has seen much change, the effectiveness of whoever has been playing tackle, guard or center has not lacked. Throughout the first four games, the Minutemen have given up a grand total of four sacks while protecting Coen. The rushing attack has not slowed either, with the team accumulating 585 yards so far this season, 412 of which belong to junior tailback Steve Baylark.

"They've been incredible. I can't praise them enough," Coen said. "They've helped me step into this and make it a lot easier than I could have dreamed of. The older guys definitely have helped me step into this role. We've got a few guys that are young in there, still trying to work into it. They've been incredible; a lot of things we do offensively goes on their shoulders."

With Northeastern coming to McGuirk Stadium on Saturday, the line will be tested once again. They have used the extra time off to begin and create some kind of stability and will look to use that as a stepping-stone from the injury-prone start of the season.

"We just continue to try to develop continuity there, and that was a good week for us last week because we were able to do some of that," Brown said.

Saban plays role of family man

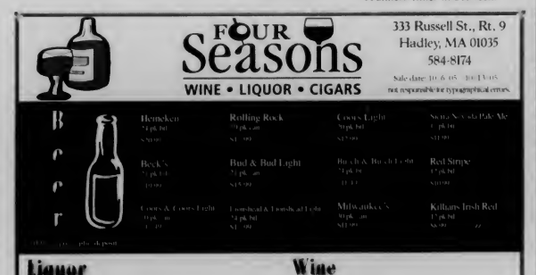
By Armando Salguero
Knight Ridder

MIAMI — Ask Nick Saban about disciplining players, and he'll probably tell you how he disciplines his daughter Kristen. Ask the Dolphins' coach about developing chemistry on offense, and he might tell you about how his son Nicholas got a D on a recent test.

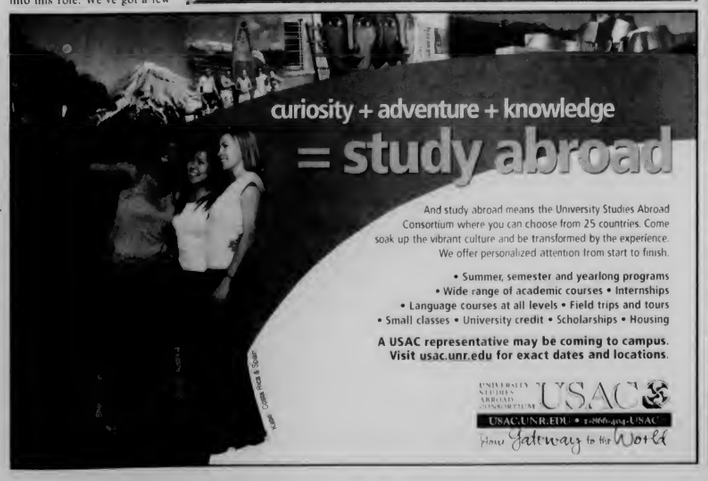
Ask just about any question related to the daily grind of managing an NFL team, everything from salary cap to sacks, and Saban might inject his wife, Terry, into the answer.

The Dolphins' coach is a family man, and if you didn't know that from reading his biographical information, you'll figure it out quickly by listening to him. Saban refers to his family often.

He did it in the team's January news conference that introduced him to South Florida, he did it during his most recent press briefing last week, and he has done it countless times in between.



"I don't use these analogies to tell people about my family," Saban said. "I'm not really opening the front door and saying, 'This is our business. These are our problems. How can you relate to them?' I kind of use them more as generalizations to relate lessons. I try to do it in a general way."



Saban uses the stories to get players to relate to him and to understand what he expects. But sometimes the general stories do give a glimpse into the Saban home a place where the wife and husband don't always agree and the kids don't always march in lock step with the parents.

Sometimes the coach's stories show moments of personal triumph as well as setbacks. Most show that Saban and his family are just like any other South Florida family, except for the part where Dad happens to coach the Dolphins.

"You teach with tables, bibles, and you choose a unique theme so that everyone says 'OH my God, I know that feeling. I know what it means,'" Terry Saban said. "To me what better universal theme than relationships, and family, and raising your children and going home to your wife?

"Nick is pulling from his frame of reference. We are very simple people. We don't travel, we come from very grass roots, hard-working people. We can't tell stories that go very much beyond our home. The examples he's trying to get people to understand how he feels come from dinner. They come from bringing home bad grades and how to deal with that from your dog licking your face at night when nobody else wants to."

Pujols, Jones and Lee in a three-horse race

puts him in the same category as Bonds.

Andruw Jones, Atlanta – Batting average isn't a trendy stat anymore, with good reason, but Jones would be the first MVP to hit in the .260s. The more damaging number, though, is that he entered the final weekend ranked 11th in the league in on-base plus slugging (OPS), the critical number for sabermatricians who disdain batting average. Jones has had a tremendous year and he is the best defensive outfielder of his generation, if not all time, but he'll have to settle for second. His incredible value to his team ranks him above the third-place finisher – but barely.

Derrek Lee, Chicago – If the award was Most Outstanding Player Lee would get the nod. If he doesn't win the Hank Aaron Award, there should be an investigation. He's the total package. He hits for average. He hits for power. He steals bases. He plays almost flawless defense. The two primary strikes against Lee's candidacy were his second-half drop-off and the disappointing finish by the Cubs. As spectacular as his numbers are, the fact he entered the all-star break hitting .378 with 27 homers, 72 RBI and a fair amount of triple-crown hype set him up for a fall. Cubs fans must shudder to think how ugly their season would have been without Lee.

Morgan Ensberg, Houston – A first-time all-star, Ensberg provided thump to the Astros' popgun offense and kept the team afloat until Lance Berkman returned from injury. Houston's pitching was outstanding, but the Astros probably wouldn't have been in the post-season hunt without Ensberg.

Carlos Delgado, Florida – The Marlins were one of the bigger disappointments in the league, but it wasn't Delgado's fault. Switching leagues didn't prevent him from putting up his usual impressive numbers.

Miguel Cabrera, Florida – He would have finished ahead of Delgado and probably Ensberg, too, until he received a one-game suspension in the middle of the Marlins' meltdown. Character certainly counts, but so does production. Cabrera, whether playing outfield or third base, will be a dominant player in the league for years to come.

Pat Burrell, Philadelphia – Phillies fans were less than thrilled with Burrell's performance in 2003 and 2004, but he responded this season and filled the void left by Jim Thome's injury and Bobby Abreu's second-half lull.

Lance Berkman, Houston – Berkman's knee injury, suffered in a church touch football game, was a major reason for the Astros' slow start. His return, and his consistent contributions, helped the club stay in contention.

Jason Bay, Pittsburgh – Sophomore slump? Not this guy. The 2004 rookie of the year actually improved his performance this year and was a shining light in the Pirates' 13th consecutive losing season.

Adam Dunn, Cincinnati – After considering a number of other candidates – including Colorado's Todd Helton, a personal favorite, and Cincinnati's own Ken Griffey Jr. – Dunn got the nod because of his jaw-dropping power production and fun-loving clubhouse demeanor. He's fun to watch and fun to be around. If the Reds ever put a pitching staff in front of Dunn and Junior, they just might have something.

JACKIE SKRUVAN/ THE COLLEGIAN

St. Louis Cardinals first baseman Albert Pujols watches an oppositve field home run sail out of Busch Stadium. Pujols has finished behind Barry Bonds each of the last two years in the MVP ballots.

Laying in the weeds

It may have looked ridiculous for a team with a .500 record to spray champagne around the clubhouse in September, but it would be mean to criticize San Diego for being happy with its achievement.

The Padres were the best team in a historically bad division, but they aren't required to put their record on their souvenir T-shirts.

"Any time you win a division championship is exciting," Padres general manager Kevin Towers said. "This is probably the most rewarding of our three. Everyone said we were going to fold. I even had some doubts creep in.

"But we never did. I think we got stronger. And I really believe we're going to be tough in a short postseason series."

Silly as it may sound, the Padres could be a dangerous team in the playoffs. They have good starting pitching. Ace pitcher Jake Peavy is throwing the ball better than potential first-round foes Chris Carpenter and John Smoltz.

The Padres have a nearly unbeatable closer in Trevor Hoffman and a lineup that enabled them to finish 22-6 in May.

"I think we are capable of better things," Mark Loretta told the San Diego Union-Tribune. "In some ways, we are probably more battle-tested than other teams. Somehow, we have found a way to persevere. And now we're going to be playing loose and easy."

Moving on?

Chicago veteran Nomar Garciaparra loves playing at Wrigley Field and would like to stay with the Cubs. In order for that to happen, he may have to move to second base or left field. Garciaparra, who did move to third base when Aramis Ramirez got hurt, wouldn't mind the change.

"Whatever," he told the Chicago Tribune. "If you're where you want to be and you want to be part of a great organization and a great team. . . . I have a hard time saying it's a sacrifice. It's just something you do because we're a team." In addition to his intense conditioning program, which is designed to avoid catastrophic injury like the torn groin that sidelined him four months this season, Garciaparra can spend a portion of the winter counting up the money he left on the table when he declined a huge offer in Boston two years ago.

Hart-less?

There were increasing signs that Texas general manager John Hart, once thought to be untouchable, would get the boot after the season.

Owner Tom Hicks, who fired current Brewers GM Doug Melvin to bring Hart in from Cleveland, met with Hart this week to discuss "what's best for the organization."

"We have a gentlemen's agreement to sit down at the end of the year and see where we are going," Hicks told the Dallas Morning News prior to their final meeting.

Hart was ripped endlessly in the Dallas media for spending more time reading putts than the waiver wire.

It also didn't help that Cleveland, a team that Hart left and declared dead, has now passed the Rangers in the American League pecking order.

Minutemen back in action

This year's version has a different feel

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It was a hyped-up, amplified, blood-filled slugfest. There were thoughts of revenge and remembrance of the legal battles. Many players play saw a harder hit than usual, and it served as a chance to pent up tension that had been painfully piling up in each and every player on the team since the early months of summer.

It wasn't fun. It was barely controllable, especially following the events that happened prior to the 2004 season.

The Massachusetts football team (1-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) traveled to Brookline last year to take on (then just the players on Northeastern's (1-3 1-1 A-10) roster. The Minutemen went in to stick up for their coach, their athletic department and their school. And with both teams out of the playoff equation at the time, there was nothing more than pride on the line, but it was an entire season's worth of pride riding on that game.

UMass coach Don Brown was entering his 10th game with his new team, which meant it had been 10 games since his last time on the Northeastern sideline as the Huskies' coach.

After leaving NU to take the UMass job, Northeastern filed a breach-of-contract law-

Bye week plays big role to help injured O-line

When a redshirt freshman quarterback starts his first two games of his collegiate career, the last place one might want injury is on the offensive line. In the case of the Massachusetts football team (3-1 2-0 Atlantic 10), that is exactly what happened even before Liam Coen stepped in as the new signal-caller for the Minutemen.

With a banged up offensive line, UMass took full advantage of this past bye week to get healthy and obtain some stability – particularly in the trenches.

"Especially the big guys, they need the rest, they take so many reps in practice, they take so many bumps in the game, too," Coen said. "It's big for them to get some rest, some treatment, try to get rested for the game coming up."

The Minuteman line, which normally consists of its main five starters, has seen players bounce in and out of the starting lineup this season. Some of the most notable absentees are senior captain Colin Stoetzel, who has not played that season with a knee injury, and senior O.J. McBride, who has only seen limited action.

Along with the two seniors, junior Dave Thompson has been mending his leg during the off-week, and senior Brent Caldwell is a veteran who has remained in the starting lineup, despite some bumps and bruises. Redshirt sophomore Matt Austin is another starter who has been fighting off injury.

During the 14-6 win over Rhode Island on Sept. 24, Miller stayed in the game on a key drive, regardless of any pain he was sustaining. The tough act caught the eye of UMass coach Don Brown.

"Matt Austin has played really, extremely brave;

Holt isn't the flashy star

By Steve Korte
Knight Ridder

ST. LOUIS — St. Louis Rams wide receiver Torry Holt isn't interested in self-promotion.

He isn't a publicity hound like some of the other big wide receivers in the NFL. He doesn't do outlandish things and he doesn't indulge in elaborate touchdown celebrations.

That's just not the way that Holt, who grew up in the small town of Gibsonville, N.C., and played at North Carolina State, was raised.

"I remember when I was growing up and I'd do my little thing and show other teams up, and they'd start calling me 'Hot dog,'" Holt said. "Mom always said, 'That's what they say is going to catch up with you.' That's in mind that, I just played the game.

"Even in high school, I always felt like I was the underdog, so going out and doing all the stuff isn't going to get me anything more. I just wanted to go out and play hard and show that I can play on any level with anybody."

A year spent at the Hargrave Military Academy in 1994 also taught Holt about keeping his ego in check.

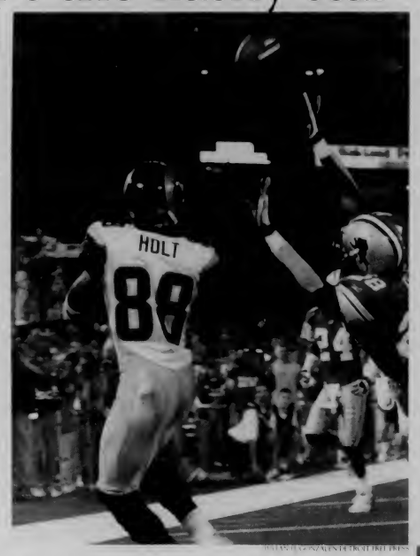
"The military academy was a very humbling experience," Holt said. "[The following celebrations] were something you couldn't do at the military academy.

"It was strict, give the ball back to the ref and go over with the other cadets and celebrate. Just my life experiences have made me the person that I am today."

Because Holt doesn't make waves, he doesn't always get the acclaim of other top flight receivers like Terrell Owens or Randy Moss.

Holt is under the radar and OK with that.

"I come here, I think, really well after seven years," Rams coach Mike Martz said. "I'm talk about it with me sometimes. I'm happy with who he is. He doesn't need any notoriety. He loves to play.



"I see him in practice, he's like a child still running around here. He doesn't care about the attention the receivers get. Quarterbacks, special spots coaches and all those things. That's not something he could care less about from what I see."

Holt has 30 receptions for 442 yards and three touchdowns after four games this season.

You don't see Holt pulling a Chad Ochocinco or hiding a celebration prop in the padding around the end zone.

"I don't think I do that," Holt said. "I'm not the type outside the game. If I feel like I have to do that stuff, then that's not what I want to do. That's their personality. That takes too much thinking.

"As for offense, I have to remember all those plays we have going into the week, and then trying to remember some kind of skit out there that I'm going to do after I have scored, that's way too much."

St. Louis Rams wide receiver Torry Holt beats Lions defensive back Ron Rice for a touchdown reception during the teams' matchup last season in Detroit.

Holt had a nine-reception, 163-yard effort against the Tennessee Titans two weeks ago.

"He can shoulder the load in the passing game if he has to," Martz said of Holt. "Not many receivers can do that, and by that, I mean you can isolate him where they're doubling him, and he's going to find a way, one way or the other, to get open."

Rams quarterback Marc Bulger said the thing that separates Holt from other wide receivers is his ability to do every thing well.

"We ran pretty much the whole route tree with him," Bulger said. "He ran hitches, he ran slants, he ran go-routes, he did pump moves, he ran out-routes. There is not one route that he doesn't do well. He's a complete receiver, and he can do it all."

Bulger also said he respects the way Holt goes about his job.

"He does the same thing every season, every offseason," Bulger said. "He doesn't take anything for granted. Him and Isaac after every practice always are working on something. They're always working hard.

"I just like the fact that he hasn't changed at all with all his success. He understands it takes hard work."

Holt has the most receiving yards of any NFL receiver since the 2000 season with 7,726 yards.

He's also No. 1 in NFL history in average receiving yards per game among receivers with a minimum of 50 games. He's averaging 86 yards per game over his career, with Moss being the next closest player at 84.7 yards per game.

"I don't know if I am the best receiver in the league, but I think with where I am in right now my career, I have been one of the most consistent receivers in the National Football League up to this point," Holt said.

Three stars top the list of NL MVP candidates

By Drew Olsen
Knight Ridder

MILWAUKEE — The top portion of the National League Most Valuable Player ballot, which was due at the close of baseball's business this past Sunday, reads like this:

Dear Voter:

There is no clear-cut definition of what Most Valuable means. It is up to the individual voter to decide who was the Most Valuable Player in each league to his team. The MVP need not come from a division winner or other playoff qualifier.

The rules of the voting remain the same as they were written on the first ballot in 1931:

Actual value of a player to his team, that is, strength of offense and defense.

Number of games played.

General character, disposition, loyalty and effort.

Former winners are eligible.

Members of the committee may vote for more than one member of a team. You are also urged to give serious consideration to all your selections, from one to 10. A 10th-place vote can influence the outcome of an election.

You must fill in all 10 places on your ballot.

Keep in mind that all players are eligible for MVP, and that includes pitchers and designated hitters.

Only regular-season performances are to be taken into consideration.

San Francisco slugger Barry Bonds, winner of an unprecedented seven trophies and the last four in a row, was out of the picture this year, which helped make this ballot as tough as any in memory.

During the final weeks of the season, a consensus developed that the winner would come from a pool that included Atlanta's Andruw Jones, Chicago's Derrek Lee and St. Louis' Albert Pujols.

"There really is no wrong answer," Milwaukee Brewers manager Ned Yost said. "All of those guys are definitely deserving."

Reserving the right to make changes in the final moments before submission, here is one writer's ballot:

Albert Pujols, St. Louis – After finishing second to Bonds in 2003 and third behind Bonds and Adrian Beltre last season, Pujols produced another spectacular season and helped carry the injury-plagued Cardinals offense to the best record in the National League. You can make a strong case that Jones carried a rookie-laden Braves team to the playoffs, but Pujols was protected in the lineup at times by Abraham Nunez and So Taguchi. While opposing teams will pitch to Jones in clutch situations, sometimes with disastrous results, managers will make maneuvers two innings in advance in order to minimize the chance that Pujols will come up with men on base. He changes the game sitting in the dugout, which

See MVP on page 8

Atlanta Braves center fielder Andruw Jones has made as good of a case as anyone for the NL's Most Valuable Player by carrying a young and injury-riddled team to the playoffs.

Bush's words spark debate within UMass

By John Fenuccio
Collegian Correspondent

With approval ratings for President George Bush down and a national sentiment of dissatisfaction with America's current growing position in Iraq, the President gave a speech detailing America's place in the war on terror and Iraq at the National Endowment for Democracy event in Washington, D.C. yesterday.

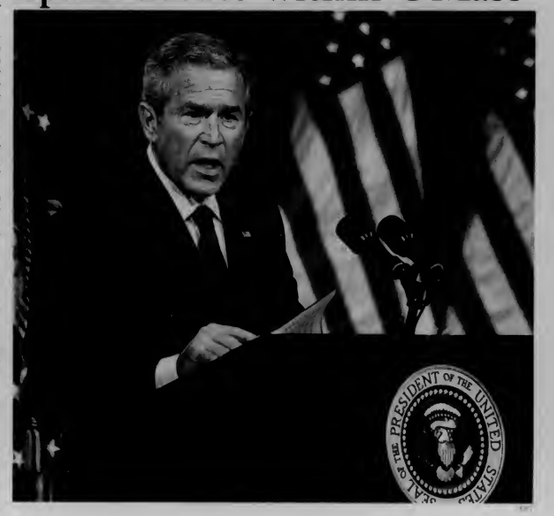
In front of the Chamber Of Commerce, President Bush spoke on a variety of topics including Iraq and Osama Bin Laden. The emphasis seemed to be clear through the president's speech: justify the war in Iraq (or try to, yet again) and decree a steadfast resolve against terrorism.

"The terrorists regard Iraq as the central front in their war against humanity, and we must recognize Iraq as the central front in our war on terror," said the President. Yet many are still wondering why the man responsible for the murders of 3,000 or more Americans, Osama Bin Laden, is still at large.

"I don't agree with the heavy emphasis this administration is putting on Iraq when Osama Bin Laden is still out there somewhere, probably planning his next attack," said Tiffany Del Masto, a junior nursing major at UMass.

In the aftermath of the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina, the president's approval rating was at a staggering 40 percent. With both the president's and the position in Iraq's approval rating down, the president addressed his critics who believe the United States should collectively pull out of Iraq all together.

"Some observers also claim that America would be better off by cutting our losses and leaving Iraq now," said Bush. "It's a dangerous illusion refuted with a simple question: Would the United States and other free nations be more safe or less safe with Zarqawi and Bin Laden in control of Iraq, its people and its resources?"



Bush's speech was stronger than many previous speeches because of the way that he raised awareness of terrorism and connected it to the "global fight against terrorism" that is presently rooted in Iraq. The president reaffirmed the notion that we need to stay in Iraq in order to prevent Iraq from becoming a lawless area that terrorists can thrive in.

"We're determined to deny the militant's control of any nation which they would use as a home base and a launching pad for terror … and for this reason, we're fighting the regime remnants and terrorists in Iraq" said the president yesterday.

In response to this issue, Matt Chase, student of UMass' Stockbridge School of Agriculture, said, "I don't have a major issue with our position in Iraq so long as the administration is being honest when they talk about Iraq being a central issue in the war on terror," adding, "I would have a problem with it if it was found out that we as a nation had been lied to and innocent soldiers' lives were lost because of it."

The president's message throughout the speech was to make the administration's policy known that the war on terror has no boundaries and that we need to continue to fight and prevent acts of terrorism before they have a chance to occur. While criticism has been building lately over the dissatisfaction with our progress in Iraq, the president made it clear that we as a nation need to keep at it and not back down.

"No one should underestimate the difficulties ahead, nor should they overlook the advantages we bring to this fight" said the president, adding, "with every random bombing and with every funeral of a child it becomes more clear that the extremists are not patriots or resistance fighters. They are murderers at war with the Iraqi people themselves."

Lombardi holds hope for UMass in college ranks

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

Yesterday the Faculty Senate heard a presentation by Chancellor John Lombardi on "TheCenter's Top American Research Universities" at their regular meeting. TheCenter is an organization founded by Lombardi five years ago while at the University of Florida and it gauges the performances of top research institutions in the United States.

In 2002, the University of Massachusetts was ranked 102 out of the 160-170 universities TheCenter ranks every year, and 68 out of public universities.

"It's not important to be in the top ten," Lombardi explained to the audience. "What is important is to compete and do better. There is a confusion in this conversation about the rankings. The confusion is to do better you have to move up. But no one checks to see if the two above them got worse and you stay the same."

Lombardi has set three schools as data points for UMass to gauge the University's improvement over time in the rankings. They include Indiana University Bloomington, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign and University of California Berkley. IU has a similar student quality while UIUC is a similar sized land grant institution like UMass. Finally, Berkley is "infinitely better funded," he said. Lombardi will use these schools to make a call out to the Massachusetts Legislature.

"This is what the big time does and we want to compete in the big time, don't sit over there in Boston and tell me we're going to do it," Lombardi said. "We need to get serious money for serious work because serious institutions have it."

TheCenter's rankings differ from other college ranking services in the data they use and how the present it, according to Lombardi.

TheCenter uses nine reference points under four categories: support, including gifts and total money available for research; faculty using numbers in national academies and award receivers; advance training, including doctorate students; and undergraduates which is measured by SAT scores.

Lombardi devoted much time in his presentation to discussing how to measure undergraduate quality at the institutions. The main problem he points out is that the

UMass ballroom dancers still left without home

By Adam Sutton
Collegian Correspondent

Faint Latin music grows steadily louder with each step up the campus pond stairs to the Fine Arts Center lobby in the University of Massachusetts. At the top, the wide glass doors spill light from the white tiled room with four couples dancing in long strides under a white ceiling and fluorescent lights. Sixty onlookers wait around the dancers, socializing and smiling, waiting for the start of class.

The music is turned off and club president Jedediyah Williams walks to the center of the room and loudly asks, "Who has never done the Rumba?"

Williams then takes a partner and gives instructions to the group on the Latin dance move.

"See, we are basically moving in a box."

The Ball Room Dance Club has been using the FAC lobby for its meetings only recently, after having been told with "zero warning" that the space they had been using for years in Totman Gym was no longer available, according to Williams. The space in Totman is now used by the expanding Exercise Department as a laboratory.

Deputy Provost John Cunningham coordinated the transfer of Totman's space to Exercise Science over a two year period. In the process, Cunningham met the needs of the Fencing Team, Exercise Science and the Dance Program; however, the Ballroom Dance Club was turned away from their usual space on the semester's first day of practice.

Allegedly unaware that the Ball Room Dance Club is a Registered Student Organization, Cunningham considered the club a part of the Music and Dance Department, an academic program. Having decided to allow the Dance Program to remain in Totman, Cunningham thought he had met all dancing groups' needs.

"I myself may have confused the [club's] needs with those of the Dance Program which is also located in Totman," Cunningham said.

Athletics Director John McCutcheon, who facilitated in transferring the Fencing Team to Boyden, admits that the RSO was not addressed in the process, but adds that "no one wanted to displace anybody."

The Ball Room Dance Team's specific needs, such as a perfectly flat floor, expansive room and ability to play loud music, are tough to meet on a campus with increasing enrollment and increasing demand for space.

Heather Bell, an operations manager at the FAC, allowed a trial use of the FAC's lobby on most Mondays and the club uses Earthfoods' room two days a month. But Williams considers this insufficient, noting that the Ball Room Dance Team is a competitive subset of the club, needs more guaranteed time to practice.

With so few rooms available, the process of getting signatures and permission for acquiring practice space can be daunting.

"There are so many middle men," Williams lamented.

According to club member Paul Schunk, he asked Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano for assistance in finding a space and was directed to the Multi Cultural Center. The space recommendations given to Schunk were unusable because the brick flooring in the rooms is unsafe for dancing, Schunk said.

Schunk added that he asked his new RSO manager, Phee Paradise, about the possibility of using either the Campus Center auditorium or the Student Union ballroom and was turned down.

"On nights we have practice, I walk by the ballroom, no one is in there," Schunk said. "We get told no because someone might want it."

The coordination of transferring the space in Totman to Exercise

Science took over two years, according to Cunningham, proving that finding a space to fit the specific needs of any group is not easy.

"Everyone in this entire process is frustrated," said Paradise.

War costs could hit $570 billion by 2010

By Lolita C. Baldor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is spending about $7 billion a month to wage the war on terror, and costs could total $570 billion by the end of 2010, assuming troops are gradually brought home, a congressional report estimates.

The paper by the Congressional Research Service underscores how the price tag has been gradually rising for the war in Iraq. A year ago, the Pentagon was calculating its average monthly costs in that conflict at below $5 billion — an amount the research service says has now grown close to $6 billion.

Those expenses are growing even as recovery costs from hurricanes Katrina and Rita and mammoth federal deficits are intensifying pressure on the Bush administration and Congress to find ways to save money.

A separate study by the Congressional Budget Office found it will be difficult for the Pentagon to sustain current troop levels in Iraq and Afghanistan without rotating troops into the war zone more frequently and using more National Guard brigades. And even those steps will not be adequate long-term solutions.

The budget office study echoed earlier reports suggesting that if current combat demands continue, the Army will have serious problems keeping enough soldiers trained and ready.

Both studies add more fodder to the increasing congressional and public unease about the Iraq war, even as President Bush and members of his administration this week stepped up their defense of the war on terror.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the administration has allocated about $361 billion for military operations, reconstruction and other programs in Iraq and Afghanistan, including $50 billion for 2006 in legislation working its way through Congress, the Congressional Research Service report said. The service is one of Congress' investigative arms.

CRS also identified gaps in the Pentagon's accounting of war costs, including up to $14 billion in funds that may have been transferred from peacetime accounts. It recommended that Congress require more detailed reporting from the Defense Department on how the money is spent.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld addresses the Senate Appropriations Committee on the President's proposed war supplemental budget package on Capitol Hill.

Students brace for massive cuts in financial aid

By Kunal Mehta
Daily Bruin (U.C.L.A.)

LOS ANGELES — As much as $14 billion could be cut from federal student financial aid programs if certain proposed budget adjustments are approved by the U.S. Congress.

The reductions are being discussed as a means to rein in the federal budget deficit, but many student groups across the country find the proposal alarming due to the potential effect on their financial futures.

The size of the cut, which will be voted on in November, will depend on which version of the proposal is finally approved. The Senate seeks to cut $14 billion, while the House of Representatives is proposing to cut $9 billion.

These cuts could result in the average student-borrower having to pay up to $3,800 extra during loan repayment, according to a press release from the United States Students Association, a group that voices students' concerns in Washington, D.C.

The adjustments are part of a legislative process known as budget reconciliation, a procedure that enables Congress to eliminate certain legislative obstacles that would otherwise arise in making tax cuts and adjustments to entitlement programs such as Social Security, pension plans and student loan programs in order to reduce the federal budget deficit.

Lombardi: '250 Plan' crucial to improving UMass' reputation

SATs only measure the quality of students entering the institution, but not the students leaving the institution. The researchers have no accurate way to measure the student's progress, often referred to as value added. Lombardi regrets having to use just the SAT, but it is the only comparable piece of data that is collected nationally.

Dr. Earnest Mas, the chair of the faculty senate, thinks that this is a disadvantage for UMass.

If we had a measure of value added," May said, "I would bet a dime to a dollar that this campus adds more value to the students that it gets to where they end up than Harvard does."

[Harvard] takes in absolutely top students, applies a huge amount of financial resources to them and they do graduate and do good things. But I would guess that the value added could be greater at UMass than at Harvard," May said.

He went on to explain that he thinks that UMass "value[s] vers highly the quality of the undergraduate experience."

Although Lombardi did not offer a plan to get UMass into the top ten universities in the next five years, he did stress that his "250 Plan" which will bring 250 new faculty members to the university over the next five years is crucial if we want to stay competitive.

Senate approves Mass. slot machines

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state Senate voted to expand legalized gambling in the state on Thursday by approving a bill that would install thousands of slot machines at the state's horse and dog tracks.

State senators voted 26-9 in favor of the legislation, which would install 2,000 slot machines at all four Massachusetts racetracks. Two of the tracks are in the district of Senate President Robert Travaglini, D-Boston.

Sen. Michael D. Morrissey, D-Quincy, said Massachusetts residents spend hundreds of millions of dollars a year at out-of-state casinos, such as Mohegan Sun, and that the state could use the money the slots generate, including paying for help for compulsive gamblers.

"I like to think that there is a clear majority of people who'd be supportive of the idea," Morrissey said. "It does save the existing industry. It does provide hundreds of millions of dollars for the Commonwealth."

Thursday's vote was the first time the Senate has voted on a bill to add slot machines to dog and horse tracks, according to Travaglini. Sen. Susan Tucker, D-Andover, said gambling is not a financial solution for the state.

"The piece of the slot pie you've been promised will be eaten before you finish your dinner," she said.

Rep. Daniel Bosley, D-North Adams, chairman of the House Economic Development Committee, said this week he didn't think the bill would pass in the House. Even if it did, it's not certain it could sustain a veto from Gov. Mitt Romney, who opposes bringing slot machines or casinos to Massachusetts.

Under the bill, Suffolk Downs in Boston, Wonderland Greyhound Park in Revere, Plainridge Racecourse in Plainville and Raynham-Taunton track in Raynham would each add up to 2,000 slot machines, which the state would own.

Five-year licenses bring in $100 million in fees, and the state would take in 60 percent of the slot machine revenue, adding up to about $350 million yearly, according to Morrissey.

The bill would also extend the state's simulcasting law, which allows race tracks to broadcast races from other tracks.

Student federal aid awaits massive cuts

Budget reconciliation is ordinarily a one-time process, meaning that changes made under budget reconciliation would only be enacted once and then be revoked.

But the proposed cuts are in the form of amendments to the Higher Education Act, an act that is reviewed and adjusted only once every five to seven years.

This is a much more significant change than many people realize, said Jennifer Pae, vice president of the USSA.

The cuts come during a period of rapid increase in tuition fees at most universities, especially public schools.

"In a time when [tuition] fees are increasing, students need an increase in federal aid, not a decrease," said Jeannie Biniek, external vice president of UCLA's Undergraduate Students Association Council.

Biniek said that in 1975, grants made up 80 percent of all federal student aid packages, with loans forming the other 20 percent. Since then, the trend has reversed. Today, grants make up only 20 percent while loans constitute 80 percent of federal student aid packages.

As a result of this reversal, combined with increases in tuition and living costs, Pae said 39 percent of students today are graduating with what the federal government calls "unmanageable debt," hindering their ability to settle down and establish themselves after graduation.

"This is hurting their ability to contribute to society," she said.

Pae said she believes the cuts are a step in the wrong direction for Congress, which is a view shared by USSA President Eddy Morales.

Mass text messaging could give terrorists new deadly weapon

By Jonathan J. Huckill
Daily Collegian (Penn State)

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — Pennsylvania State University researchers say they have discovered a vulnerability that would allow hackers to shut down cell phone networks in large cities, opening up a possible loophole for crime or terrorism.

Patrick McDaniel and Thomas La Porta, both Penn State computer science and engineering professors, presented their findings yesterday to an audience at the Information Sciences and Technology Building.

By sending a large volume of text messages on a cellular network, the system could become overloaded and temporarily disable phone calls from being placed, according to a paper written by the researchers. This is possible because cell phone service providers put text messages and voice calls on the same network.

Patrick Traynor and William Enck, Penn State graduate students, also co-wrote the paper.

Traynor (graduate in computer science and engineering) said the hackers could create a problem similar to a traffic jam on a highway.

"Imagine that the voice portion of the network is a six-lane superhighway, but the only way to get on it is through a one-lane on-ramp," Traynor said. "If you jam the on-ramp, no one can get on."

For instance, by sending 165 text messages per second continuously, a hacker could shut down phone service to all of Manhattan until the system could process all the messages. Only 325,525 messages per second would shut down service to the entire country, McDaniel said.

Traynor would not elaborate on how long the systems could be shut down.

Because text messages can be sent over the Internet, it is much easier to exploit the vulnerability, McDaniel said.

"Connecting the Internet to our national critical infrastructure is inherently dangerous," he said. "It invites all of the problems of the Internet into that infrastructure."

It would be very difficult for hackers to send enough messages to jam the system if they did not have the high-speed capability of the Internet, McDaniel said.

Choking on another 'brownie'

Gil Jenkins

Bushie, you're doing a heck of a job. A heck of a job making cronyism and corruption synonymous with your administration, that is. On Monday, President Bush nominated Harriet E. Miers to the vacant Supreme Court slot. Miers is a longtime advisor and friend, former personal attorney and current White House counsel.

Granted, Bush is not the first President to name such a close ally and friend to the Supreme Court. Forty years ago, President Johnson nominated his lawyer to the Supreme Court. That, however, does not make such an action acceptable.

But what is most egregious is that Bush's pick falls in line with the recently exposed, numerous political patronage jobs being awarded across our government.

For years, the public has accepted that one of the many perks of being the President is getting your friends some jobs, for example the nice little ambassadorship in Eastern Europe. These are traditionally harmless or somewhat meaningless appointments that don't undermine the capacity of the government to take care of its citizens and protect their rights. But in Bush's vision, things are dramatically different. In Bush's world, horse trainers get FEMA jobs, and lotto commissioners become justices. What's next, bus drivers flying Air Force One?

In naming the latest 'brownie' Harriet Miers to one of the most pivotal seats on the Supreme Court, Bush seems to have even outdone himself. His arrogance quite frankly astounds me, as it should others.

It's clearer now than ever that this administration is intent on continually choosing political loyalty over qualification and proper governance when it comes to all appointments. As a result, we all suffer. I'm calling these political appointees "brownies" from now on, in reference to Michael Brown, former FEMA chief.

In naming the latest "brownie," Harriet Miers, to one of the most pivotal seats on the Supreme Court (because it represents the swing vote on key social and women's rights issues), Bush seems to have even outdone himself. His arrogance quite frankly astounds me, as it should others.

A reporter from the Los Angeles Times recently asked Bush about the political capital he talked about in his inauguration speech and how much of it he had left to spend. Bush's response was "plenty." Are you kidding me? A couple of weeks ago, more than 100,000 people protested you and war outside your gate. You got us bogged down in a mess in Iraq. More dead U.S. soldiers appear in the headlines each week. The economy is tanking. Federal deficits are out of control. Yet you have the audacity to assume the majority of Americans trust you with any major decision making? Open the blinds, man. You're a lame duck, and you're hurting America. I pray history won't forget the fallacies of this administration, because we'll be paying for them for the next 20 years or more.

Unfortunately, it seems obvious the President doesn't do regret, or humility, as well as he does arrogance and ignorance. The same goes for many of his Republican compatriots also embroiled in major ethical and legal controversies.

Last week I wrote a column about how Democrats need to capitalize on this rampant corruption and cronyism by improving their rhetoric and getting organized and tough. You can imagine my disappointment when leading Democrats Senator Harry Reid and Diane Feinstein responded to such a dangerous pick with measures of approval.

Heaven only knows why some Democrats insist on failing their constituents at every chance. Just because Miers is a woman and a non-judge with a diverse background, it doesn't make her a good pick for progressives. There are those on both sides of the aisle claiming we don't know enough about Miers. At first there seemed like more of a concern for religious conservatives who feared she might pull a "Souter" like Bush Sr.'s pick and change her views to the liberal side when on the court. But the last few days of dedicated public relations by the Bush administration made repeat of this seem almost impossible.

In my mind the only thing we need to know about Ms. Miers is that she simply isn't qualified to be a Supreme Court Justice. Furthermore, anyone who says Bush is the "most brilliant person they've ever met," is either lying or has dangerously inept observation skills. Miers is a wolf in sheep's clothing, or as Bush calls her, a "pit-bull in size 6 shoes."

Deciding on UMass

Jennifer Lane

Decisions are made everyday. Thoughts enter your mind that make you stress out for days and you worry if you made the correct choice. Answers come flying out of your mouth without a second thought. How do we know what is the right choice, and what is wrong? Do you rely on inspirational crystals that help you write every article or do you get feelings and hunches? Are you a perfectionist who organizes Post-It Notes and gets all the answers from a book, or do you visit a psychic?

Most people would like to try and succeed at everything in life, but unfortunately, it is not so simple. Making decisions is something you need to do everyday. The potato vs. french fries and a hummus wrap vs. a burger are the simplest choices of the day. Sometimes, however, a stressful situation occurs that makes you wonder when things got so complicated. Like whether or not to rent an apartment at the Boulder's, Alpine Commons or Cliffside.

Things don't always have to be so stressful, and choosing the University of Massachusetts Amherst was one of the simplest decisions in my life. I loved the atmosphere, the campus and the people the moment I stepped out of my truck. I went through the application process and was accepted. Afterwards, I went through all the necessary billing information, finances and dorm placements, all before my mother had stepped foot on the campus.

My father knew the place well, and many of his employees have graduated from this university. My mother, on the other hand, had never seen the campus and wasn't too sure of its size. I grew up in a small town and graduated with a class of less than 150 students. I wanted to move on to bigger and better places, but my mom was a little hesitant.

The day we set out to see the university, I had never seen more rain in my life. The downpour was one of the worst New England storms we've ever had, and we hadn't even left Boston yet. The moment we arrived on campus, I was miserable as I watched the rain fall onto the concrete we call UMass Amherst. You couldn't see my teardrops, but I assure you the buildings were crying for me. With their long streaks of rain turning into giant, crying buildings, I knew this would be one of the longer days on my way towards greater education.

Our last stop was the Fine Arts Center where The Not Ready for Bedtime Players were playing. Though the players did a great job, I felt for the more conservative mother as she watched the boys and girls using a banana in one of their most popular skits.

The tour began at the Visitor's Center, which was very dry and a nice starting place to the living hell we were about to run into head on. Our tour lasted the normal hour, and each minute seemed to drag on and get wetter and wetter. The umbrella was no help and kept falling apart; all the while my decision to choose UMass was becoming foggy.

The ending to our day was priceless. Our last stop was the Fine Arts Center where the Not Ready for Bedtime Players were playing. Though the players did a great job, I felt for my more conservative mother as she watched the boys and girls using a banana in one of their most popular skits.

At the end of the tour, I felt like I had made the right decision. As gloomy as this campus can be in the rain, I had a feeling, a hunch that this was the right decision. I felt horrible about my mom and her experience, but I knew someday she would grow to love this campus, and she has. She wouldn't have come here herself, but this is my school and it's one of the best decisions I've ever made.

So how do you know you're making the right decision? Do you have a miraculous epiphany and realize that all your dreams have come true? Most likely, we're not all Cinderella, and we don't have an orchestra highlighting our happy endings. However, the puzzle pieces of life somehow fall into place and fit nicely when you've made a correct choice.

It would be a whole lot easier if you were in a Jimmy Buffett song, with no worries or regrets, living in "Margaritaville," where it's always 5 o'clock somewhere. Life would be so great if it were simple and carefree, with nothing to worry about except too much sun.

We all wish we were in a Caribbean paradise that didn't actually exist sipping on margaritas and living the good life. No one is perfect or deals with stress and decision making the same way. All we can hope for is sunshine on your next campus tour and no tan lines in your next Jimmy Buffett dream.

The Unknown UM has to offer

David Shenkenberg

I learned so many things that I can't repeat to my mother in my biopsychology course at the University of Texas at Austin. For instance, it is modern medical theory — theory, mind you — that women are the default sex. That is, while a baby destined to become a man is still in its mother, androgen hormones (e.g. testosterone), "masculinize" the female, so that the clitoris enlarges to become a penis and the labia fuses to become a scrotum. That explains androgen insensitivity syndrome (AIS), in which people with the XY (male) sex chromosomes have a vagina and breasts. Jamie Lee Curtis allegedly suffers from AIS.

In addition, it is a very strange phenomenon that women who spend a lot of time together have concurrent menstrual cycles. All of this knowledge was gained using Neil R. Carlson's book, "Foundations of Physiological Psychology," (Dr. Carlson is a UMass professor). I often found myself wondering in class, why aren't my biology classes this exciting?

There are many professors studying sexual development and behavior at UMass. In Dr. Deborah Good's lab, for example, researchers study mice deficient in a protein that results in a decrease in sexual drive and drive to exercise. They also have small penises and defects and become obese like adults do. They actually have large fat deposits in their testicles. The interesting aspect of this research is that this gene exists in humans. Perhaps a researcher will one day use this knowledge to help people lose weight and increase their libido.

I also learned in a class at UMass with Dr. Nancy Forger that there is a group of cells that are sexually dimorphic, or bigger in humans. This sexually dimorphic nucleus has been implicated in sexual partner preference, or in other words, homosexuality.

I don't want you to think that I have a one-track mind. Some sleep researchers believe that dreams have the purpose of organizing our thoughts. People that get a healthy dose of sleep with rapid-eye movement (REM) do better on tests than those whom do not. Some scientists are trying to use light cues to induce lucid dreaming, that is, to make it so dreamers are aware that they are dreaming.

In addition to biopsychology, there is a similar discipline in ecological biology that examines animal behavior, in which I also took a course. One of the founders of this field, Konrad Lorenz, became the "father" of young geese, or goslings. Instead of seeing their mother, they saw Lorenz, and subsequently followed him everywhere. I recently saw a nature special on TV in which a person who raised geese in this way taught them how to migrate by taking off in his biplane — the geese took to the air and followed him, just as if he were a goose.

There is good news for married couples, however. Researchers recently discovered that fake sex (sex without ejaculation) results in a higher degree of fidelity among fowl. So, keep the spark alive

Another weird fact I learned in this class, is that the scorpion fly gets "it" any way he can. He presents the female with a gift, in the form of food, or he rapes her if he does not have such a gift. Some male insects have hooks on their penises to prevent a struggling female from escaping. Some female animals get around having the children of undesirable males by cleaning their organs, similar to douching in humans. It should be stated as a disclaimer that many scientists discourage the tendency to anthropomorphize, or compare ourselves to animals.

If you've watched the movie Kinsey, he mentions the bonobo. These apes, which share 98 percent of their DNA with us, use sexual intercourse as the glue that holds their society together, including use for the peaceful resolution of conflicts. This sexual activity is not limited to heterosexual interactions. In addition, they have intercourse face-to-face, and humans were once thought to be the only animals that do that.

Kinsey also explores the issue of monogamy. Doves, once thought to be exemplary in their monogamy, have children with birds other than the social partners that they've seen with, according to genetic tests. If there is a sex that must seek opportunities to multiply, we automatically think of men, but in jacanas, a type of bird, the women have all of the fun.

There is good news for married couples, however. Researchers recently discovered that fake sex (sex without ejaculation) results in a higher degree of fidelity among fowl. So, keep the spark alive. Of course, there is always old-fashioned mate-guarding, or "I beg your pardon, but I'm her boyfriend."

There is so much research in biopsychology and behavioral ecology that is of interest to the general public, that I cannot cover it all here, but if you are interested, I encourage you to seek opportunities to learn about this exciting field here at UMass.

SIGNATURES NEEDED FOR FAIR DISTRICTING

UMass Amherst students have already begun collecting signatures in support of the Fair Districting for Fair Elections ballot initiative (see Collegian article "Mass. Politicians Demand Redistricting," Wednesday, Oct. 5). Endorsements of this ballot question from both the left (Dukakis, Deval Patrick, Tom Reilly) and the right (Romney, Healy, Christy Mihos) show that a fair and open redistricting process in Massachusetts is something both liberals and conservatives can get behind.

The UMass Democrats have collected 50 signatures at the Scarecrow Festival held this past weekend on the Amherst town common and 20 signatures at the Belchertown Fair on Sept. 25. We have been going door-to-door on campus as well.

Seventy signatures is measurable progress, but it is merely a drop in the bucket of the 100,000-120,000 signatures of Massachusetts registered voters that must be collected by Nov. 26 of this year. We have only six weeks left. Help collect signatures as we ramp up our campaign both on and off-campus.

Today in the Commonwealth, the voting precincts look like salamanders and saxophones because incumbent politicians choose the borders of their own districts – essentially choosing the voters they want to face on Election Day. That's not right.

Visit the Web site of Common Cause Massachusetts for more info about the campaign, including the text of the ballot question itself. The plan stipulates the creation of a seven person non-partisan panel which will conduct the redistricting process in an open forum. It will not be in a secret meeting behind closed doors as is the case now and the public would be able to suggest plans for their own districts. The plan also puts a premium on making the districts compact and contiguous and that they lie within municipal boundaries as much as possible.

Some liberals I've talked to don't think this ballot question initiative is worth their time, saying, "Look, Democrats control 88 percent of the Massachusetts State Legislature. There is no problem." Let us not forget that in 2003, Republicans in Texas didn't even wait until the next census to engage in a blatant redistricting power grab — a scandal that prompted some Texas Democratic state legislators to flee to Oklahoma rather than make a quorum. After it was all said and done, the GOP somehow ended up with five more congressional seats in Washington.

Would it make you proud if Democrats did that here, because they have. Former Massachusetts Speaker of the House Tom Finneran was recently indicted for three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice regarding his latest redraw of the legislative map, which the First Circuit Court of Appeals ruled as violating the Voting Rights Act.

This reform results in better and more accountable government, and it's the right thing to do, partisan politics aside. Making government more legitimate and more relevant in the eyes of the public and inducing more electoral participation is fundamentally crucial to democracy. Democrats might lose a few seats in the state legislature, but better to lose them outright than steal them via backdoor redistricting schemes.

Let's take advantage of this fantastic opportunity to really make a difference. Google "Common Cause Massachusetts" for more info about the campaign, including the text of the ballot question itself.

Make way for the <geek in the pink>

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Jason Mraz admits he probably isn't the most talented musician, but in an industry teeming with pre-packaged artists, Mraz knows what he wants, and is determined to get it.

"If I'm not interested in something, I just won't do it," Mraz said in a recent interview with the Daily Collegian.

The "Curbside Prophet" says his sophomore studio release, "Mr. A-Z," which debuted at #5 on the Billboard charts, was very much a well-thought, deliberate process.

"I wanted to try each song five or six times," Mraz said, "I wanted to know I was happy to have the strongest version of each song."

Mraz worked with acclaimed British producer Steve Lillywhite who has made legendary albums for bands like U2, the Dave Matthews Band and the Rolling Stones.

"It was pretty amazing," said Mraz of working with Lillywhite. "He's been making records as long as I've been alive. The guy has so much useful spunk, and he looks like he is 50 years old."

"He was the perfect guy for the job."

Mraz, who turned 28 in June, says he's not done learning about the process of making music.

"I'm not the most practical gifted musician on the scene," he said. "I really only know how to write my own songs, and that's about it."

"Mr. A-Z" was not a departure from Mraz's first studio release, "Waiting for My Rocket to Come," which Mraz says only took about five to six weeks to put together. The 12 track disc chronicles Mraz's life over the period of a year. Each song comes from a personal [illegible] in the singer/songwriter's life, be it his relationships, his friendships or the trouble[illegible] being the "geek in the pink."

"Everything I wrote on both albums comes from [illegible] and honest relationships, personal feelings," Mraz said.

"[illegible] that I write are fictional," he added, "I don't just put out. I just have a hard time [illegible]."

First [illegible] why Mraz felt it was critical [illegible] time in the studio with "Mr. A-Z."

"I wanted to know I was happy to have the strongest version of each song," Mraz said.

The first single off of the new album, a delightful pop-infused ditty titled "Wordplay," is perhaps one of the stronger cuts of the disc. Mraz mocks the very idea of what the stereotypical first single sounds like with his own. Ironic?

However, this song, or any song on the disc for that matter, is not a reflection of the entire album. Mraz stretches his range to the max infusing pop with a cappella, a touch of hip-hop, a dab of 80s pop and a liberal sprinkling of love song.

Lillywhite's presence in Allaire Studios, where the record was recorded, is obvious on the disc. Lillywhite has the keen ability to be able to present the artists, flaws and all. The sounds you hear on "Mr. A-Z" are a much better reflection of the live show that has made a name for Mraz. The artist's talents are emphasized on each track, while the raw emotion of the songs hasn't been polished off.

Mraz began a full tour in support of the album this September in San Diego. The road show will stretch through the United States and wind its way to the United Kingdom in 2006. Mraz has received rave reviews for his live performance in the past, but in an October 2003 article in the Daily Collegian, Mraz said touring was the most difficult part of the occupation.

"Life on the road is a blur," he said. "Whether it's on the bus, plane or a car, you are constantly surrounded by B.O. and B.S., looking [illegible] other than the B.O. and B.S."

[illegible] this time around, ahh, I wish I could [illegible] in bed tonight, those are the [illegible] times," Mraz said.

"[illegible] crew and band with [illegible] on the road super [illegible] a lot of people [illegible] the job done."

University Gallery launches series to celebrate their 30th

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Staff

In celebration of the 30th anniversary of the Fine Arts Center, the University Gallery will be hosting a lecture series featuring past directors and noted artists. Each set of speakers will be giving lectures in retrospect on their past exhibits. "Looking Forward/Looking Back" was conceived by Loretta Yarlow, who has been the University Gallery director since 2004.

The series kicked off last Thursday with sculptor and industrial designer, Allan Wexler, and former director from 1988-2004, Betsy Siersma.

Wexler, now a distinguished artist for more than 30 years, first displayed his one-person exhibition, "Dining Rooms and Furniture for the Typical House," at the University Gallery in 1989. His work has always held a constant theme of the interaction of human activity and functional structures. Wexler's "Crate House," a living space for the 90s generation, was also featured at the university gallery in 1991. This "survival unit" consisted of a collapsed domestic space complete with an array of fully functional, moveable components. Wexler is also the recipient of the 2005 Rome Prize from the American Academy in Rome.

On Oct. 20, the second lecture of the series will take place featuring former director Helaine Posner and artist Judy Pfaff.

Pfaff has always been an artist existing outside the limits of categorization. In her creations she has melded drawing, painting and sculpture. Pfaff has defied conventions by carrying her painting to the third dimension, while at the same time transforming her sculptures into paintings. In 1982, Pfaff's immense work, "Boa," was installed into the entirety of the University's North Gallery. This encompassing work featured an explosion of color, line, shapes and texture. Pfaff has gone on from this exhibit to mount more than 100 solo exhibitions and installations. Her work has also been featured in the collections of the Museum of Modern Art, New York and the Whitney Museum of American Art. Pfaff was also awarded the MacArthur Foundation's "Genius" Fellowship in 2004.

Helaine Posner was the director of the University Gallery from 1984 to 1988. She went on to the position of curator at MIT's List Visual Art Center from 1991-1998. Posner is currently an adjunct curator at the American Federation of Arts in New York.

The last lecture in the series will take place on Nov. 30. This lecture will feature former director Dr. Hugh M. Davies and artist Robert Irwin.

Long Island's, Northern State 'Ignite' the world of hip-hop

By Carey Zigouras
Collegian Staff

At the end of an interview with the hip-hop trio Northern State, Hesta Prynn, Spero and Sprout laugh when talking about what cutting a country album with Neil Young would sound like. This stands as a microcosm for the band's best quality: their lack of fear for experimentation, especially with an unlikely trio. The confluence of Hesta Prynn, Spero and Spout, three white, college educated females from Long Island, Northern State can best be described as the female equivalent of the Beastie Boys. Through their playful and serious rhymes, the girls have mastered the ability to scratch heads in wonder of their musical boldness. Their independent 2002 debut, "Dying in Stereo," and its 2004 follow-up, "All City," released on Columbia Records, generate enough interest for a second listen. However, it was through their opening at the Tegan and Sara show that proved to be the best example of their brightness.

Together, the three musicians of Northern State each bring their own flavor and personal influences to the music. While no one-dimensionality exists in their personalities by any means, the girls each have a distinct style. Hesta Prynn brings the humor and energy of punk rock to the stage show, Spero's women's studies background likely attributed to some of the more politically aggressive lyrics on their albums and Sprout's smooth, mellow stage presence seems to be the grounding of the band. All three have been heavily influenced by old school hip-hop. In response to curiosity regarding why they would choose hip-hop over other musical mediums, Northern State agree that hip-hop beckoned to them as the best way to enter the music scene by combining fun and politics.

"All City" provides a glimpse of the girls' commentary on politics, feminism and standards of beauty. Tracks such as "Speaking for Me" show the serious side of Northern State which encompass these vocal opinions. But other tracks, such as the opening "Ignite" as well as "Girl for All Seasons" belt out playful rhymes in which the girls can be heard laughing themselves. Unfortunately, the difficulty lies in taking the more political tracks seriously. While Northern State acknowledge their aim to ingrate both silliness and gravity, listeners of the album may have a hard time making the switchover and finding the more serious tones convincing and believable. The story differs in concert.

The stage presence felt in the live show far exceeds how affected one would be by listening to their album. All three were involved with activism while attending college and their show seems to be a form of activism in and of itself. As they view the media as a tool for revolution, Northern State also believes their musical existence to be empowering. Northern State lead by example in trying to surprise audiences with something they haven't seen, and in the flesh they entertain. The girls are at their best live, and tend to shine brighter in concept than content, which makes their albums more disappointing and shows appreciated.

Despite the challenges of delving stereotypes, the girls have found working in the music industry to be "more of a blessing than a curse." Thanks to an increase in media attention, Northern State enjoys certain perks, such as talks of working with Ad-Rock from the Beastie Boys. And, although the band acknowledges the difficulty of occasionally encountering a lack of respect, it has pushed them to prove themselves. Spero believes they are "pushing buttons to the limit" and through this attitude they hope to bring something new to hip-hop.

Hesta Prynn, Sprout and Spero grew up in a suburb in Long Island and formed their band because of their mutual love for hip-hop.

As a member of an elite military unit (how original) you are sent to a strange, top secret laboratory (more originality) to rescue one of your comrades. During your rescue mission, you get caught by a bunch of evil scientists who tie you up to a very large machine with rings swirling around it (oh, scary) that separates your spirit from your body. Don't try to think of the science behind this because there is none, it just makes for an interesting concept.

As a wondering spirit, you must "haunt" the lab to try to figure out what is going on and rescue your friend. In this task, you are aided by another spirit in the form of a green little girl. Why she is bland green and you are rainbow colored is beyond me. You, as a spirit, really have one power, and that is that you are able to take over the bodies of humans by scaring them. Inhabiting objects in the environment and figuring out how to frighten the humans around you is how this is done. Does this sound fun? Sure. Did I mention this is a first person shooter? Not so fun anymore, is it?

First person shooters are meant to be fast paced and action packed; sure a puzzle is thrown in there every now and then for good measure, but not every fifteen minutes. In "Geist," once you get used to the awkward control system and start having fun shooting the mindless enemies (there is very little AI to the bad guys in this game, I beat the first boss without moving) you have to get out of the body you are in to inhabit some stupid trashcan. I don't like being a trashcan. If I were a crazy scientist, I would not want people working for me that get scared if trash starts to shake. Wimps.

Here is a good question for paranormal investigators: do ghosts get their health by eating plants? Because that is how they seem to stay healthy in "Geist." Shouldn't ghosts be eating people's brains or something? Whatever the case may be, I still don't understand why weeds seem to be all over the clean and ultra futuristic looking lab/base in "Geist." Oh yeah, I almost forgot, you may be a ghost, but you are still unable to walk through walls and you still need to take the stairs to get somewhere. You also can't jump when you are in human form.

Well, that about sums it up for "Geist." If you see it in the store, keep walking. If you see it at Blockbuster or somewhere similar, keep walking. If you run into it in a back alley, run away.

In "Geist," your character is a ghost, whose spirit is ripped from his body. Your character penetrates the enemy by taking over their bodies.

In this post-"O.C." post-"Garden State" world we live in, indie-pop has stepped out to be the new hip genre. If a band can deliver a semi-thoughtful, catchy tune loaded with harmonies and retro guitars, they are almost guaranteed a spot on a hit Fox show. Like any trend, there is now a glut of indie-popsters, an unavoidable, generic mush of cash-ins and constantly signed-and-tossed-out groups hoping to be the next big thing. The New Pornographers are certainly indie-pop, but they are the trendsetters, not the followers.

Since their 2000 debut, "Mass Romantic," the band has been slowly gaining steam and getting attention for making the kind of songs that sound like they should be top 10 hits but remain outside the mainstream. On their third album, "Twin Cinemas," The New Pornographers continue to expand on their sound while staying unique enough that they would never get confused for the wealth of imitators that have popped up in the last few years.

"These are the Lables" is one of the too-few tracks sung by Neko Case who sounds wounded over its soft guitar strums and strings, but bounces to life as the song explodes into a field of neo-psychedelic sun-shine pop. "Use It" is propelled by a bouncy riff and a stomping drum beat while Carl Newman's sprouts vocals that thrive off of [illegible] quirkiness. "Sing Me Spanish Techno" goes from an automatic riff, with a nice dash of [illegible] Beatles harmonies to a subdued bridge and back perfectly.

The New Pornographers clearly know what they are doing but "Twin Cinemas" is slightly lacking. The songs are all consistently strong but the album feels lacking at times. Only a few songs really reach the level of greatness that the band seems capable of, which makes the moments that are just good a bit of a letdown. However, there is no denying that "Twin Cinemas" is a strong release and that The New Pornographers are a band to keep an eye on. Filled with a lot of really good songs and a few truly outstanding ones, "Twin Cinemas" is necessary for fans of indie-pop, everyone else would be OK waiting until the band releases the masterpiece that they seem to have in them.

The Vancouver indie group, The New Pornographers is made up of nine musicians and vocalists.

reputation in the 1980s for his site-generated works for public places. Irwin often makes use of natural plantings and topographic features in his work, as can be seen at the central garden at the Getty Center in Los Angeles. This incredible undertaking transformed a 134,000 square foot area of land into a hillside garden oasis with over 500 varieties of plants, as well as various architectural elements.

Irwin's contribution to the University Gallery is called, "Natural Light Scrim Piece." This artwork of ephemeral material was installed in 1976 and once traveled to Italy to represent the United States at the Venice Biennale. As part of the 30th anniversary celebration, Irwin's work will be reinstalled in the gallery's entryway.

"Since the Fine Arts Center isn't doing anything to celebrate, we thought, 'my God, we will!' I realized when I came here in 2004 that this was really something to bring to the attention of everyone," says Yarlow. "With this lecture series we are looking forward in terms of passing the torch to the new generation of artists and also looking back at the legacy of the gallery."

The 'Prince' of UMass

...ranger of times, impressed by his blinding speed and potential he expressed interest in having Prince on the soccer team. However, every time Ofosu called Koch he failed to leave any contact information.

"I saw him play and we just kept missing each other," Koch said. "He never left a number, never really left a way for me to get back to him."

"I just didn't think he was really interested in coming here," Koch said laughing.

Prince also recalls the miscommunications between himself and Koch.

"I didn't talk to coach until the week or two before preseason," he said.

Koch recalls finally getting in touch with Ofosu when the incoming freshman called him and said he had just come from Connecticut and wanted to try out for the soccer team.

"I came to one of [the soccer team's] camps and coach invited me to preseason," Ofosu said of finally getting his shot to make the team.

We just didn't make connections," Koch said. "We didn't put two and two together; just a comedy of errors. It all ended up in a good way. We're all happy he's here."

The walk-on wasted little time in impressing the Minutemen coaches. Koch says that in the first five days of preseason he had a feeling Ofosu was going to contribute to his team.

"We knew he was going to help us," Koch said. "Did we think he was going to start a couple of games at this point in the season? No, but after the first five days of the preseason I'm not surprised."

Ofosu also expressed how coming into the season he didn't expect to be where he is right now.

"Before the season I didn't think I was going to play that much," he said. "I thought I was going to be giving Oral [Bullen] a rest for like five minutes in a game."

He earned the starting spot in the line up following Bullen's ankle injury at Hartford.

"We didn't think he'd help us this fast this much," Koch said. "But again, like I said, we're not surprised. It's one of those things where you've got to have opportunities. A couple of guys have been injured up top so he's had the opportunities and he's done very well with the opportunities he's had."

In all he has started five games for the Minutemen, including the past few alongside Bullen, whom Ofosu says he looks up to on the team.

"He's the captain and the same position," Ofosu said. "I look at whatever he does and all the positive things [he does]."

At the halfway point of the 2005 season, Ofosu has proven to be one of the Minutemen's top players. He leads the team with five assists and ranks fourth in points with five. His ability to find the open man has really shown this season.

"I was always a midfielder in high school," Ofosu explained. "I was always the one giving the passes, not the one scoring."

Although he has yet to record his first collegiate goal, rest assured it is bound to happen. Koch believes it will come with some work.

"His finishing is not his strength and he'll be the first to admit that. Just when he gets into the 18-yard box just having that final nose for the goal is something we need to work on," Koch said. "But he's dangerous – flat-out dangerous. His ability to pass the ball has been very good and we're really pleased with that."

Ofosu hopes to help UMass kick its Atlantic 10 conference schedule off on the right foot this Sunday when Rhode Island travels to Amherst to the take on the Minutemen at Rudd Field.

Remember the next time you see that Maroon blur streaking up the soccer field; it isn't Superman wearing a UMass uniform. It's just the Prince of UMass.

UM tennis season underway

By Ben Hodgkins
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts tennis team dropped its first match of the season, falling to St. John's 4-3 in a close contest Wednesday afternoon in New York.

UMass (2-1) swept doubles play, but lost four out of six matches in singles to lose to the Red Storm. The Minutewomen will be back in action on Oct. 11 at home, when they face Williams College in a 3:30 p.m. match-up.

With the match tied 3-3, UMass' Dorothy Iwanowicz had a hard fought match with Mariana Chachua, which lasted over four hours. In the contest, Iwanowicz took a quick lead by winning the first set 6-4, but dropped the second set 6-7. Iwanowicz went ahead 5-2 in the third set before a possible match-deciding event occurred.

With Iwanowicz going for match point, she shot the ball by Chachua. With no referee on hand, the ball was called out by Chachua. Chachua then came back later in the set to defeat Iwanowicz 7-5, and to defeat the Minutewomen 4-3.

Coach Judy Dixon and the UMass players felt the ball was in and that they should have won the match.

"This was an upsetting match," Dixon said. "We played very well. Hopefully this match will make us tougher."

UMass swept all three doubles matches, putting them up 1-0 to go into singles play. Senior Susan Johnson and Iwanowicz defeated Alison Adamski and Chachua 8-3 at No. 1, while junior Michele Spiess and sophomore Masha Pozar beat Natalia Tumsevica and Barbora Blahutiakova in No. 2 doubles, 8-5. In the final doubles match, senior Jana Bartoloni and first-year player Stephanie Gimenez defeated Lauren Lorenzetti and Ashley Harper 8-2.

Singles play was tougher on the Minutewomen, as they won No. 1 and No. 5 singles, but dropped the other four in hard-fought matches.

Spiess (7-0) continued her unbeaten streak in singles play, winning against Tumsevica in three sets. After dropping the first set 4-6, Spiess was able to come back and win the next two, 6-1, 6-3.

"Michele has a lot of heart," Dixon said. "Even when she is not playing her best tennis, she always plays hard."

UMass won only one more match on the afternoon, a 6-3, 6-0 win for Bartoloni (6-1) in the No. 5 match. St. John's won at No. 3, No. 4 and No. 6, tying the match at 3-3.

The No. 3 match saw Pozar (2-2) losing to Blahutiakova 6-2, 1-6, 5-7 while at No. 4 Gimenez (2-3) dropped the match 3-6, 3-6 to Adamski. The Red Storm tied it up 3-3 with Harper beating UMass' Susan Johnson 5-7, 5-7, setting up the match deciding contest between Iwanowicz and Chachua.

The Minutewomen started the 2005 fall season by winning both the singles and doubles titles at the Quinnipiac Invitational. In singles, Michele Spiess defeated Katrina Elder-Bush (6-1, 6-1) of Rutgers, claiming the A title. In doubles, Spiess and Masha Pozar defeated teammates Dorothy Iwanowicz and Susan Johnson (8-5) to win the doubles title. Bartoloni made it to the C final, where she lost to Dana Gordon of Rutgers, 4-6, 7-6 (0-1), 10-4.

On Sept. 28, the Minutewomen defeated Connecticut 7-0, losing only one set the entire day. In doubles play, Spiess and Gimenez defeated Christine Burek and BreAnn Cheung 8-3 at No. 1. The No. 2 match saw Johnson and Iwanowicz defeat UConn's Jaclyn Shapiro and Elizabeth Dibbs 10-8 in a tiebreaker. Bartoloni and first-year player Carly Ludmer won at No. 3 doubles, beating Ashley Petruzzi and Jessica Porter 8-6, too, losing just one set in the No. 6 match. At No. 1 Spiess defeated Burek 6-0, 6-3. Pozar beat Shapiro at No. 2, 7-6 (7-4) and 6-1 and Iwanowicz defeated Porter 6-3, 6-1 in the No. 3 match. In No. 4 play, UConn's Dibbs fell to UMass' Gimenez 6-4, 6-0.

To round out the day, Bartoloni beat Cheung 6-3, 6-4 in the No. 5 singles and in the closest match of the day, UMass' Johnson beat Alison Koch (6-2, 2-6, 6-2) in the sixth singles.

In the Minutewomen's second home match of the season, they defeated Division III Middlebury 6-1. UMass swept singles play, winning all six matches. Spiess won at No. 1 (6-2, 6-3), Pozar at No. 2 (6-1, 6-1) and Iwanowicz won 6-3, 6-2. At No. 4 Gimenez won 6-3, 6-3 and at No. 5 Bartoloni bested her opponent with a 6-3, 6-2 win. The sweep became complete with a 6-3, 6-2 win for Johnson at No. 6.

Doubles saw Middlebury winning two of three matches and earning their one win on the day. Spiess was again a winner, winning with Gimenez at No. 2 doubles (8-1). Iwanowicz and Johnson fell at No.1, 8-5, and Bartoloni and Ludmer got defeated at No. 3.

Three players who have stood out so far this season are Michele Spiess (7-0), Pozar (2-2) and Bartoloni (6-1). Spiess not only has an undefeated season going, but she is also 7-0 in doubles play, teaming up with both Pozar and Gimenez. Spiess has continued where she left off last year, a year in which she earned Atlantic 10 All-Conference honors.

Despite an injury that has been slowing Pozar down, she has come on strong, going 2-2 in singles play and 5-0 in doubles play. Bartoloni has been especially good at No. 5 singles, going 6-1. She is also 3-2 in doubles play.

Minutemen to host the Rams

...little and they'll be coming to play. You can throw the rankings out the window."

Freshman goalkeeper Zach Simmons was back practicing this week but Koch still wasn't sure who he would have in net as of Wednesday. He feels that junior Nick Billman has played very well since filling in for Simmons.

"Billman has done a great job," Koch said. "We've got two really good keepers."

For awhile now Koch has been stressing that his team has been working to where they want and need to be for the A-10 conference schedule. So, the obvious question with the conference schedule beginning in just two days has to be: is the team where Koch wants and needs it to be?

"I think we're farther along than we were two weeks ago," Koch said. "We have a better idea of the people playing and their roles on the team. We still have a couple of things I wish we had down a little bit better. Being realistic it's going to take another couple of games before we get that down."

Those and many more questions should be answered on Sunday afternoon in Amherst.

Rudy looks to slow URI attack

...second on the team in scoring with 14 points on four goals and six assists. Megan, a second-team All-Conference selection last year, ranks in the top 20 in the nation in assists.

While the Kasparek lead the Rams, they are a well-rounded offensive attack with six players with nine points or more. By comparison, UMass' leading scorer Britt Canfield has eight points.

Clearly, tomorrow night's game will feature a contrast in styles, as UMass plays a more defensive style. The Minutewomen have held opponents to a total of 11 goals on the season, a stingy 1.0 goals-per-game average. The game will be decided by which team is more effective at imposing its style of play.

The predicament facing Rudy is that he is unsure of which approach he wants to take.

During the three-game losing steak, UMass played excellent defense, allowing only four goals, but struggled offensively, scoring only two goals.

This weekend he opened things up a bit and while there wasn't a scoring outburst, the Minutewomen were able to net enough goals to get two wins.

"That's the ongoing dilemma right now," Rudy said. "Do we keep it tight and hope for a goal or two? Or do we attack because we've had some success recently? I hope to come up with a way to do both."

One thing Rudy is sure he will not be able to do is employ the 3-4-3 formation he used last weekend.

"We used that to generate more of an attack and move some people forward," Rudy said. "Both of the teams last weekend used a sweeper and we wanted to make the sweeper mark up man-to-man. We won't be facing a sweeper this weekend. URI plays a flat-back, with four in the back. We're just going to have to find a way to get through it."

Junior goalkeeper Kristin Walker has recorded shutouts in each of UMass' five wins. Walker has held opponents to 11 goals in 11 games.

Shea's squad ready for A-10 play

FIELD HOCKEY from page 8

...with five on the season. Taylor is also fourth in the A-10 in points with 14. The Spiders have shown great defense and goaltending this season, as well, leading the A-10 in shutouts with three, and having the least number of goals allowed with 19.

Shea knows that her team's execution has to be increased and that they must limit Richmond's scoring chances in order to be successful.

"We have to stop Richmond up high," Shea said. "We have to limit their penetrating opportunities and we have to increase ours. We have to make sure that we get either a goal or a penalty corner when we get down in that offensive scoring circle."

The Minutewomen will continue conference play when they face-off against the St. Louis Billikens (4-7) on Sunday at 2 p.m. at the Anheuser-Busch Center in St. Louis, Mo. St. Louis is currently in its first year in the A-10 conference, as they are a former member of the NorPac (Northern Pacific) conference. The Billikens are coming off of a 3-1 win over Missouri State, and will play their first ever A-10 game on Friday against Rhode Island.

The Minutewomen will have to watch the Billikens' sophomore Kristin Lueders, who is the team's scoring leader with 12 points on the season. Lueders is also fourth in the A-10 in goals with five.

The Billikens have struggled in the offensive circle this season, as they have the least amount of penalty corners in the A-10 with 39.

The Minutewomen will need to bring their "A" game if they want to get back to the A-10 tournament, which will be held in Philadelphia, Pa. at the end of the regular season.

Coach Shea believes it will take at least five conference wins in order to get back to the tournament, but knows that the fate of her team is now in the players' hands.

"The players have control of it," Shea said. "And with everything wide open, we have to take care of one game at a time. We have to be mentally tough to play 70 minutes, and in conference play, you have got to play the full game. If you don't, the one let-down that you have could make or break your season."

Fans not convinced curse is over

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — When Red Sox fan Tim Golding, of Providence, R.I., sits down to watch Friday's playoff game, you can bet he'll be wearing the lucky rubber bracelet his daughter gave him, which bears the team's name.

Will Daley will be drinking a Rolling Rock, the same beer he was drinking Sunday when the Sox beat the New York Yankees to clinch a playoff berth.

And Tom Vendetta will be careful not to change the channel on his TV, unless he switches the station back twice.

"Usually something goes bad if I switch it once," said Vendetta, of South Windsor, Conn. "It's a habit I have. It usually seems to change their luck a bit."

For the Red Sox faithful, old habits die hard — even with last year's World Series win under their belt.

Now, with the team trailing the Chicago White Sox in the American League Division Series and facing possible elimination on Friday, those old superstitions — and doubts — are back.

"I think the 86 years is just not a memory that goes away very easily," said Margaret Laragy, 24, of Boston.

"Even though they won last year, you can never count out the Red Sox for disappointing you," she said. "They just have a knack for breaking your heart."

Red Sox fans are historically a pessimistic bunch.

Their torment started in 1919, when slugger Babe Ruth was sold to the Yankees. Boston didn't win another championship until last year, suffering some of the most painful defeats in sports history along the way.

In between, their archrivals, the Yankees, won 26 titles.

"For 86 years we were tortured. It just killed me," said Chris Nugent, 25, of Sudbury. "They had always gotten so close and it never happened. Last year doesn't erase all that pain."

But it does make believers out of dreamers.

"Now we know they can do it," said Laragy, who wore a No. 34 David Ortiz jersey as she watched the first game of the division series earlier this week. "So now we want them to do it again."

The Red Sox have not repeated as World Series champions since 1915-16.

Chris Maksymiw, 23, of Boston, said last year's success means Red Sox fans are now just like everyone else.

"For the longest time, we were that team that hadn't won in 86 years," he said. "But now we're just like every team and every fan wants their team to win."

Since the Sox swept the St. Louis Cardinals last year, sales of official Red Sox gear has gone up. The Red Sox also led the league in road game attendance during the regular season, said Howard Smith, Major League Baseball Properties' vice president for consumer products.

"Last year's World Series has vaulted the Red Sox to a marketing level no one has sniffed other than the Yankees," Smith said.

He said Boston used to be a little franchise that did well in its region, but now it's a worldwide brand name.

Rick Delaney, of Ellington, Conn., wants to keep the momentum.

He and his wife rearranged the furniture in their home to the same configuration as last fall.

Fast track to UM for Ofosu

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

It was Robert Frost who wrote that taking the road less traveled makes all the difference. That's just the road freshman Prince Ofosu took to play on the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

Ofosu was born in Ghana, a small country on the west coast of Africa. Off the soccer field he's very soft-spoken and reserved. When he laces those cleats up, however, it seems like he turns into a whole different person. He's constantly going after the ball and always frustrating defenders with his tenacity and quick feet.

In 1999, when Prince was 12-years-old, his parents moved him and his family to Worcester. Ofosu says the transition from Africa to the United States didn't bother him.

"It wasn't bad," he said. "I got used to it."

He then attended South High Community School in Worcester where he excelled in track and field as well as soccer. When you see him on the soccer field, it's no wonder he was a track star in high school.

His lightning-quick speed puts him at an advantage over just about everybody who tries to cover him. UMass coach Sam Koch says it's definitely one of his main strengths.

"He's faster than I am," Koch joked. "And that's really fast."

While at South High, Ofosu was named to the Central Massachusetts All-Star team as a junior and as a senior. He was also named to the All New England squad. Be it that he's a Division I soccer player, you'd probably think he gained these achievements by scoring goals on the soccer field. But he didn't.

He was actually named a track All-Star and was on the All New England Squad for track, not soccer. Fast is an understatement. He has posted times of 10.8 seconds and 22.3 seconds in the 100 meter and 200 meter dashes, respectively.

KAREN ENGBERG/STAFF

Freshman midfielder Prince Ofosu, who is originally from Ghana, has made an impact since arriving at U.Mass. Ofosu leads the Minutemen with five assists.

Those ridiculous numbers have the makings of another Michael Johnson (the U.S. sprinter who won two gold medals at the 1996 Summer Olympics in Atlanta and the 2000 games in Sydney).

To give you some perspective as to just how fast Ofosu is, Johnson's career best in the 200m is 19.32 seconds. That's just three seconds faster than Ofosu's, and he was in high school.

You could say he's faster than a speeding bullet.

After he graduated from South High, it was a dream of Ofosu's to attend UMass.

"I wanted to come here since my sophomore year in high school," he said. "I had seen [the soccer team] play a couple of times and I have a lot of friends out here."

Getting into UMass seemed to be the easy part for Ofosu. Getting in touch with Koch was a whole lot harder.

A-10 play opens

After a full week off for preparation, the Massachusetts men's soccer team (4-6) is set to play its biggest game of the year thus far. On Sunday, the Minutemen will open their Atlantic 10 conference schedule against Rhode Island (4-5-1) at Rudd Field.

This weekend the Maroon and White will try to post back-to-back victories for just the second time this season. The Minutemen have yet to follow a victory with another since they defeated Cornell and Navy on Sept. 16 and 18.

Sunday marks the 47th time that UMass and URI have faced each other. The Rams hold the advantage with a 25-18-4 record. The Minutemen haven't gotten a win in the series since the 2000 season.

The past two seasons have seen the Minutemen knocked out of the A-10 Tournament by these same Rams. Last season it was a 2-0 defeat, and in 2003 they were also shut out by a score of 3-0.

In that game, a season ago, the Minutemen outshot the Rams 8-2 in the first half, but were unable to sneak anything by the goalkeeper. URI, however, came out of halftime firing away as they took the shot advantage away from UMass 12-4 in the second half.

UMass coach Sam Koch commented on the magnitude of this game and the rivalry that exists between the two schools.

"[The game] is huge," Koch said. "It sets the tone, it's the opening game. The rivalry between Rhode Island and us has always been high, and there's no love lost between the two teams. It's going to be fun and I think we're all looking forward to it."

The Minutemen and the Rams see a lot of each other as the conference schedule kicks into full swing. The two schools are traveling partners in the A-10, so they play a lot of the same away games right after one another and frequently pass each other in the airports.

On Sunday it will have been eight days since the Maroon and White saw action on a soccer field. Koch was convinced that the long lay off between games will benefit his team.

"We were able to focus on one thing and that's Rhode Island," Koch said. "We were able to work on a few things that we haven't been able to work on because we've had so many games. When you play on a Sunday and you play again on Tuesday, or you play again on Wednesday you have one day of recovery and one day of preparation."

"We haven't been able to do a lot," he added. "So we've only had a few good practice sessions in the past few weeks because that's just the way the schedule is."

The Minutemen are coming off of a big 2-0 blanking of Siena that helped them break out of their three-game losing streak. Sophomores Kenny Cook and Matty Lemire scored goals for UMass.

Koch knows that URI will be much more of a challenge than the Saints were.

"For the first time I think we really controlled the middle of the field with our two freshman midfielders," he said. "It's not going to be as easy on Sunday against Rhode Island. The ball control of the Rhode Island team is going to be better than Siena."

URI is fresh off an overtime victory of Harvard on Oct. 4. Junior Jeffery Gonsalves was able to score the winning goal for the Rams at the 95:49 mark in overtime.

Gonsalves also poses the biggest threat to the Minutemen. The Ontario, Canada native leads the Rams in just about every offensive category. He sets the pace in goals (seven), assists (three), points (17), shots (24) and shots on goal (12).

"They're big, strong and fast," Koch said of Gonsalves and the rest of the Rams. "It's going to be a 90 minute

URI poses challenge

What does the Massachusetts women's soccer team get as a reward for its most productive weekend of the season? A meeting with Rhode Island, one of the top teams in the Atlantic 10.

Sophomore forward Vanessa Lima has two goals this season for UMass. Lima's four points are tied for fourth on the team.

UMass (5-5-1 2-0-0 A-10) opened A-10 play last weekend with two wins at home, beating Fordham 1-0 on Friday and cruising past St. Bonaventure 2-0 on Sunday.

While UMass coach Jim Rudy is happy that his squad snapped a season-long three-game losing streak, and began the conference season on a high note, he is well aware that the road does not get any easier when they travel to the URI Soccer Complex in Kingston, R.I. tomorrow night at 7 p.m. to face the Rams.

"Rhode Island plays a very unique system," Rudy said. "They have some very good players up front that can hurt us."

Rhode Island's 6-4-1 record (2-0-0 A-10) is a bit misleading, as the Rams lost their first four games of the season against top-notch opponents, and have dominated ever since.

URI lost those first four games, including a game to No. 5 Virginia, by a combined score of 15-0. Since that slow start, the Rams have outscored their opponents 31-6, and have racked up some huge numbers in the scoring department.

The most dangerous player for Rhode Island is senior forward/midfielder Melanie Kasparek. Kasparek, a first-team All-Conference selection last year, has 22 points on nine goals and four assists this season, good for 11th in the nation in scoring.

"She's a very good player," Rudy said. "She's their leading scorer and is a very good one-on-one player."

Kasparek is not the only high scoring player URI features. In fact, she's not even the only high scoring Kasparek on the team.

Melanie's sister, Megan, is

There are turnarounds, and then there are turnarounds like the one the Rhode Island women's soccer team has had this year.

Think the Massachusetts women's soccer team regaining a .500 record (5-5-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) in one weekend is something?

UMass' opponent on Saturday, the Rhode Island Rams, are ranked No. 6 in the northeast region after playing to a 0-0 tie with Harvard on Wednesday. The Rams (6-4-1 2-0 A-10) haven't lost since Sept. 4, when they got handled 3-0 by the Auburn Tigers. That loss put URI at 0-4 on the season — and even worse, they had yet to score a goal.

Since that moment in time, they've gone 6-0-1, outscoring opponents 31-6 for an average of just under five goals a game. Simply put, minus their tie with Harvard, they've been tearing opponents apart with a high-powered offense that is choking the defenses.

The Rams feature a number of dynamic scorers, and first-year head coach Zac Shaw is finding a nifty way to distribute his scorers. Led by team points leader Melanie Kasperek (nine goals and four assists for 22 points) and her sister Megan (4-6-14), URI's scoring pool comes from a group of six forward/midfielders that know how to score, and score often.

Between the Kasparek sisters, Dora Larusdottir, Rebecca Fish, Thorunn Jonsdottir and Debra Nelson, the six have accounted for 27 of the Rams' 31 goals, 23 of their 26 assists and 78 percent of all their shots. They average 14 shots a game to UMass' 12, with a .391 shot-on-goal percentage, compared to UM's .500. Not to mention four of them, including the Kasparek sisters, rank in double-digits in points (Larusdottir 12, Fish 11).

They also employ a confusing formation, which the forwards and midfielders have done a good job of disguising to opponents. Is it a 4-3-1-2? A 4-4-2? Maybe a 4-3-3? What is for certain is they play four flat backs, and a heck of an offense.

Not to be forgotten is the team's speed, either. In the last installment of this longstanding rivalry, a 4-1 win by URI in September 2004, Nelson and Jonsdottir made a habit out of blowing by the Minutewomen's last line of defense. That doesn't look to change this year, granted the two are just coming into their own this season — as sophomores.

"It's going to be tough, we're going to have to be ready to play" UMass assistant coach Angela Napoli said. "I'd say they're going to be the strongest A-10 team so far."

You can say that again.

So what does that leave for the Minutewomen, who are just starting to get comfortable in their new 3-4-3 formation and just starting to come into their own? Defenders Stephanie Barrett, Tina Rodriguez and Amy Maffucci will have their hands full against so many dynamic players.

Is another change imminent?

"We're going to have to look at making adjustments," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "Their style of play is very much different from anything else we've played against."

Conference season starts up

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

It is finally here, the time of year that the Massachusetts field hockey team thrives on. It is the beginning of Atlantic 10 conference play, and for some teams, the beginning of a new season.

The Minutewomen will try to start their "new season" off on the right foot, as they will open up conference play against the No. 20 Richmond Spiders (5-5) today at 3 p.m. at Crenshaw Field in Richmond, Va.

Coach Patty Shea believes that this weekend's conference play will be a new beginning for the Minutewomen.

"This is the season, right now," Shea said. "You can throw the schedules out. You can throw the stats out. This is about who executes their skills and their game-plans the best. This is the conference. This is the bread and butter."

UMass is on a four-game losing streak after a disappointing 2-0 loss to Syracuse last Friday. The Minutewomen will have their hands full against a Richmond team that has dominated A-10 opponents in the past. The Spiders have not lost an A-10 regular season game since 2001, and they lead the all-time series against UMass with a 5-3 record.

Richmond has won the last five contests against UMass, including the A-10 championship at Garber Field last year, but the Minutewomen know that if they execute their game-plan and play up to their potential, then they will have positive results.

"I think we have a really good chance to win as long as the team can come together and play hard," senior Katelyn Woolfrey said. "It comes down to how bad you want it because there's always an opportunity in conference play where anything can happen, everyone has a clean record again."

Richmond is coming off of a 4-2 loss to No. 1 Wake Forest on Sunday, and is currently on a three-game losing streak. Those three losses, however, all came against nationally ranked teams.

The Minutewomen will have to watch out for Richmond sophomore Shannon Taylor, who is the Spiders' leading goal scorer

UMass heads to Franklin Park

By Joey White
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's cross country team is coming off a disappointing finish last weekend at the Paul Short Invitational, but is very confident about the New England Championships this Saturday at Franklin Park in Boston.

The meet will feature schools from all divisions. Last year the Minutewomen had an impressive showing as they finished 11th out of 45 teams.

"We're at a different mindset from last year," UMass coach Julie LeFreniere said.

LeFreniere has been very pleased with this week's practices, as she saw a huge improvement.

"There was too much time between [the second through fifth runners] last weekend," LeFreniere said. "[We] need to keep them running together."

Everybody stepped it up this week, the core (two to five runners) were only 45-50 seconds apart. LeFreniere's six and seven runners were also catching up to the top five.

"We are a very young team and still have long ways to go to develop," LeFreniere said. "But we're ready to take the next step."

Overall, the Minutewomen were unsatisfied with their performance last weekend, but junior Erin O'Donnell had her personal best as she was Maroon and White's second-place runner for the first time.

"Personally I was satisfied," O'Donnell said. "Longer distances are my strength."

O'Donnell, a junior from Reading, Mass., ran the Franklin Park course many times in high school and knows it very well.

"I ran there almost every day in high school for big meets; at least a dozen times," O'Donnell said.

O'Donnell sees that her teammates are developing as runners and are becoming more confident.

"Being confident is the only way you can get through a race," O'Donnell said.

The Franklin Park course is one of the most historic cross country venues in the country and some of the world's best runners have competed there. It is a well-manicured course as it is adjacent to the Franklin Park Golf Course. The toughest part of the course is a rocky hill known as "Bear Cage Hill" because it was once home to the bears of the Franklin Park Zoo, but other than that it is a fast and relatively flat course.

The Massachusetts men's cross country team will also compete at Franklin Park this weekend. The Minutemen are also coming off of a disappointing showing last weekend.

In the New England Championships last year, the Minutemen placed 21st out of 48 teams.

"We hope to finish better [this year]," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "Last year we came away unhappy."

Last week O'Brien said he exercised judgment and had his runners go out cautiously, but this week he wants them to go out a little faster. He also added that he was satisfied with the way his runners handled the pressure in their first big meet.

"I've started to look towards the strength of team," O'Brien said. "We're closer to the second half of the season and so now we want to sprinkle in quality."

O'Brien started to work on efficiency of the runners this week in practice as they build up toward the A-10 Championship at the end of the month, which will be their smallest meet left, as it consists of only 14 teams.

Last week the Maroon and White had its best split and times of the season, but O'Brien said that it's not about times, it's about points.

"I'd rather have us run slow and finish high than running fast and finishing low," O'Brien said.

UMass program promotes pedestrian safety

By Christina Baron
Collegian Correspondent

Officials at the University of Massachusetts are launching a semester-long pedestrian safety program designed to increase awareness of state pedestrian laws and enforce these laws in order to make the roads surrounding campus safer.

Backed-up traffic on Massachusetts Ave. and other main roads, as well as numerous accidents caused by non-compliant drivers or jaywalkers, led the UMass Police Department, the Massachusetts Traffic Safety Research Program (MassSAFE), and the department of civil and environmental engineering through the UMass Transportation Center to come together to educate the UMass population, about 11,000 residents, on the importance of pedestrian safety.

This collaboration, called "Cross Safely, Drive Safely," is funded by a $75,000 grant from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. An initial education period will begin this week with posters at most intersections and in the dorms and flyers distributed throughout campus, outlining the responsibilities of drivers and pedestrians. According to the posters, Massachusetts law requires drivers to yield to pedestrians in crosswalks and at intersections where they have a "walk signal" and for pedestrians to use the crosswalks.

The plan also includes $8,000 or 175 hours of overtime patrols by UMass police who will act as decoy pedestrians to test driver compliance in crosswalks and even to stop drivers to remind them of the rules, said Sergeant Black, the officer in charge of assigning the overtime.

The UMass police department will also send out a campus-wide email through the Office of Student Affairs to remind students and faculty of the rules of pedestrian safety. Towards the end of the month, the police department will switch its focus to the enforcement of pedestrian safety laws, said Black. Using extra plain-clothed officers and patrol cars around high foot-traffic areas, the department plans to stop any non-compliant motorist and, at the discretion of the officer, these drivers could be given a $200 fine, the penalty for not yielding at a crosswalk.

A couple rushes across a busy street in Miami as cars slow down to yield. Planners from Miami-Dade are looking to increase safety as accidents between pedestrians and automobiles are on the rise. Similar concerns prompted a UMass pedestrian safety program.

Flooding in N.H. causes loss of lives

By David Tirrel-Wysocki

ALSTEAD, N.H. — Prolonged, heavy rain caused flooding from North Carolina to New Hampshire over the weekend, forcing hundreds of people to evacuate, knocking out electricity, weakening dams and making roads impassable.

At least seven people died, including two young people killed in New Hampshire when a car apparently drove off a washed-out bridge into flood waters, officials said. At least one other person was seen being swept away in a swift-flowing river.

Gov. John Lynch returned from Europe to take charge of relief efforts in New Hampshire. He declared a state of emergency and called in 500 National Guard members for assistance.

"This is the worst damage they've seen from flooding in 25 years in New Hampshire," the governor said Sunday night.

By Monday, the floodwaters were receding in some areas. With rain in the forecast for the next several days, the National Weather Service warned that dams could fail or overflow. A surge over Warren Lake dam in Alstead, N.H., sent a 4- or 5-foot wall of water downstream during the weekend, damaging at least a half dozen bridges and washing away several homes.

The two New Hampshire residents who died in the car were identified as Steven Day, of Unity, and Ashley Gate, of Claremont, both 20, state police said.

Student beaten at Hampshire

An 18-year-old Hampshire College student was treated at the Cooley Dickinson Hospital on Friday after he was severely beaten in his dorm room, according to Amherst police.

Salvador Perez, 23, of Dumont, N.J. was arrested at the Greenwich housing unit on campus in connection with the beating.

Police say the male victim awoke to find Perez standing in his room. Perez allegedly struck the victim repeatedly with a metal flashlight. He then strangled the victim with a nylon cord until he lost consciousness, police said.

The victim was treated and released early Friday morning at Cooley Dickinson Hospital for neck and head injuries, as well as for lacerations he suffered during the struggle.

Perez is not a Hampshire College student.

Perez was arraigned Friday morning at Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley on a list of charges, which included assault with the intent to murder, domestic assault and battery and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (metal flashlight). He pleaded not guilty to all charges.

Police would not release the victim's identity, but did say he was alone when the attack occurred.

Police would also not name the housing unit where the attack took place.

Perez is currently held on $25,000 cash bail.

Congress considers illegal file sharing in dorms

By Alexandra Aaron
U-Wire (DC Bureau)

WASHINGTON — Tougher measures against illegal file sharing are on their way to college campuses, according to speakers at a September congressional hearing on movie and music piracy.

The hearings, which included representatives from the University of Florida, the University of Texas and the Motion Picture Association of America, discussed new technology that could enable colleges to control how students share copyrighted material.

"College campuses today harbor some of the swiftest computer networks in the country and that, unfortunately, has led to a situation where a significant level of piracy is taking place around the clock at our nation's campuses," said Richard Taylor, senior vice president of Motion Picture Association of America, in a statement to the House courts, Internet and intellectual property subcommittee. The University of Florida's "Icarus" program is among the technologies being discussed. The program limits the size of files students can share and prohibits use of unapproved file-sharing applications in university dormitories.

Subcommittee Chairman Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, said he is pleased with the University of Florida's answer to the piracy issue.

"The recent hearing was an opportunity to learn why some universities have clearly stepped up to the plate of educating their students, while others have not. The Subcommittee will continue to hold hearings on [illegal file sharing] to monitor progress and to update Congress on what still needs to be done," he said. But many students are not thrilled with the sudden move to curb free music and movie downloads.

"It's ridiculous to ban [file sharing]," said New York University sophomore Jessica Bhargava. "I'm paying $45,000 a year to go to college and I'm a struggling artist, so if there's free music or movies out there, I'm going to take it."

Sales of compact discs have dropped over the last three years because of both legal and illegal downloading of music, according to the Web site of the Recording Industry Association of America.

David Dye and Mike Lazzaro, fifth freshmen at Washington University, listen to Sarah Kays talk about the benefits of "peer-topeer" networking. This network is one of many used by college students to share illegal music downloads.

Women's rights lecture given

By Melissa Poulin
Collegian Staff

Lucy Hartry, Director of Administrative Services at Tapestry Health Services, said Thursday that women's reproductive rights are facing a climate issue with several barriers for women who need reproductive information. Women lack accessibility to information about abortion, contraception or other reproductive counseling, such as a lack of facilities, funds, and support, Hartry said.

Hartry was one of four speakers in a panel presentation hosted by the Everywoman's Center at University of Massachusetts. She was joined by Hampshire College Visiting Assistant Professor Stephanie Levin, Azi Shariatmadar, Alumni Fellow of the Civil Liberties and Public Policy Program, and Amanda Collings, Health Educator and Director of the Women's Health Project at UMass.

The discussion focused on the future of reproductive rights and how the new appointments to the Supreme Court could affect these rights. One concern addressed by the panel was the potential overturning of Supreme Court case Roe v. Wade. This case, decided in 1973, stated that a woman's right to an abortion is within her right to privacy.

"Reproductive rights have become synonymous with the right to choose," said Collings. However, the topic is even broader than that, Collings said, citing the problem of violence against abortion clinic workers and the high costs of abortion procedures that are not covered under many insurance plans.

Much of the state legislature passed on abortion rights is "chipping away" at the Roe v. Wade decision, Collings said. Professor Levin spoke about the upcoming Supreme Court case Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England. This case will decide if New Hampshire legislature that requires minors to have parental consent for abortion is constitutional. New Hampshire law does have a judicial bypass in which a minor can present her case before a judge rather than ask for a parent's consent for abortion.

Professor Levin said that there must be this judicial bypass, and she predicts that the Supreme Court, under new Chief Justice Roberts, will uphold the legislature and the decisions of the lower courts.

Shariatmadar said that the potential overturning of Roe v. Wade is a concern, but that "this is one moment in time." She said that the anti-abortion movement has been more successful than the abortion rights movement in recent years because they started at a grassroots level and built up a following.

"They're winning because they have out-organized us," Shariatmadar said.

Linda Forman, a UMass student involved with VOX, an anti-abortion grassroots group on campus, said that the discussion went well. "The panel articulated the information that we try to implement," she said. "If Roe v. Wade is overturned, people will be energized," Collings said, adding that the abortion rights movement will be mobilized. The Supreme Court is just one arena of struggle for women's reproductive rights. According to Levin, women must look in another crucial place: the state legislators.

Google raises concerns

By Catie Coleman
The Post (Ohio U.)

ATHENS, Ohio — A new computer program that allows users to view world images through a satellite has several nations worried about possible security risks, but there's not much they can do to stop it.

Google Earth, available for download at http://earth.google.com, provides accurate and detailed images of the entire world. The resolution is not uniform across all the areas of the world, but the program provides close-ups of many major metropolitan centers. Users can even zoom in close enough to count the cars in various parking lots.

Several nations — including the United States – are worried that the program endangers their national security and opens them up to terrorist attacks.

Though Google Earth does not allow users to view sensitive U.S. locations, such as the White House, it does not censor other nation's state buildings or military bases, and it includes images of nuclear reactors. Despite their concerns, there is not much countries can do to stop the program, said Harold Molineu, professor of political science at OU.

Worried nations could try to block access to Google Earth within their borders or attempt to get the U.N. to pass a resolution governing the program. However, those measures probably would not prove very effective, said John Gilliom, a political science professor at Ohio University.

"It's an issue of the First Amendment, and this is considered to be free speech," he said.

Probably the only thing that would effectively censor this material would be to ask Google Earth to voluntarily comply, Molineau said.

"They can appeal to Google's good conscience about the matter," he said.

Many countries already had access to world images through use of their own satellites, Gilliom said, but the fact that rogue states and individuals now can obtain this information is a huge change.

The technology behind Google Earth is advancing every day, and the issues of international security only will get worse. The resolution of the images will increase, as will the rate at which the pictures are updated.

Chocolate shows possible health benefits

By Tracey Apperson
The Reflector (Mississippi State U.)

Genna Staudacher, Nichole Hanson and Carissa Wood dip and decortate truffles at Legacy Chocolates in Menomonie, Wisconsin.

MISSISSIPPI STATE, Miss. — Baron Justus von Liebig, a German chemist in the 1800s, once said, "Chocolate is a perfect food, as wholesome as it is delicious, a beneficent restorer of exhausted power." Although these words were spoken 200 years ago, they are surprisingly accurate. Again and again, recent studies are proving the many and varied health benefits of chocolate.

Hundreds of years ago, Europeans may not have had scientific proof of chocolate's nutrients, but they realized its health value. As early as the late 16th century, people began using chocolate medicinally. Many people believed it cured illnesses such as fever or tuberculosis. By the 17th century, chocolate was considered an extravagance that only the nobility could afford. In modern times, candy bars and high-fat snacks containing chocolate have given it a reputation as an unhealthy indulgence. Chocolate in itself, though, is by no means bad for you. In fact, if taken in moderation, it may actually improve your health.

I realize some of you are probably eyeing this article skeptically. All your life, you have heard about chocolate's negative effects: it gives you cavities, it causes acne, it makes you fat. I am not encouraging excessive consumption of the sweet; however, it has some scientifically proven health benefits.

The healthiest kinds of chocolate are those composed of at least 30 percent chocolate solids, also known as cocoa. The healthiest forms of chocolate are dark chocolate and hot cocoa. Dark chocolate is more beneficial because it has the highest cocoa levels; it has a higher concentration of chocolate solids, sometimes amounting to 70 percent. Also, dark chocolate contains more flavonoids than other types of chocolate. Flavonoids are antioxidants that work to prevent cancer and to maintain a healthy heart. Chocolate contains over 300 chemicals, including potassium, iron, calcium and a plethora of vitamins. Also, it is the best natural source of magnesium, which contributes to preventing hypertension, heart disease, diabetes, joint problems and PMS.

Flavonoids are substantially effective in protecting cardiac health. They inhibit artery damage by consuming destructive free radicals, which attack human cells. They also slow down platelet aggregation, which is a potential factor in heart attacks and strokes. An especially potent flavonoid is epicatechin. A study done by University of San Francisco researchers indicated that this chemical, which is most concentrated in dark chocolate, significantly improved subjects' blood flow.

Another area that chocolate can improve is cholesterol. One-third of the fat in chocolate comes from oleic acid. This is monounsaturated, a healthier type of fat. Another one-third of chocolate's fat comes from stearic acid. This is a saturated fat; however, it does not raise bad (LDL) cholesterol levels. Instead, the liver converts stearic acid into oleic acid.

Studies have also shown that dark chocolate can increase good (HDL) cholesterol by up to 10 percent. Other areas that chocolate aids include lowered blood pressure, cancer prevention and mental health.

A study done by researchers at University of L'Aquila in Italy found that eating 100 grams of dark chocolate per day for 15 days lowered subjects' blood pressure. Antioxidants aid in inhibiting cancer; chocolate has more of those than either red wine or green tea. Chocolate's mental benefit is happiness. Eating chocolate releases serotonin into your brain; this is an anti-depressant that makes a person feel elated. Also, chocolate liberates endorphins. And if you have watched "Legally Blonde," then you know that endorphins make you happy.

This is not a license to gorge on chocolate. Moderation is the key. Candy bars still have high levels of saturated fat and calories, so be careful. Check the nutrition content of what you choose, and eat responsibly.

Plant may help alleviate world hunger

By Stephen Law
Daily Evergreen (Washington State U.)

PULLMAN, Wash. — Two Washington State University researchers have discovered a process that could help alleviate hunger problems in the world. Professor B.W. Poovaiah and Associate Researcher Liqun Du were able to control the size of a plant by removing a gene for calcium. Instead of growing bigger, the plants devote more energy to producing seeds and fruit.

"I've worked here since 1975, when virtually nothing was known about the calcium messenger system in plants," Poovaiah said.

The research also shows that these plants adapt better to their environment by adjusting to water, stress, light, temperature and other factors, Poovaiah said.

Their results were recently published in the science journal "Nature."

"When research appears in 'Nature,' it's a kind of benchmark because it's a top-tier science publication," said Dennis Brown, information specialist at the College of Agricultural, Human and Natural Resource Sciences.

Poovaiah and Du received most of their funding from the National Science Foundation, as well as the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

They also received funding from NASA, which is interested in the potential for dwarf plants to provide oxygen and food during long missions, Poovaiah said.

Since the research took place in a WSU laboratory, the university is applying for a patent for the process.

"WSU has worldwide recognition for plant research," Poovaiah said.

Molecular engineering has received a lot of attention in recent years because of tremendous breakthroughs in the field.

Poovaiah said advances in computer technology have made this possible.

"Everything has to be compared on the computer," he said.

Critics of molecular engineering have said caution should be taken when experimenting with nature.

"We have to look at the positive and negative consequences of gene alteration," said Steve Butrus, a senior mechanical engineering major. "We can't jump into this new world carelessly."

Poovaiah and Du agree that precautions must be taken with new technology, but said they also believe the potential for good is tremendous.

"Our job at a major research university is to sort it out, then exploit what is good for the human race," Poovaiah said.

Flooding in N.H.

The body of an unidentified man was spotted from the air in a cornfield near a river in Langton and his death appeared to be flood-related, authorities said. And a kayaker on New Hampshire's North Branch River was feared dead after he was washed away while clinging to a tree as rescue workers tried to reach him.

In Hoosick Falls, N.Y., 6-year-old Michael Hackett slipped into the rain-swollen Hoosick River on Sunday. His mother's boyfriend, 39-year-old Robert Scanlon, dove in to save him, and witnesses watched helplessly as the two bobbed in the swift-moving rapids before being swept under a bridge and disappearing. Their bodies were found Monday morning.

In Pennsylvania, state police said Tiffany Wieand, 19, of Milford Township died Saturday when she tried to drive through a flooded roadway, while in New Jersey, 2-year-old Shane Belluardo of Tobyhanna, Pa., died from head injuries Saturday after his parents' car went out of control on a highway in Knowlton.

Flood waters from the Ramapo River caused officials in New Jersey's Bergen County to evacuate about 30 residents Saturday night and early Sunday. Mayor John Szabo said. Rain also knocked out electricity to as many as 6,000 customers across the state. In Vermont, more than 200 people, including residents of a Brattleboro senior citizen home, were evacuated Saturday night.

The National Weather Service reported that more than 5 inches of rain fell in Wilmington, N.C., on Saturday. North Carolina's Brunswick and Pender counties saw between 7 and 10 inches of rain in four days. Allentown, Pa., received 10 inches between Friday and Saturday. Rainfall also totaled 10 inches in parts of Connecticut.

"They didn't predict this much rain," said Joan Kinney, mayor of Boiling Spring Lakes, N.C., which unofficially measured more than 15 inches. "It took us all by surprise." Rivers and creeks in North Carolina were already high from Hurricane Ophelia last month. The state's Department of Transportation reported 41 roads closed.

The most severe flooding in New Hampshire was in and around Keene, where some major roads were under as much as 4 to 6 feet of water. fire officials said. The city had no electricity and was awash in the sounds of generators and pumps Monday when the governor visited.

Wal-Mart applies for proposed bank

By Justin Thomson
The Post (Ohio U.)

ATHENS, Ohio — America's largest and much-maligned retailer might soon be opening a bank.

The Wal-Mart Corporation filed an application in August with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to open a bank in Salt Lake City. A representative from the FDIC said the process takes between 200 and 300 days.

With the application still pending, the retail giant is facing opposition from both anti-Wal-Mart groups and professional organizations.

"The [proposed] bank is a limited purpose bank," said David Barr, a spokesman for the FDIC. In its application, Wal-Mart intends for the bank to process only credit card and debit card transactions that occur in the retail sites, he said. In all of Wal-Mart's retail stores, there were more than 200 million credit transactions last year. Any reduction or the removal of fees for those purchases would greatly reduce costs. Barr said.

Although the proposed bank would open in Salt Lake City, Robert Palmer, president and CEO of the Community Bankers Association of Ohio, said he filed a letter of opposition during the FDIC's public comment period.

"That may sound good from the convenience aspect. However, the concern we have is that Wal-Mart has, in the past, shown a history of driving out small business," he said.

Customer Service employee, Maria Reves, of North Richland Hills, sorts through a clothing rack as patrons shop on opening day at the Wal-Mart in North Richland. Wal-Mart may soon add a bank to its stores.

Another opposition group, Wal-Mart Watch, has started a grassroots campaign to contest the FDIC application, said Nu Wexler, press secretary of the group. "Wal-Mart Watch urges the FDIC to reject the application," Wexler said. "[The application] raises serious questions about their motives."

In Utah, it is legal for private companies to open financial institutions. Only a handful of states have such laws, Palmer said.

"This is their third attempt in six or seven years," he said.

The Glass-Steagall Act – passed in 1933 as a response to corporate bank behavior prior to the stock-market crash – forbade banks from owning corporate stock, which in turn prohibited corporations from opening banks, according to the Securities Industries Association Web site. www.sia.com. That legislation was repealed in 1999, paving the way for states to form their own laws.

There has been some support for the move.

Richard Vedder, economics professor at Ohio University, said the entire banking industry is increasingly deregulated. He is writing a book about the retail industry, half of which focuses on Wal-Mart, he said.

"I'm rooting for Wal-Mart," he said.

Safety rules discussed

The program also includes improving roadways and installing bump outs on University Dr. and flashing lights near the Mullins Center on

Commonwealth Ave, said Black. He said another aspect of the program was to encourage more Southwest residents to use the Southwest Tunnel, which was designed as a pedestrian underpass.

One major goal of the program is to draft a University bylaw for proper use of crosswalks by pedestrians, including a fine for those who do not comply.

Throughout the semester, the police department will also begin to address the problem of intoxicated pedestrians and hopes to take corrective action, said Black.

"Some pedestrian accidents are caused not by drunk drivers, but by individuals who are intoxicated and walk into traffic," said the University's news release. According to Black, the police's first step will be to randomly patrol the main roads from campus to uptown and "Frat Row" and interview pedestrians to see how intoxicated they are.

At the end of the semester, MassSAFE will gather data on road improvements, compile crash and citation data and review their observations of drivers and pedestrians that they will be conducting throughout the semester. They will use this information to develop pedestrian safety guidelines, according to the press news release.

Black said that many other large universities throughout the country have similar problems and a few have already contacted the department, asking to be informed of the results of this program. He said he hopes that "Cross Safely, Drive Safely" will be able to be used as a model for other schools.

Financial-aid funding cuts threatened

By Krystle Davis
Daily Orange (Syracuse)

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — As the cost of college tuition increases each year, the federal government prepares to vote on proposals that could make repaying loans more expensive for students.

Congress is in the process of reauthorizing, or reviewing, the Higher Education Act, a law that regulates most student aid programs at colleges and universities. In a few weeks, the House of Representatives will vote on a bill that could cut $9 billion from student loan programs, reducing benefits for student borrowers and making loan consolidation more expensive for students.

Since approximately 70 percent of Syracuse University undergraduates receive need-based financial aid, according to the SU Web site, these cuts could directly affect much of the student body.

The proposed adjustments are part of budget reconciliation, a process that allows Congress to quickly pass tax cuts and other measures in order to reduce the budget deficit.

Christopher Walsh, dean of financial aid and scholarship programs at SU, said the government's competing priorities, such as the Hurricane Katrina disaster relief efforts and the War in Iraq, are part of the reason why student financial aid programs receive less than the desired level of funding.

However, he said the cuts are in technical areas and do not necessarily lessen the aid to students.

"I don't think there's going to be a negative impact on students," Walsh said.

The most disappointing aspect of the new proposals is that there are no new programs or substantial increases to financial aid, Walsh said.

"It does not keep pace with the rising cost of tuition," he said.

The United States Student Association, a Washington, D.C.-based group that defends student interests, strongly opposes the proposed changes and has been working to unite students against these bills.

When USSA organized a national call-in day on Sept. 20, more than 1,600 calls were made to representatives in Congress, asking them to vote against the reconciliation measures, said Jasmine Harris, legislative director of USSA.

USSA urges students to participate in its next call-in day on Oct. 19.

"There's strong pressure and strong intent to pass these bills, and that's why we're trying to mobilize students," Harris said. "It's going to take a united student voice to stop these bills from passing."

One of the proposed changes to the Higher Education Act is a $500 increase in Pell grants over the next five years, Walsh said.

"Over the next five years, the cost of education will probably go up thousands of dollars. It's just not generous enough," he said.

For students who rely on financial aid to subsidize their education, the rising cost of tuition can become daunting.

"Financial aid – that is the reason I'm here at this school," said Britney Parkinson, a sophomore civil engineering major. "I wouldn't be here without financial aid. It pains me every day to think about the cost of tuition. It just keeps going up."

Heather Shearer, a graduate student in the writing program, said she disapproves of the cost of college tuition throughout the country.

Study finds athletes less moral

By Ally Manning
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — After a recent University of Idaho study reported that character growth is negatively affected by involvement in sports, Boston University athletes and administrators say the study's findings are visible in athletes' behavior on and off the field.

Boston University Sports Psychology Director Dr. Len Zaichkowsky said the topic of low moral judgment in athletes has been "bounced around" in recent years.

"They are just so competitive that they'll do whatever it takes to win – within the rules," he said. "But when you try to measure what's right and wrong in life and then in sports, it depends on what circumstance you're in."

The study, conducted over the past 17 years, evaluated 72,000 individuals from 1987 to 2004 and linked moral development with the competitive nature of organized athletics, as opposed to recreational activities.

"The environment of athletics has not been supportive of teaching and modeling moral knowing, moral valuing and moral action," the results stated.

The study reported that athletes' moral levels declined from the beginning of the study and that athletes who compete in team sports have a lower moral judgment than their peers who compete individually.

Women also have the same "low level" of moral action as their male counterparts, according to the results.

Participants in the study were asked to evaluate certain scenarios, by saying if they strongly agreed, agreed, were neutral, disagreed or strongly disagreed. Scenarios ranged from a foul call a referee may have missed to the fairness of heckling.

College of General Studies sophomore and soccer player Ashley Locasale said she disagreed with the study, but could "understand how the competitive nature could not allow your morals to show."

"I think the level of competition is so competitive in collegiate sports that other things are more important than morality, like winning, playing hard and getting the job done," she said.

BU golfer Ted Prescott said being immoral in golf is not something he sees as blatantly as in other sports.

"Being a golfer, you have to have respect for the game and the rules," the Sargent College of Health and Rehabilitation Sciences senior said.

"However, the more intense the competition, the more careless [athletes] become with their decision-making."

Prescott said he's observed no difference between the pressures of team sports and individual competition.

"I think it all goes in the same mold," he said. "You don't want to let your team down. You're not representing yourself. You're representing BU."

Locasale said she believes there is a difference in the pressure an athlete feels in a team sport versus that felt in an individual sport.

"When you play for a team you want to play hard for your teammates," she said. "With an individual sport, you rely on yourself. Playing for a team adds pressure."

Stabbings hurt fraternities

Chris Eckel

By now, you've all heard the story. The weekend before last, violence erupted on North Pleasant St. and six people were injured, reportedly stabbed. In the week since, the tone on campus has understandably been one of concern and outrage. People have questioned whether or not "Frat Row" is a safe place to be, and many have questioned how such a negative incident will influence the reputation of UMass in general. Might prospective students or faculty members stay away from a campus that may be becoming better known for its rumbles than its research? With such frightening scenarios in mind, many have deemed the fraternities and their members to be unnecessary blights on the landscape of this campus.

To those people, I say, "Shame on you!" I may not be privy to the UMPD and Amherst Police reports, but as far as I have heard, the events of that evening are still very much in dispute. The only thing that seems to be unequivocally true is that some people got hurt, and some of those people happen to be in fraternities. Blaming the fraternities because some of their members got stabbed is a horrifying, narrow-minded knee-jerk reaction.

Would anyone question the continued presence of the Orchard Hill residential area if a student were stabbed outside of Field? Probably not – it seems the more likely reaction would be one of sympathy and outrage that such a thing could happen. That is precisely what these young men deserve: our sympathy and our outrage – for those who were injured, and those who live with them.

This newspaper has already printed a well-written and thought-provoking denial of responsibility from the president of Pi Delta Psi, claiming that none of his brothers were involved in the incident. I, for one, will believe him until the facts prove otherwise. As long as we have no reason to doubt his word, there is no reason to consider destroying "Frat Row."

Would anyone question the continued presence of the Orchard Hill residential area if a student were stabbed outside of Field? Probably not – it seems the more likely reaction would be one of sympathy and outrage that such a thing could happen. That is precisely what these young men deserve: our sympathy and our outrage – for those who were injured, and those who live with them.

Furthermore, unless it is conclusively proven that those involved were also in the Greek system, it is foolish to castigate the system for having some of its members involved in a violent incident. If a drunken Red Sox fan got stabbed outside Fenway Park, not one person would blame the entire Red Sox Nation for the event and try to disband it. Instead, we would review the incident and question where the individual made a poor judgment that led to such a situation. There would also probably be some sort of questioning into who was responsible, rather than who was involved. Unquestionably, the same standard of behavior should be observed in this situation.

According to an officer with the Amherst Police, no one has yet been arrested in connection with the events of that night, precisely because no one knows who was responsible. Conjecture and rumormongering give justice to no one.

So we don't know who did it. What do we know? It does seem fairly certain that somewhere along the line, the individuals involved in these ugly incidents did make a mistake in judgment. Whether it was hanging out with the wrong crowd, saying something provocative or even perhaps hitting on the wrong girl, there is nothing on earth these young men could do that would warrant a stabbing. In making calls for the disbanding of the Greek system, the line between victim and perpetrator is being blurred, and perhaps crossed. We must take a step back from angery debate and allow these events to play out.

If and when arrests are made, then we, as a campus community, can begin to examine the proper role Greek life should play on this campus. I may come across as an odd advocate for Greek life, as I used to be a brother in a UMass fraternity until I decided to place other things first and disaffiliated. However, just because it wasn't right for me doesn't mean that Greek life isn't right for this campus.

Fraternities and sororities have done a lot of good for this campus, and I don't just mean their parties. Greek life members often perform more community service, get involved with more clubs and organizations, and cheer on the sports teams more loudly and more faithfully than the average student.

Furthermore, historically, the Greek-wide GPA is about the same as the campus-wide GPA. These are good people doing good things for the university, not knife-wielding thugs, as some people are suggesting. Let us judge these young men and women on the basis of their long, significant history, and not rush to decisions based upon events that seem to be no more than an aberration, especially events that are currently unexplained.

Only once we truly know all the facts and take history into account can we make a fair, balanced and correct decision. Anything short of that would be a disservice to the Greek system and to each and every one of us.

Dialogue of the deaf

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

An increasing number of U.S. creationists are today placing their faith in the most recent version of the Scripture-Science hybrid, now called "intelligent design." A massive debate has ensued on the national level over the last two to three months in response to proposals that intelligent design be incorporated as an equal and alternative view to the traditional "evolutionist" approach that currently dominates public education. Actually, the debate has involved very little exchange, with both sides communicating only with their bases and incapable of engaging in mutual dialogue over the similarities and differences of their approaches. It is a dialogue of the deaf.

I believe that what is truly important is a genuine examination of the content of theories and respect for the theorists' legitimacy; perhaps there exists some common ground, or a common goal, around which the two sides could find a kernel of shared purpose and initiate an effective dialogue. That is the democratic way. The case of intelligent design, however, is a complicated one.

Part of the problem of the failed dialogue is the poor definition of the issues and their contributing factors. Terms such as "science" and "faith" are too excessively broad to make much headway. The predictable allotment of blind labeling – "evolutionist" and "intelligent designist" – has led to the standard amount of over-generalization and stereotyping.

Faith and science are not incompatible, at least insofar as an individual may bestow confidence in both, but I do not necessarily agree that they have similar goals. Overall, the concept of scientific inquiry is to disinterestedly explain natural phenomena based upon several criteria of provable evidence. Since it is essentially disinterested, science only asks the question, why is it necessary to explain causal relationships?

The general thrust of faith-based thought, on the other hand, is to explain the "why" question without placing so much importance on the how. This is only natural given that it is assumed impossible to ever fully comprehend the functioning of God's creation.

However, it is the current framework for dialogue that is faulty. While a conciliation of faith and science based on common ground is noble, it is not actually a middle ground. Such a fusion already is the concept of intelligent design, not a compromise with science. The idea of intelligent design is that faith and science work together to answer the how question of science and the why question of faith.

The fundamental tenant of intelligent design – that the natural world and everything in it was created by God and we know this because unsubstantiated scriptures from thousands of years ago tell us so – undermines several fundamental tenants of scientific inquiry.

The fundamental tenant of intelligent design – that the natural world and everything in it was created by God and we know this because unsubstantiated scriptures from thousands of years ago tell us so – undermines several fundamental tenants of scientific inquiry.

Many of the mainstream opponents of the introduction of intelligent design into public school curricula categorically dismiss it without much evaluation. On the other hand, they believe they are dealing with a naked example of institutionalized religion trying to subvert the U.S. education system by appearing to provide a balanced and long-respected tradition of scholarship.

A proposed dramatic ideological paradigm shift as this one, and particularly one that seeks to continue reformulating hypotheses from the same degenerative research program that fell out of the analytical mainstream several eras ago, unsurprisingly generates the sort of undemocratic resistance demonstrated by geologists, biologists, natural historians, and others. While there is indeed a long tradition of the intelligent design theory, it has not come close to rivaling traditional scientific theory in legitimacy or progressivity. Yet the two are presented by "designists" as boria fide competing theories, and the rest are labeled as "evolutionists."

The best hope for proponents of the integration of the religious and the secular in mainstream thought would be to significantly reduce the scope of their project. Primarily, the First Amendment guarantee against state establishment of religion would not permit a sectarian version of intelligent design, if it were to permit some broad version of intelligent design at all.

More importantly, however, a scholarly fringe ideology that fundamentally opposes major tenets of the dominant paradigm will very quickly prove incapable of assimilation into academia. A more explicit focus on the background "why" question that science dares not touch without attempting a treatability for repetition of experiments and an effort to remove a research program from its cultural context.

From this view, faith is much more of an ideology than a scientific paradigm. Therefore any compromise between science-founding principles and faith's would undermine the Enlightenment concept of scientific inquiry altogether.

Electoral moral values

Mike Sances

The notion that a majority of American citizens has the IQ of a head of lettuce has always been an inviting one to the elite minority, in which we should include UMass Amherst. Perhaps ironically, it was the progressive movement that gave birth to the contemporary elitist scorn for the public.

As Austin Bramwell wrote in the Aug. 29 edition of the American Conservative, "Liberals viewed these populist enthusiasms [of the Progressive era] with dismay. The people, in their view, remained stubbornly benighted, saw political problems in naive moralistic terms . . . Accordingly, liberalism's leading intellects began to fashion a new ideology that called for elite social scientists, rather than a virtuous populace, to address the problems of the modern world." At the head of these elites was the journalist Walter Lippman, who in 1922 "argued that ordinary people lacked the intellectual resources necessary for even the feebles grasp of modern complexities."

The election last year witnessed a resurgence of this attitude on the Democratic side, with much throwing up of hands and loud dismay, myself included, toward the apparent popular approval of George W. Bush. Sent in to repair the Democratic party, as Frank Furedi wrote in the June 13 issue of the online journal Spiked, was George Lakoff, "whom Howard Dean has described as 'one of the most influential political thinkers of the progressive movement'," and who, "characterizes Bush supporters as dominated by a 'strict father morality' which is hostile to 'nurturance and care.'" In Furedi's view, Lakoff's taxonomy is only "another way of saying that they [Bush voters] are morally inferior people."

Before explaining why this sense of superiority has no basis in reality, it must be stressed that no one party holds a monopoly on elitism; it is entirely bipartisan. For this reason, you will never hear about it if you spend your time listening to conventional political "debates" between agents of the two big parties.

Let us first disabuse ourselves of the inflated importance of "moral values" in last year's election. It is a fact that in the exit polls 22% of voters claimed "moral values" as the most important issue bearing on their vote. It is also a fact that of these 22%, 80% voted for Bush. Keeping in mind that roughly 62% of eligible voters chose to vote, and that 51% of these voted for George Bush, we are left with a final figure of 5.56% of the country electing their president on the basis of "moral values" above all else. All this without getting into the business of defining what "moral values" means (35% cited "greed and materialism" as their biggest moral concern when asked by Pax Christi, a Catholic human rights group).

Faced with this absurdity any intelligent person would be forced to choose between, say, who has better hair — if they weren't so insulted as to boycott the whole thing altogether. Indeed, "none of the above" got more votes than either Kerry or Bush.

We can also derive from these numbers that one, nearly 40% chose not to vote, and two, most of those that did voted not on policy but on a judgment of character. In my view these are not signs of mass ignorance, but are instead evidence of a highly sophisticated understanding of politics.

To explain: I voted for John Kerry, but I couldn't possibly tell you why I did so. The campaign was so devoid of policy issues, and so filled with fluff, that I would have to try very hard to identify any particular instance where the political difference between Kerry and Bush was sufficiently illuminated.

What was always clear was the difference in appearance, in demeanor, and in style of management. Faced with this absurdity any intelligent person would be forced to choose between, say, who has better hair — if they weren't so insulted as to boycott the whole thing altogether. Indeed, "none of the above" got more votes than either Kerry or Bush.

Most of the evidence of the public's intelligence is found via polling, however. "Majorities of Bush supporters favored including labor and environmental standards in trade agreements (93%), and the U.S. being part of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (68%), the International Criminal Court (75%), the treaty banning land mines (66%), and the Kyoto treaty on climate change (54%)," according to a poll from the Program on International Policy Attitudes released on Sept. 29, 2004.

A day earlier, the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations released a poll that had 59% of Americans in favor of eliminating the U.N. Security Council veto. A year after that, PIPA reported that the public gave American democracy a 6.2 on a scale of one to ten.

These are shocking numbers when placed next to the conventional understanding of last November, and I could continue. The United States is well known to be one of the most polled countries in the world. It makes sense: after all, politicians have to keep up to date on what not to talk about. Whether we agree with these opinions is irrelevant; what matters is how much they differ from the platforms (or, if you like, "values") of the two big parties.

The ultimate point is clear. Americans are not as stupid as we are made out to be, but the strongest evidence lies in history. Any progress we've made as a society has always been accomplished by mass movements — and always denounced, at least initially, by elites, a group in which we should include UMass Amherst, and in which I of course include myself.

Goodbye Red Sox

David Lawrence

I'd like to say goodbye to our 2005 Red Sox. The team that last year inspired so many in New England fell last Friday with their final, uninspiring performance of the season. Following their third consecutive postseason loss to the South Side Sox, our "beantown bombers" packed up and walked out of the clubhouse, a farewell that feels oh-so-empty in a New England used to victory parades at season's end.

So goodbye, Johnny Damon: you've given us quite a show and we'll hate to see you leave, but we know you're itching to go on tour with your rock-star act. No hard feelings. With a killer season, unbelievable resilience, and Scott Boras signing in as "agent," we have to face the facts and realize that Damon probably won't be marching home to Boston next year. He is one of the choicest players going on the free agent list, and with immense popularity he promises to sell enough tickets to warrant the price he is asking for. However, it is doubtful that general manager Theo Epstein will be willing to pay it.

Goodbye Kevin Millar: your cowboy routine and constantly outspoken clubhouse optimism is unique and won't be forgotten. If you hadn't picked the 2004 Red Sox up when they fell down 0-3 to the Yankees in the ALCS, probably no one would have. Unfortunately your bat fell quiet this year, and with your contract up the management will want to upgrade. John Olerud is a good defensive replacement, but at his age isn't reliable as an everyday starter. The Red Sox will be out looking to improve at first, and that means Millar will be out looking for work.

Goodbye Bill Mueller: your quiet consistency and flawless fundamentals at third base won't be enough to bring you back in 2006. Not with young Kevin Youkilis ready to become an everyday major leaguer. The Red Sox are looking to add some youthful charge to their veteran staff, and bringing the aging Mueller back would mean letting Youkilis continue to rot in the minor league system, which just doesn't fit into the game plan for this team.

There are a lot of other question marks for next year: Mike Timlin, Manny Ramirez, and Keith Foulke (remember him?) are all familiar faces that may not be around the clubhouse come spring training. Timlin pitched terrifically this year and is up for free agency. However, the team needs bullpen help and will probably try to get him back. "Manny being Manny" might mean "Manny being Manny someplace else" if his distaste for the lack of privacy in Boston leads him to ask the management for a trade.

Foulke is a huge question mark both physically and psychologically, and he hasn't done himself any favors by running his mouth off about Red Sox fans. Management may look to give him a change of scenery in exchange for another bullpen arm.

However, it is doubtful that general manager Theo Epstein will be willing to pay it.

When we say goodbye to the Red Sox of this year, we're really saying goodbye to the team that won the World Series in 2004. Looking back at this year, there is no sense of an identity coming together for the 2005 team. The idiots, the rock stars, the cowboys: those are the players we're giving our farewell to. They are relics from the team that made history in 2004, not the team that coasted through 2005.

After watching Edgar Renteria ground into the last out of the Red Sox season for the second consecutive year, I couldn't help but wonder if October 2004 had been real or if I had just dreamt or imagined it. Commiserating with other Red Sox fans following a disappointing season's end, we're used to saying, "Maybe next year," but again and again I've caught myself thinking, "Maybe last year." Thanks and farewell '04 Sox – you won't be forgotten.

Classical music typically isn't created from scratch, or improvised, but that's exactly what happens when a turntable is thrown into the mix. Earlier this month at Carnegie Hall, perhaps the epitome of classical music in America and usually a place where one is typically expected to wear formal attire, those two elements were combined. The world of classical music was flipped on its head as the first ever "Concerto for Turntable" was performed with an orchestra.

The Red Bull sponsored Artsehcro torchestra spelled backwards, to illustrate this twist, chronicled the first time a turntable has performed with an orchestra for a full concert. DJ Radar, who was recently named as one of the "Top Ten Turntablists in the World" by SPIN Magazine, was the turntable soloist, leading this music revolution with a collegiate symphony orchestra of musicians from colleges across the country.

The idea was born nearly five years ago, when DJ Radar wanted to see what would happen when classical music was melded with hip-hop.

"I'm trying to combine two genres," Radar said in a recent interview. "I want to see my instrument, the turntable as a validated one."

Radar is unsure how to approach his goal, so he consulted Raul Yañez, a musician who worked with Radar in the past when transcribing his track, "Antimatter." Combining imagination with composition, Yañez was able to create "scratch notation," a form of written sheet music specifically created for turntablists. Radar and Yañez went on to compose "Concerto for Turntable," a composition in three movements, which debuted together at Carnegie Hall.

The concerto wasn't the only piece performed by the Artsehcro, but rather, the finale after several other pieces which dabbed into the turntable's potential. The first piece, "Scratch," which was written and performed by DJ Radar, featured loops of various instruments layered upon one another, percussive scratches and pitches bending by the slowing rotation of the turntable.

The orchestra, under the subtle conducting hand of Constantine Kitsopoulos, former Music Director of "Les Miserables" on Broadway, entered the stage after the first piece.

Two University of Massachusetts-Amherst alumni, Julia Koo and Chi-Young Hwang, were participants in the event, both of whom cite Marylou Speaker Churchill, the former head of the Strings Department at the University, as their reason for attending the school. Churchill is the former Principal Second of the Boston Symphony.

"Today was incredible," said Koo, who is now pursuing an education degree at Columbia University. "There was so much energy, and it's great to see an event like this get classical music out into the open."

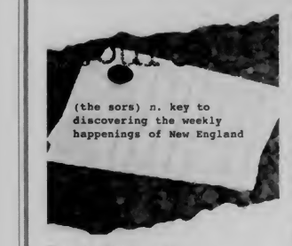
"I think this is a great concept," said Hwang. "There were so many different people in the audience – everyone from fans of hip-hop to classical music lovers."

Another piece, "The Transitive Property of Equality," combined influences old and new. The orchestra could be heard mixing together Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Wagner, almost as if a DJ were in control of their individual parts. Radar's records made use of a full range of sound, bending pitches via scratching to match that of the orchestra. Anton Grandert, a trombone player from Sweden's School of Music in Pitea, felt that Artsehcro was a step in the right direction for orchestras.

"Classical symphony orchestras can't be static, they can't always be about tradition," he said.

Two other pieces, "Largate!" and "Centipede," both written by Yañez, featured small ensembles of Latin percussionists along with Radar on turntable, but failed to grasp the audience's attention as much as the previous pieces.

More and more of the crowd filled the empty seats of the Issac Stern Auditorium, Carnegie Hall's largest performance space, after each piece. The crowd was visibly diverse as the attire ranged from Sean Paul street clothing to Gucci and Armani formalwear. By intermission, nearly every seat was filled, and the audience waited in anticipation of the debut of "Concerto for Turntable."



Historically, concertos have been used as a way to introduce a new instrument, or the way one is played, to an orchestra.

"Turntable," in all three of its movements, felt simply epic. From chimes and bells ringing in the percussion section, to Radar's improvised horns and violins, the show was something to be experienced both visually and audibly. At times, Radar would play a call and response type part, mimicking a section of the orchestra, and that section would reply.

Hip-hop's influence could be felt heavily during the second movement, as percussion and strings played a drum and bass rhythm that Radar seemingly improvised off of. By the end of the final movement, the music became a coherent whole, where listeners were left to ask themselves if this marriage of genres was meant to be.

Lilly Bright, an audience member in attendance from Los Angeles, viewed the "Concerto for Turntable" as only the beginning of a new genre. "This is just the first tier of a music movement; they have a lot to develop, but it's such a great platform to forge into a music fusion," she said.

As with all new forms of music, the first impression can be a startling one, but DJ Radar and Raul Yañez's piece proved that no one form of music truly ever dies, just simply evolves.

Heartless Bastards

5/10

Stairs and Elevators
Fat Possum Records

Whether or not you like the sound of the Heartless Bastards, you have to be impressed by lead Erika Wennerstrom. Her gritty voice and intense lyrics make this Midwestern rock band stand out.

Not only is she responsible for the singing, songwriting and guitar and piano playing on the album, but she also created the band, which formed in 2000 after she traveled from Dayton, Ohio to Cincinnati and found bassist Mike Lamping. Soon afterwards, Kevin Vaughn joined as the drummer. Heartless Bastards is very much Wennerstrom's creation, and it thus features her talent with Lamping and Vaughn mostly plugging the holes, although they assuredly do an admirable job of doing so.

At once blending rock, blues, punk and garage, in addition to Wennerstrom's raspy voice, their debut album, "Stairs and Elevators," provides a distinctive sound. Right from the outset, "Gray" gives the listener an idea of what to expect throughout the album, with Wennerstrom's deep voice proclaiming, "I march my feet to a different drum." In "Autonomy," she shows flashes of an idealism that is often lost in rock lyrics. The song name itself suggests an independence from the cares of the world, and the feeling of the song is best captured by the line, "You can change anything, anything." The aptly named "Piano Song" particularly showcases Wennerstrom's talents. Her deep voice echoes over the sound of the piano, which she also plays, without accompaniment of bass or drums.

"Stairs and Elevators" is a successful debut album. Wennerstrom's unique abilities are certainly prominent. The band manages to keep the "recorded in one of our garages" sound without the usual sacrifice of glaring miscues and mistakes. Vaughn and Lamping are nothing spectacular, but they are certainly adequate, especially when the focus is on Wennerstrom. One can tell from the album that the band wouldn't disappoint live, but they do seem to fall just a bit short. Go see the Heartless Bastards as an opener or if you don't have to walk too far, and if you see "Stairs and Elevators" lying on the ground, pick it up. Beyond that, I would only recommend seeking out their album if you can't resist the pull of Wennerstrom's unique voice.

The Lovemakers

Times of Romance
Interscope Records

Lovemaking is supposed to be a private, personal, exciting time, but unfortunately, in the 21st century the term has gone away to only be used in romance movies on Lifetime. That is, until a band from Southern California came along and decided to call themselves the Lovemakers.

Why would a band call themselves such a thing, one might ask? Well the answer is because they sing about sex and fantasy. The songs aren't by any means X-rated and the band insists, neither is the live show. A PG-13 sex show is the dirtiest the album offers and that's because they have a song called "We Should Be Taking off Our Clothes." They credit Prince for their inspiration for this concept. By no means is it a bad concept – the bad part is the fact that the music is bad.

On their second album, "Times of Romance," the Lovemakers make it a science to try their darndest to sing as upbeat as possible. They succeed, but that's the only point where the album succeeds.

Vocalists Scott Blonde and Lisa Light form another rock and roll couple casually trying to succeed with a band together even after their relationship has failed. Throughout the album, they trade off time with the microphone.

On Track 4 they even try sounding like Prince. This is a flattering attempt, but it is annoying after a few seconds. Someone has to tell this band that rock 'n' roll left the dance floor for a reason and bands as bad as them could be the reason.

When the band doesn't try to get everyone to dance, they succeed with some good songs. Track 6 is an example of one of these songs – slowly built up with an acoustic intro song by Blonde and then worked into a full band song with out any excess dance sounds. These songs are few and far-between and by the time another good song comes on, the album is nearly over.

At the album's close is a remix of the first track, "Prepare for the Light," that sounds like it should be sung by Aqua, but instead it's still the Lovemakers boring the listener even more with an encore before calling the album complete.

Get it Wrong Before I get it Right
Runway Records

Elliott Smith has been dead now for nearly two years, but his inspiration can still be heard in new music today. Following Smith down the road of melodramatic singer/songwriters is Sam Ashworth.

Ashworth, 25, released his debut solo album this past September on Runway Records, but has been around in music since the age of 16.

In the past nine years Ashworth has been singer/songwriter, producer and band member in the Nashville indie music scene. He also runs a record label with some of his friends to release their own music without the side effects of the business. With this experience comes a songwriter with a great writing ability and a voice far more mature than those of his peers.

"Gonna Get It Wrong Before I Get It Right" is the perfect album for a walk around campus with the leaves falling all around you and the sky full of stars. It is similar to the early work of Elliott Smith and the slower songs of the Shins, but for the most part Ashworth has his own sound.

The sound may be the same or similar throughout the twelve songs on the album, but that's because he is really much more of a songwriter than a guitar player.

For more oriented material check out his other project, the band Astronaut Pushers, who recently released an LP. This review is all about them it's about Ashworth and only him.

Ashworth creates beautiful

Ghostface disappoints while openers impress at Pearl Street

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Staff

Wu-Tang Clan member Ghostface Killah visited Northampton last Thursday night. Ghost headlined a concert at Pearl Street Night Club that also featured Canadian hip-hop collective Swollen Members. Springfield's own First Person began the evening's festivities.

First Person, an up-and-coming emcee from the City of Homes, performed alongside Memphis native Tenth Noble. The humbly dressed pair fed off each other's energy and got the crowd involved from the start. As a man who feels that he "walks the line between college and the streets," his performance reflected a man brought up in the hood and divided by two paths. In the song, "I Want It All," First Person and his partner, Tenth Noble, repeated, "The way to get money is to stay on the grind/Standing on the corner is just wastin' your time." First Person, who feels that his father's support enabled him to get out of the 'hood and earn a college education, says his music is, "straight East Coast." He says that he's been influenced by Wu-Tang, Mobb Deep and Nas. First Person has an album that is slated for release by the end of the year.

Vancouver natives Swollen Members took the stage and immediately had the crowd jumping and screaming. The group, comprised of emcees Mad Child and Prevail and DJ Rob the Viking, was impressive because of their insane energy. At times, it seemed as if the raspy voiced Mad Child was lip-synching. Prevail delivered his words with more clarity and crispness. At one point, Prevail jumped off the stage into the arms of screaming fans and freestyled. The crowd surfing, freestyling exhibition further ignited the crowd. Prevail's words remained loud and clear throughout this escapade. A few brave fans also crowd surfed, a surprising activity to see at a hip-hop show.

Donning a heavy medallion and a Cuban jersey with a picture of Che Guevara, solo artist Planet Asia took the stage for an unexpected performance and showcased his lyrical expertise. Planet Asia flowed without a beat for a good portion of his performance. This spoken word tactic was impressive, but quieted the crowd.

Swollen Members, who are touring the United States for the rest of the fall, have a new album coming out in May entitled "Black Magic." Worldwide, this Canadian trio has sold over 500,000 albums. Former member Moka Only left the group to pursue solo projects. Prevail said that the new album is a "return to the future." He said the group is doing a lot of writing on the road. Swollen Members have worked with the Alchemist, Dilated Peoples, Nelly Furtado and Everlast.

Staten Island representative Ghostface Killah appeared on stage wearing a khaki "Pretty Toney" button-up and a black New York Yankees cap fitted to the back. His entrance was preceded by a short performance by the Theodore Unit. The group did the song "Cocaine Trafficking," performed by Trife Dagod. The crowd appeared to be unfamiliar with the Unit's material and they became restless, awaiting "Ghost Deini's" arrival.

Ghostface opened the show with the classic "Criminology" off his longtime collaborative partner Raekwon's first album, "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx." The New York City native was smiling from ear to ear as the song's "Scarface" sample played for the eager crowd. Ghostface was joined by surprise guest Cappadonna, also a Wu-Tang affiliate. The two performed the song "Winter Warz" off Ghostface's first solo album, "Ironman." The crowd chanted along with Cappadonna during his verse.

Ghostface was entertaining, but did not live up to the hype. He did play favorites like "Ice Cream" that kept the crowd content. His presence at times seemed to be overshadowed by the lesser-known Cappadonna, who was clad in army fatigues. Ghost was impressive at times, but on the whole he was a disappointment. He urged the crowd to get away from the popular hip-hop of today and to listen to the classics like Rakim, A Tribe Called Quest and KRS-One. He has a new solo album coming out in February entitled, "Fishscale." Ghostface said the title is an indication of how "raw" this record will be, explaining that fishscale is the strongest kind of cocaine available. He performed the song "Be Easy" off the upcoming album. His group, The Theodore Unit, has an album coming out in November called "Stapleton to Somalia."

The concert came to an unimpressive conclusion after Ghostface allowed fans to display their lyrical abilities, or lack thereof. This became a fiasco, as wannabe rhymers fought with each other to gain control of the microphone. Disgusted, Ghostface quickly left the stage. There were rumors that the police shut the show down, but these reports were unsubstantiated.

Bob Mould rediscovers his classic 'Body of Song' in latest tour with new band

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

When Bob Mould arrived on the Paradise's stage last Tuesday everyone in the building, including Mould himself, knew something was different.

For the first time in seven years Mould had a backing band and the audience was about to witness him in a way that the 21st century had never seen, setting the stage for the best reunion of 2005: Bob Mould and deafeningly loud, guitar-driven rock. Mould — one of the ultimate alternative rock legends who practically created the genre with his legendary '80s post-punk outfit Husker Du and fronted Sugar, one of the best overlooked bands of the '90s — has spent the past few years dabbling in electronica and playing solo shows that only hinted at the power he was capable of. On his new album, "Body of Song," Mould married his dalliance with electronica with pummeling guitar work, so it only made sense that he hit the road with a full band again, something he swore off following his 1998 release, "Last Dog and Pony Show."

Backed by ex-Fugazi drummer Brendan Canty, bassist Jason Narducy, who fronted the '90s rockers Verbow and keyboardist Richard Morel, who as of late has been Mould's partner in electronica, Mould stepped on stage and looked ready to go.

The muted opening riff of "The Act We Act," the first track from Sugar's "Copper Blue," that started the show was the best signpost of Mould's change of heart. Following that with "A Good Idea" and "Changes," the second and third songs on "Copper Blue," was not just a gift to fans, but seemed to be cathartic for Mould himself. After setting the scene, Mould dove into "Body of Song," playing the highlights of his latest achievement and even making "I Am Vision, I Am Sound," an electronic-tinted song that drags a bit on the album, a full-on rock 'n' roll blowout. While Mould wisely sprinkled brilliant Sugar songs throughout the set, there was no doubt that for many the highlight of the night came when Mould unleashed a string of Husker Dü songs, something he has never done with another band. From the pop-rock of "Could You Be The One" to the punk energy of "I Apologize," the Husker songs held up amazingly well, sounding just as fresh as they ever did and fitting in perfectly next to songs that were 20 years younger.

When Mould and his band played the Husker dirge "Hardly Getting Over It," the slow burn of the song became even more intense and just as loud as the fastest songs played over the night. Mould returned to his solo catalogue with "The Receipt," a furious attack on Husker drummer/co-singer/writer Grant Hart, which finds Mould singing, "I took the high road for so long/I still hate your favorite song." However, in true Mould spirit, his fiercest lyrical battles come with himself, such as during the encore opener "Egoveride," when he sang, "I'm a child, I'm a baby/I can change my mind like any other genius/This is genius, this is genuine, this is bullshit."

Mould and his band closed the show with a second encore of Sugar's "Helpless" and Husker Dü's "Makes No Sense At All" before leaving the stage. Bob Mould is, after all these years, still a force to be reckoned with on record and live, proving that the legend is still alive and kicking. After blowing the roof off of the Paradise, here's hoping it doesn't take another seven years for Mould to do it again.

pop music for the somber state of mind; he's not as sad as Smith, but a '60s Beatles vibe, mostly Paul McCartney, follows him as he strums along on his guitar and sings into the microphone. By no means is he whiny like some of the singer/songwriters out there; no names need to be mentioned here.

For now Ashworth might be busy with both his band and his solo project, if he focuses solely on his solo material he could easily capture the title of the next Elliott Smith and the world will love him for it. Unlike Smith, hopefully he will live much longer and continue to make music past his 30s.

Deftones

6/10

B-Sides & Rarities
Maverick Records

When the Deftones arrived on the scene 10 years ago they were part of a camp that included Korn and Limp Bizkit, never quite reaching the commercial success of those bands but far surpassing them in talent and creativity. The band was constantly lumped in with the nu-metal scene, despite having very little in common with it. While the band's output is much debated by fans and critics, there is no doubt that the Deftones have hit upon a unique sound: the Cure and My Bloody Valentine fighting it out with a pack of metalheads.

To fill some of the downtime before their 5th LP, the band has released "B-Sides & Rarities," accompanied by a DVD of all of their music videos. The CD contains mostly cover songs, with a few acoustic tracks and a few rare originals.

The covers on the album are from a variety of artists and the quality is just as mixed. The recording of the Cure's "If Only Tonight We Could Sleep" is essential Deftones material whereas the Lynyrd Skynyrd cover, "Simple Man," isn't very exciting. However, the good does outweigh the bad, as "Wax and Wane" will hopefully turn some Deftones fans on to the Cocteau Twins, and "Please, Please, Please, Let Me Get What I Want" stands up to the Smiths' original.

The acoustic tracks only improve as the album progresses, ending with an incredibly powerful rendition of "Be Quiet and Drive." The only Deftones originals, "Crenshaw Punch" and "Black Moon," are both just good. The former is a heavy track from the "Around the Fur" sessions and the latter is a rap song featuring B. Real from Cypress Hill. While these songs are okay, they do point to the biggest flaw of the collection: the Deftones have left off their best non-album tracks. The soundtrack contributions "Teething" and "Can't Even Breathe" are two of the band's best songs and "Lovers," a recent b-side, is an intriguing, atmospheric song. "B-Sides" is a good collection but the Deftones really hurt the album by not including those songs.

for UMass this season, resulted in a second-and-10 at the 31-yard line.

With starting tailback Steve Baylark split out as a wide receiver on the left side of the field, quarterback Liam Coen handed the soggy ball off to Cobbs, who ran off of the right tackle. Effective blocking at the line of scrimmage broke Cobbs free as he ran up the sideline and in for the first touchdown of the day.

The efficient blocking by the Minuteman offensive line was a result, according t o UMass coach Don Brown, of the veteran linemen getting healthy following the bye week.

"I thought we got done what we needed to get done and the reality is we got Matt Austin back," Brown said. "We got some of those guys a little bit healthier in the offensive line that are just banging it out week in and out."

Cobbs became friendly with the endzone in the first quarter, but his second visit of the afternoon took place during a drive that was longer than the first scoring drive, which only took 16 seconds.

As the Northeastern offense was unable to convert on a fourth down on the UMass 29-yard line, the Minutemen took over with 6:27 left in the first quarter.

A Baylark rush of seven yards brought the Minutemen to the 36-yard line of UMass. From the shotgun, Baylark took his second carry of the drive up the middle and moved the ball near midfield to the Minuteman 48-yard line.

A dramatic play came on a crucial third-and-four on the Northeastern 42-yard line. Coen fired a screen pass to receiver J.J. Moore, who took the ball up the middle of the field for 14 yards, carrying the pile past the first down marker. On the play, however, Moore left the field with injury.

Another Baylark run for 11 yards set up Cobbs for his second score, as he took the ball to the left sideline and jumped over a Northeastern receiver to cap off a nine play, 71-yard drive, which took 4:39 for the Minutemen to reach the endzone.

It didn't take long for UMass to add more points. After time expired in the first quarter, the Huskies took over on their own 32-yard line. A pass by Anthony Orio was picked off by UMass senior safety Shannon James, who sprinted into the endzone for his 19th career interception and the UMass all-time record.

The interception was the first for UMass, with the second coming in the second quarter by strong safety James Ihedigbo, who also had a sack in the contest. Ihedigbo leads the Minutemen in sacks this season with 6.5.

"We just make it our goal just to play fast and play physical every game," Ihedigbo said. "We let the offense do their job, so we just go out there and play ball, and we just have fun doing it."

Ihedigbo's interception led to the final score of the afternoon with 5:40 left in the first half. Coen faked the ball to Baylark and rolled out to his right, hitting a wide-open Kyle Harrington for the 27-0 advantage.

Despite the TD from Coen, the passing game was limited, as Coen went five-for-nine for 53 yards. Cobbs spearheaded the running attack, amounting for 101 yards, two touchdowns and a 6.6 average. Baylark was second on the list with 69 yards on 17 carries.

The rushing attack was mostly used to run out the clock in the second half.

"We'll take what we can get, use the 25-second clock," Brown said. "Virtually throwing it at that point you're putting yourself in jeopardy. We have team formula for success and we're trying to follow it on a week-to-week basis."

UMass tennis to host Williams today

By Ben Hodgkins
Collegian Correspondent

Following a tough loss six days ago, the Massachusetts women's tennis team returns home today for a match-up against Division III power Williams College at 3:30 p.m. Last Wednesday, UMass suffered its first loss of the season in a 4-3 loss to St. John's.

The Ephs of Williams College are a traditional power in Division III women's tennis, winning both the 2001 and 2002 National Championship. Williams (3-1), is also coming off its first loss of the season, a 6-3 loss to Amherst College. The Ephs started the season off with an 8-1 win at Trinity, and then followed that up with an 8-1 win at Wesleyan and a 9-0 win against Vassar.

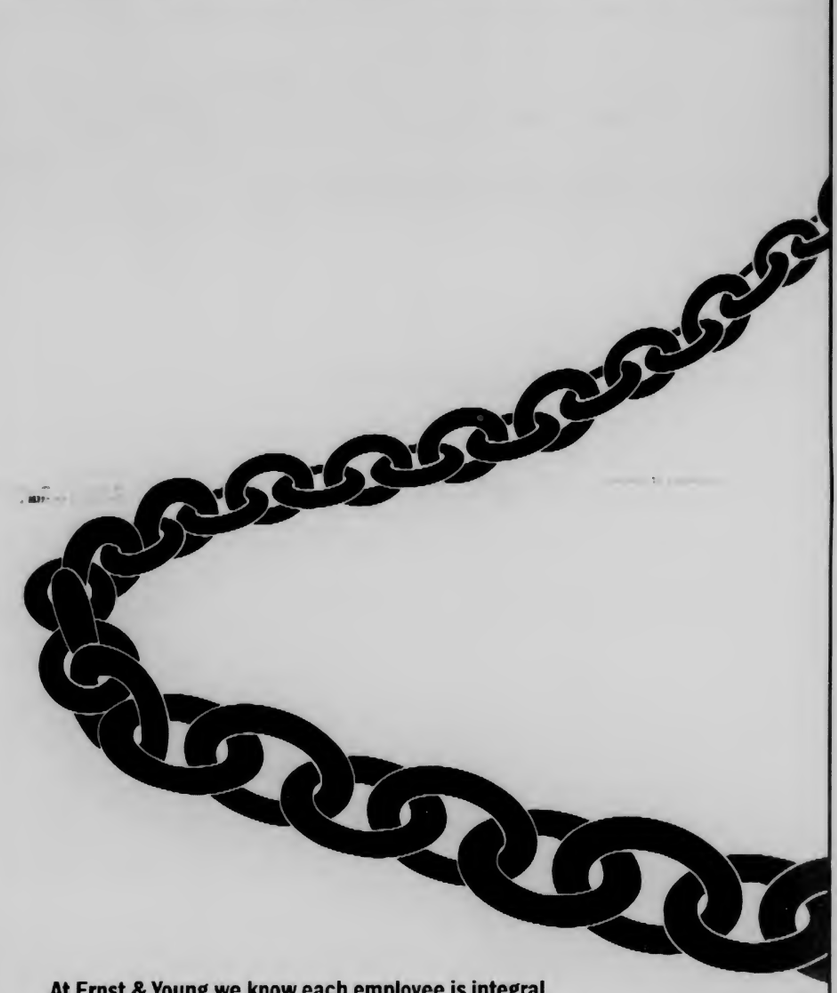
From Sept. 23 to Sept. 26, the Ephs competed in the New England ITA Regionals in Brunswick, Maine. First-year player Cary Gibson advanced the furthest for the Ephs, lasting into the semifinals before falling to Middlebury's Amy Roche (6-2, 6-0). Roche later went on to win the singles title.

In doubles, Gibson and first-year player Annie Hancock advanced to the semifinals, but lost to Kristen Raverta and Alicia Menezes of Amherst College. Raverta and Menezes went on to win the doubles title.

Williams College will be the second Division III team UMass has faced this season. The Minutewomen defeated Middlebury 6-1 on Sept. 30 in their other match-up.

The Ephs have played numerous players at different rankings this year. Only three players out of the nine players on the team have played in the same spot this year. Williams has played two different players at No. 1 singles this year, Gibson (7-2, 1-0 at No. 1) and senior Alex Maclennan (4-3, 1-2 at No. 1). No. 2 singles could be played by either Gibson (1-0 at No. 2), senior Courtney Bartlett (1-1), or first-year player Annie Hancock (6-1, 1-0 at No. 2). The Ephs have played three players at No. 3 singles including Gibson (1-1 at No. 3), Hancock (1-0 at No. 3) and sophomore Allison Rottkamp (4-1, 1-0 at No. 3).

The No. 4 spot could be played by Hancock (2-0 at No. 4), Rottkamp (1-0 at No. 4) or sophomore Anne Schneidman (5-1, 1-0 at No. 4). In the fifth spot for Williams could be sophomore Katrina Ferrara (2-0, 1-0 at No. 5), Rottkamp (2-0 at No. 5) or Schneidman (1-0 at No. 5). The No. 6 spot will be played be Ferrara (1-0 at No. 6), Schneidman (2-0 at No. 6) or first-year player Nicole McNeil (0-1 at No.6).



UMass will be led into action by junior Michele Spiess (7-0), last week's Dunn Brothers/UMass Athlete of the Week. Spiess is undefeated in both singles play and doubles play, going undefeated in 14 matches this season. She recorded one of UMass' two singles wins last week against St. John's. Senior Jana Bartoloni (6-1) picked up the other win at No. 5.

Although Williams plays numerous players at all different spots in the lineup, UMass will still only need to prepare for one Eph at each spot. The Minutewomen will have a good idea of who they will be facing if they go under the assumption that the Ephs will play the same players at each position as they have the last two matches.

No. 1 singles will see UMass' Spiess (7-0) go up against Williams Maclennan (4-3). At No. 2 will be Masha Pozar (2-2) versus Courtney Bartlett (1-1), while at No. 3 the Minutewomen's Dorothy Iwanowicz (3-2) will face the Eph's Cary Gibson (7-2).

The No. 4 match will feature Stephanie Gimenez (2-3) against Annie Hancock (6-1). No. 5 will likely be Bartoloni (6-1) facing Rottkamp (4-1) and No. 6 will be Susan Johnson (3-2) squaring off against Schneidman (5-1).

Defense leads the way

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

So far this season, the Massachusetts football team (4-1 Yankee Atlantic 10) has seen its share of clean victories. There were games that involved nearly spotless jerseys and cloudless skies. That, however, was not the case in Saturday's 27-0 beating of A-10 foe Northeastern (1-4 1-2 A-10) on the waterlogged field of Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The rain fell continuously and hard, and the Minutemen experienced their first messy win of the 2005 season.

UMass will return to McGuirk Stadium on Saturday when it takes on the defending national champion James Madison Dukes at 1 p.m.

The contest on Saturday was a tale of two halves. The first half was one that involved a scoring frenzy by both the Minuteman offense and defense and a complete shutdown of the Huskies.

Since the rain resulted in a soaked field, the ground attack was utilized to its fullest by both sides. UMass ran the ball 42 times and passed the ball 10 times, while Northeastern had almost identical numbers, running the ball on 32 attempts and throwing 15 passes throughout the afternoon.

What was not similar, however, was the outcome of those rushes and passes, as the Minutemen racked up 217 total offensive yards (164 rushing, 53 passing) and limited the Huskies to just 72 yards on offense (36 passing, 36 rushing).

"I don't think [the weather] really affected us at all," UMass tailback R.J. Cobbs said. "It wasn't difficult at all, I mean I thought we did pretty well establishing the running game and those guys getting up to the secondary and I was just following them and just running off them.

"I thought we played well, any weather, it doesn't matter, we just want to go out their and play regardless. [The offensive line] definitely put in their work today and opened up some holes for me and if it wasn't for them, I wouldn't be able to break out."

Cobbs accounted for almost half of the points scored on Saturday with the first coming just 2:27 into the game. Following an exchange of three-and-outs by both teams, a Northeastern punt traveled just 24 yards until plopping out-of-bounds on the soggy turf at the Huskie 31-yard line.

Moore lost for 'rest of year' with injury

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The post-game press conference had been moving along smoothly. The players were telling jokes and laughing, the way they usually do after home wins.

But then it hit them, one sentence from their coach. All it took was five seconds, and the mood dimmed.

Four players on the Massachusetts football team – strong safety James Ihedigbo, quarterback/wide receiver Tim Day, tailback R.J. Cobbs and free safety Shannon James – all dropped their shoulders and hung their heads in unison when hearing the news about wide receiver J.J. Moore, who fractured his left ankle in the first quarter of their 27-0 win over Northeastern Saturday.

"We've lost him for the rest of the year," UMass coach Don Brown said. "He's out for six to eight weeks for sure."

The news was tough to swallow, even after hearing it for the second time, as Brown told the Minutemen of their teammate's fate in the locker room just a few minutes earlier.

"You can't replace J.J.," Cobbs said. "He stepped up his game a whole notch. He was so much more aggressive this year than last year, the way he plays the ball and goes up to get the ball, the way he blocks and what he does after the catch.

"It's really sad to see someone go down like that, especially one of our top receivers that we really, truly need in this program."

Moore was lined up to the left of quarterback Liam Coen, and he quickly cut in behind his blockers when the ball was snapped. Coen slung his pass out to the sophomore wideout, who was set up nicely on the screen play.

Sophomore J.J. Moore is expected to miss the remainder of the season.

Moore took the ball and cut in a little more towards the middle of the field and gained 14 yards to the NU 28-yard line for a UMass first down.

But after getting hit awkwardly in the left leg by a Northeastern defender, he couldn't move off the field on his own power.

Moore finished his afternoon with that one catch.

He leads the Minutemen with 27 catches and 337 yards, and his two touchdown receptions tied him for the team lead with Rasheed Rancher.

Moore broke a UMass record when he caught 13 passes in the team's loss at Colgate on Sept. 10.

Day finds new role in offense

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

There was something different about the pregame warm-ups before Saturday's contest between the Massachusetts football team and Northeastern.

There were three quarterbacks – Liam Coen, Taylor Humphrey and Scott Woodward – loosening up by tossing passes out to wide receivers and defensive backs.

But senior quarterback Tim Day was nowhere to be found until a number-10 was spotted running an out-route towards the far sideline.

It was never announced that Day would see some time at wide receiver so watching him warm up with the likes of Brandon London, J.J. Moore and Rasheed Rancher seemed a bit curious.

And then he appeared on the field – during the game – lined up as a wide receiver in the right slot. It turned out that he was in to block for a running play, but Liam Coen's audible changed all of that.

The redshirt freshman quarterback looked right and released a high throw, causing Day to leap and bring down a five-yard reception good enough for a UMass first down to the Northeastern 25-yard line.

"I was in just to block," Day said. "We were going to run the ball the other way, and they ended up calling an audible. So I ran and a first down to the seven-yard line.

"We ran it all week in practice, and it was wide open every time we ran it," Day said.

Two plays later, Coen hit Kyle Harrington for a six-yard touchdown pass to finish off the game's scoring.

"The guy has given us everything he can give us," Brown said. "He is a very good athlete. He can run around and catch the ball, and we're just trying to make use out of all of our players. The whole goal and his whole goal is trying to win.

"I'm proud of him and how he handled our situation, and he made the biggest play of the game today on the third-and-long."

Tim finished the day with those two receptions for 25 yards, both of which led the team, but it wasn't the last action he saw on the field.

During a fourth-quarter drive, Day lined up as a wide receiver again on a running play. He made his way into the secondary where he found and firmly planted Northeastern safety Lamar Gay.

"When I hit him," Day said, "he looked up and didn't know what happened. I said, 'Yeah, you just got knocked down by a quarterback.'"

A quarterback?

Not anymore.

James breaks interception record

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

He had done it so many times before. To be exact – nine times in high school and 18 times previously during his collegiate career. But on Saturday, while the Massachusetts football team pummeled Northeastern 27-0, Minuteman free safety Shannon James intercepted his 19th career pass, breaking the previous UMass record.

For James, who leads all active players in career interceptions in Division I-A and I-AA football, he knew he had this one from the start.

The record pick came on the first play of the second quarter, with UMass holding a 13-point lead. From his own 32-yard line, Northeastern quarterback Anthony Orio dropped back, looking to hit receiver Cory Parks on a hitch pattern near the right sideline. As Orio released the ball, James jumped the pattern and grabbed the intended pass.

"When he stepped back, I thought [Orio] was three-stepping, I knew [Parks] was running a hitch," James said.

With an open field in front of him, James raced down the sideline and the rest was history as he did a flip across the goal line and onto a puddle on the ground. Although no one has ever picked off more passes in UMass history, this record-breaking interception was shockingly the first time James ran one back for a touchdown.

James' only touchdown of his career occurred on Oct. 25, 2003 against Villanova, after returning a fumble for a touchdown.

Entering the 2005 season, James, who is a Buck Buchanan nominee, was three picks away from breaking the record. After recording one in UMass' 14-6 win at Richmond on Sept. 1, James tied the record on Sept. 17 in a 40-0 shutout of Albany.

With talk of when James was eventually going to break the record now through with, he feels relieved and ready to put it in the past.

"Now there's no more pressure, it's done, so I can move on," James said.

Rams too tough for UMass

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

It rained, but it didn't pour – both figuratively and literally.

While the monstrous rainstorm all over New England this weekend seemed to be less drastic in southern Rhode Island, the scoring was still affected by the weather. That meant the Rhode Island women's soccer team, a usually high-scoring squad that has averaged nearly five goals a game over its last seven matches, was knotted down as well.

Paced by two goals that Massachusetts head coach Jim Rudy called "pretty much unstoppable by any goalkeeper, male or female," the Rams held onto a 2-1 win at home against UMass to give them seven wins in their last eight matches.

The Minutewomen once again dipped below .500 at 5-6-1 (2-1-0 Atlantic 10), while the Rams improved to 7-4-1 (3-0-0 A-10).

The Minutewomen will be back in action on Friday, when they kick off the first of their final two home games against the Duquesne Dukes.

Having switched to a 3-4-3 formation two weekends ago to favor the offense, the high-powered offensive attack of URI forced Rudy to make yet another adjustment.

Sophomore forward Jenny Roehrig moved as a withdrawn winger, roving in both the forward and midfield areas of the left and right flanks. The strategy was to cut off passes being made out of the Rhode Island backfield to perennial scoring threat Melanie Kasparek. When defenders keyed on Roehrig, she was moved to another part of the field. Eventually, several other players were getting involved in this strategy, including midfielder Nadia Villaroel.

To some extent it worked, keeping the Rams' defense on their toes. But at the same time, they faced some troubles with their own defense. URI outshot the Minutewomen 20-11 and 14-3 in shots on goals.

"We weren't too bad. Rhode Island is a team of opposites," Rudy said. "On one hand, they want to attack with midfielders, running all over the place and stretching us good. On the other hand, we stretched them out good. We could get forward and get at them."

Defender Kaelyn Caldwell kept the red-hot Kasparek from being a major factor in the game, keeping her from getting passes or doing anything with the ball.

Except for when coach Zac Shaw switched Kasparek to the other side of the field in exchange for her sister Megan, another dynamic player, midway through the first half. The senior Melanie took advantage of the small opportunity, getting open for a shot and sending it to the far right corner in the 28th minute to put the Rams up 1-0.

URI took that lead into the half and then furthered it after a series of events within the last 15 minutes of regulation. UMass defender and co-captain Amy Maffucci received a yellow card in the 77th minute after a foul outside the 18-yard box. URI was not to be outdone in this moment, however, with their bench receiving a yellow card to match UMass'.

The Rams were awarded a free kick, and Thorunn Jonsdottir delivered the goods with another goal that was buried in the upper right corner, out of reach of goalkeeper Kristin Walker. The goal upped her season goal total to four and upped the Rams' lead to 2-0.

The Minutewomen got one goal back in the 86th minute on a penalty kick by Lindsey Bellini. The goal was set up by a yellow card on defender Molly Parkhurst.

UMass had several more scoring opportunities in the second half, the best coming early in the second half on a shot by Vanessa Patry. After breezing by a URI defender, Patry engaged herself into a one-on-one opportunity with goalkeeper Ria Carroll. With Carroll seemingly dead to rights, Patry's shot was just inches wide of the right post.

Dissapointing loss for UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (4-7 0-1 Atlantic 10) walked off Rudd Field on Sunday dejected, demoralized and defeated – some players with their heads hung low, some kicking the grass in disgust, others with eyes flung towards the sky wondering how their world turned around on the soccer field in just seven short minutes.

It was UMass' first conference match of the season (needless to say, an important one) and after snapping a three-game losing streak on Oct. 1 against Siena with a decisive 2-0 victory, the Minutemen looked to be hitting their stride just in time.

However, after battling Rhode Island in the midfield for the majority of the game, the Minutemen took the lead with just 7:24 remaining in the second half, only to give up two goals before the end of regulation to drop the contest 2-1 in gut-wrenching fashion.

It was a devastating way to start the conference season for the Minutemen, who had preached patience in anticipation of the A-10 schedule despite a poor start to the season.

Eighty-two minutes and 36 seconds had gone by before the first goal was tallied. It was crunch time for both teams, and the game yielded physical play and mental intensity reserved only for the most heated of rivalries.

The Minutemen had not beaten the Rams in their last five tries, dating back to the 2000 season, but sophomore Matt Lemire gave UMass reason to believe with a goal at the 82:35 mark in the second half.

The play began with an inbound pass from the left sideline, about parallel with the 18-yard line of the goal box, from freshman Nick Kelly. The ball found sophomore Kenny Cook who headed it straight back into the middle of the goal box where UMass forwards were fighting for position.

There was a scuffle in front of the net before the ball bounced loose and Lemire put it in for his team-high fifth goal of the season.

With just over seven minutes remaining in the match, Lemire's score looked as good as a buzzer beater, considering that fans had just watched over 80 minutes of scoreless play.

That all changed in an instant.

Just 1:37 later the score was tied, as redshirt freshman goalkeeper Zach Simmons – appearing in his first game back from an ankle injury – was caught out of position. The ball was sent from the midfield on a booming kick towards the UMass goal box and Simmons came out of the net calling for the ball, but junior Stewart Wagner didn't hear him and headed the ball to a URI forward, who chipped it over Simmons and into the back of the net.

It was a devastating blow for UMass, which had the match all but won.

And before fans, coaches and players were settled into their seats after the first flurry of traded goals, URI struck again and left the Minutemen in shock. UMass coach Sam Koch had few answers for what happened during the seven minute whirlwind.

"One second you got lead, the next thing you know you're tied up, the next thing you know you're down," Koch said after the stunning loss. "I have to look at the tape. I don't know what happened. I don't know how it changed so quickly."

The second URI goal was similar to the first in that it was completely unexpected. It started with a kick from the midfield by Lukasz Turnicz (who scored the first goal and finished with three points on the day) to URI forward Jeffrey Gonsalves, who was in a full sprint after getting behind the UMass defense.

All that was left was Simmons, who aggressively attacked the ball but was beaten to the spot by Gonsalves. He rolled the ball gently into the net and took off down the sideline in disbelief. His team had just pulled off the equivalent of a bottom-of-the-ninth comeback.

UMass student sexually assaulted, suspect at large

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A 21-year-old female University of Massachusetts student was sexually assaulted while walking down the street just outside the Southwest Residential Area early Friday morning, according to Amherst police.

Police say at approximately 2:18 a.m. officers responded to an area between Lincoln Ave. and Sunset Ave. on a report of a woman being attacked.

According to police, the assailant approached the woman and knocked her to the ground. While she was on the ground the man allegedly touched her breasts. The woman was not raped.

The woman sustained scratches to her back and side. She refused medical treatment and police are not releasing her name to protect her privacy.

The man fled the area and headed in an easterly direction. Police speculate heavy foot traffic in the area at the time caused the man to flee.

The suspect is still at large. He is described as a white male, college aged, six feet tall, wearing a white t-shirt and a Red Sox hat on backwards.

The matter is still under investigation, said Det. Brian Johnson. Anyone with information is urged to call the Amherst Police Department at 413-256-4015.

Students gather in support of free speech

By Mike Sances
Collegian Staff

Around 100 students and community members, including a handful from the University of Massachusetts, gathered at Holyoke Community College Thursday morning for an rally in support of an HCC student who was maced last week during an altercation between Antiwar Coalition protestors, College Republicans and the campus police over the issue of military recruiters on the HCC campus.

The student who was maced, Charles T. Peterson, was banned from the premises and a protest was formed in support of his right to free speech was quickly planned.

Though Peterson himself could not be present at the rally on Thursday, several demonstrators wore stickers with the words "Where's Charles?", while one student held a sign proclaiming, "We are all Charles."

Justin Jackson, a UMass graduate student and a graduate of Hampshire College, urged participants at the start of the rally to keep the march silent and the subsequent rally "peaceful and non-violent."

While an air of tension pervaded among the HCC campus Thursday morning, there was little that resembled physical hostility of the previous week, when campus police clashed with protestors who were upset over the US military recruiting students on campus.

Marching from the "O parking lot" to the bus circle, and passing through the narrow corridors and staircases of concrete architecture, the marchers drew mostly stares.

At the bus loop, the Antiwar Coalition demonstrators were greeted by seven counter-demonstrators, holding signs that bore slogans like "Stop leftist lies" and playing patriotic music. Due to the increased preparations, however, the counter-demonstrators stood silently behind barricades, politely turning down the volume once the rally began.

HCC President Bill Messner, who has received many telephone calls and letters in support of Peterson and who had been invited to speak at the rally, was also waiting at the bus loop.

Speaking into a bullhorn, Jackson, the UMass graduate student, spoke of the need to shift from simply protesting to resisting, and also said it was important "to look at how our universities are complicit with the war machine," giving the examples of military recruiters and research funds from the Department of Defense.

"Why do we have an FBI agent on our campus at UMass?" asked Jackson.

President Messner then addressed the crowd, saying "in some situations we haven't learned how to be respectful of one another's opinions, and to learn to learn from one another."

Messner then took questions from students. When asked if he would be open to dialogue on removing military recruiters from campus, Messner reiterated the need for discussion on what he said were "divisive issues," like military recruitment. He also said that Peterson had been invited to meet with campus officials Monday.

After the question period, Messner lingered, while the following speaker, another HCC student, derided what he called the "right-wing bigots" of the Bush administration and declared that "our movement will not compromise with right-wing bigots."

Addressing the initial gathering of protestors assembled at the start of the march, John Fitzgerald, an UMass alumnus and Vietnam veteran, drew comparisons between the current war and the student movement to those of the 1960s. The rally, Fitzgerald said, was "our right and our duty, a duty that comes from moral principle."

Fitzgerald said that in comparison to today's movement, it took longer for students to begin speaking out against the war.

"You guys are way ahead of the brothers and sisters who came before us in the Vietnam War," said Fitzgerald.

MIT professor speaks out against war on terror

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Correspondent

Last night, Noam Chomsky, Professor of Linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, delivered the 8th annual Eqbal Amhad lecture at Hampshire College. The event titled "Democracy Promotion, Past and Present: Rhetoric and Reality," took place free of charge in the Robert Crown Center and welcomed hundreds of students, faculty and community members from the five-college area.

An author and leading scholar, Professor Chomsky is known for his outspoken criticisms of American government and the media.

During the hour-long lecture, the crowd listened to Chomsky's words on the spread of democracy, and its intentions connecting with U.S foreign policy, and the current U.S occupation of Iraq, as well as past U.S occupations.

"The promotion of democracy is central to the George W. Bush position on the war on terrorism, and its overall grand strategy," Chomsky said.

Chomsky made note of the Baghdad Gallop poll, which displayed the Iraqi citizen's mistrust of U.S intentions in the Middle East.

"Ninety-nine percent failed to jump on the democratic bandwagon," Chomsky said, "and only one percent believed America's intention was actually the spread of democracy."

Chomsky said the poll revealed that an overwhelming ninety-four percent of Baghdad voters believed that the U.S mainly wanted to exploit the resources.

"It would be one thing if Iraq's resources were carrots and tomatoes," he said, "It is petroleum."

The lecture also touched on Chomsky's position that the government has undermined its own credibility after the shifts in rationalizing the ongoing occupation in Iraq- examples being nuclear weapons, Saddam Hussein, terrorism, and the "spread of democracy."

COURTESY OF MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

Noam Chomsky, Professor of Linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was on hand to deliver the 8th annual Eqbal Amhad lecture at Hampshire College, Tuesday.

Professor Chomsky's career has been based at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he joined the staff in 1955, became full professor in 1961, and was appointed Institute Professor in the Department of Linguistics and Philosophy in 1976. He received his Ph.D. in linguistics in 1955 from the U.Penn. From 1951 to 1955.

Professor Chomsky has lectured at many universities around the globe and is the recipient of numerous honorary degrees and awards. He has written and lectured widely on philosophy, intellectual history, contemporary issues, international affairs, and U.S. foreign policy.

However, Chomsky is most well-known for his groundbreaking theories in human linguistics, a subject which he also spoke on at a lecture delivered to UMass Amherst yesterday afternoon.

The annual Eqbal Ahmad Lecture honors the teaching, scholarship and activism of the late Eqbal Ahmad, who was for fifteen years, a Professor of International Relations and Middle Eastern Studies at Hampshire College. Previous Eqbal Ahmad Lecturers include, Edward Said, Mahmood Mamdani, Dr. Mustafa Barghouthi, and Seymour Hersh.

This years lecture was co-sponsored by "SAGE," a local g assroots peace and justice organization that promotes civil liberties, racial equality, and social justice.

The speech can be seen on the Union Video Center's channel 19, on Saturday and Sunday, at 5:30 p.m. and 11:30 p.m.

UMass professor awarded $21.8M grant

By Mike Parrish
Collegian Staff

The Department of Energy, (DOE) awarded a $21.8 million grant over a five year period to a University of Massachusetts microbiologist Derek Lovley this month.

Lovley, a professor of microbiology was awarded the grant after presenting his proposal in front of a DOE panel in Washington D.C. this May.

The proposal consisted of his research on Geobacteraceae, the microbial family containing energy-harvesting abilities. Lovley's intention in his research, along with the help of graduate students, is to harness the single celled organisms' ability to generate electricity. More specifically the research would begin with finding the rate at which the Geobacter produces electrons and how. Along with discovering these aspects it is important to find what environments the microbe works best in, Lovley stated.

Lovley discovered the microbe himself in the Potomac River in Maryland in 2002. He eventually discovered that it could grow on uranium and iron. He began his research over ten years ago, before coming to work at UMass, when he worked with the U.S. Geological Survey. It has been found through his research that microbes feed off iron to produce energy in the form of electricity.

Essentially, the microbe works as a battery. It strips electrons and dumps them onto an electrode. From there, the electrons flow to another electron containing oxygen and electricity is produced.

Another way to picture it, professor Lovley says, is "it acts like a wire but it's not a metal, it's a protein." Geobacter produces a filament extending off of the cell, resembling something similar to a neuron.

It does not work in the same respects as a neuron, it is a protein and no microbe has been seen to work electrically. It is possible for this microbe to be used as a way of producing nanowires, which is how an electronic device would be powered.

"Microbial fuel cells are a more recent discovery and it is still under development," said Lovley. "There's potential for many different ideas but short term would be to power electronics."

At this point it can be used as a localized power where wires run directly to a device such as a remote controlled robot.

It is possible for the microbe to feed off of organic material. It is plausible that at some point it could power wireless devices. This aspect of the research would not be for sometime to come due to its recent discovery.

The Geobacter has no hazardous affects, because it is a natural constituent of the environment. The microbe also has been found to clean pollution such as uranium and has potential to be used for environmental

As floodwaters recede, Mass. residents rebuild

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

GREENFIELD — Sally Steiner spent Monday collecting the bits of her life not washed away by the flood that destroyed her mobile home.

Part of a ravioli maker. Nail clippers. A corkscrew and nutcracker. All added to the muddy pile on a wrought iron picnic table in front of what had been her home since July.

Her diamond ring was still missing, perhaps mixed with the shards of broken glass that lilled her trailer when it was pushed off its cinderblock foundation and sent crashing into the mobile home next door. At least her grandmother's collection of cups and saucers was intact.

"I don't care about the clothes and the furniture," Steiner said. "It's really the little things that remind you of your family that you hold dear."

Up to 11 inches of rain drenched western Massachusetts over the weekend, sending water from the Green River pouring into the Wedgewood Gardens mobile home park, wrecking Steiner's trailer and about 40 others.

There were no deaths or injuries, but Wedgewood Gardens' 75 residents are now looking for new homes, as the complex was so badly damaged it was condemned.

Emergency response workers were keeping a close eye on the Green River, which flows south from Vermont to a confluence with the Deerfield River south of Greenfield. The forecast called for more rain, sometimes heavy, throughout the week.

"We still have concerns about the possibility of more flooding down that way," Greenfield Emergency Management Director Fred Alden said.

Mayor Christine Forgey declared a state of emergency, which triggers state and possibly federal money to help repair washed out roads, leaking school roofs and other flood damage. She said the estimated cost of the damage won't be tabulated until Tuesday.

Despite the flooding, Gov. Mitt Romney kept his plans to speak to members of an economic club on Monday in North Carolina. Aides said the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency was keeping Romney abreast of the situation.

"If the governor thought for one second he was needed here today, he would be there," spokeswoman Julie Teer said.

New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch returned from Europe to supervise the response to flooding in his state, but the damage there was more severe, blamed for at least three deaths.

MEMA spokesman Peter Judge said the Connecticut and Westfield rivers and their tributaries were receding and expected to fall below flood stage by Monday night.

"I think we've pretty much dodged the bullet," he said.

But that was little consolation to those who rented mobile homes at Wedgewood Gardens for about $400 a month.

"I lost 20 years of baseball, football and hockey cards that I was collecting and wanted to give to my boys," said Denny Phillips, a 50-year-old school custodian.

Rumsfeld approves aid for Central American floods

By Lolita C. Baldor
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld approved the dispatch of military helicopters, food and other aid to help Central American nations inundated by massive mudslides mount recovery operations.

Such catastrophes are too much for any country to handle alone, Rumsfeld said Tuesday, en route to meetings he is hosting in south Florida with security leaders from seven Central American countries. "It looks like it's a terrible natural disaster. It's heartbreaking."

Rumsfeld said the mudslides were exactly the type of crisis that requires the countries in Central America to work more closely together. He said cooperation would also let those nations better handle their security concerns, ranging from terrorism to narcotics and hostage-takings.

U.S. assistance on the way to Guatemala and other parts of the region includes a mix of nine Black Hawk and Chinook helicopters, mostly from bases in the region, with at least six other helicopters getting ready to go soon, Roger Pardo-Maurer, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for Western Hemisphere policy, told reporters. A medical unit from the Arkansas National Guard also was preparing to go.

Pardo-Maurer said the United States was sending food, water, plastic sheeting, medical supplies and other equipment and would be helping to improve communications.

The U.S. relief effort is being coordinated by Army Gen. Bantz Craddock. Rumsfeld was told that rain in the region was expected to continue another seven to 10 days.

Rumsfeld also spoke with Gen. John Abizaid, chief of U.S. Central Command, on Tuesday morning to coordinate a wide range of additional relief efforts for victims of the deadly earthquake in Pakistan. Abizaid and Rumsfeld met with Pakistan's senior representative to Central Command's headquarters in Tampa, Brig. Gen. Ikram U. L. Haq, who told reporters that he believes that the outpouring of earthquake aid from Western nations will have a positive effect on Pakistani public opinion about the West.

In addition to the 12 U.S. and four Afghan helicopters already available in Pakistan, the U.S. military had four more heavy lift helicopters en route, and had identified 36 more helicopters that were being prepared to go.

The Army later announced at the Pentagon that it was sending 25 CH-47 Chinook helicopters to Pakistan from Fort Sill, Okla.; Fort Hood, Texas, and Fort Drum, N.Y. The Army also is sending about 200 soldiers to provide support for the helicopter operations in Pakistan, plus a mobile surgical hospital and a water purification unit from U.S. bases in Europe.

Disaster aid and illegal drugs and arms control problems across Central America will be key topics at the two-day conference in Key Biscayne, Fla. Officials also hope to encourage the Central American countries to develop a regional peacekeeping unit to help improve coordination on border security, crime and disaster response.

Rumsfeld stopped in Tampa to speak with troops at a town hall-style meeting at MacDill Air Force Base. He thanked them for the service and assured them that the United States and its allies will prevail in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Central American ministers meeting, which begins Wednesday, comes just days after mudslides caused by torrential rains buried entire Mayan towns in Guatemala and killed hundreds of people across the region, including in El Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras, Costa Rica and Mexico.

"The purpose is really to look at regionwide cooperation in Central America," Pardo-Maurer said, adding that there is growing interest in developing coordinated responses to drug trafficking, gang crime and illegal arms sales.

Improving security, said Pardo-Maurer, will help boost economic development in the region.

U.S. officials are also concerned about political unrest in Nicaragua, including what Pardo-Maurer called the "brazenly corrupt alliance" between Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega and governing Constitutionalist Liberal Party leader Arnoldo Aleman. The Liberal party last year halted plans to destroy a cache of about 1,000 surface to air missiles that the country had initially agreed to eliminate.

Last week, in a visit to Nicaragua, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick made it clear that the United States sees Aleman, who is serving a 20-year prison term for fraud and money laundering, as a threat to that country's democracy. And he warned that at least $175 million in U.S. aid would be lost if the Ortega-Aleman alliance leads to the ouster of current President Enrique Bolanos.

Pardo-Maurer said U.S. defense officials are concerned because a missile showed up on the black market. He added that Rumsfeld wants to let Nicaraguan military officials know that he is pleased with their efforts to support Bolanos.

Court to rule on wetlands

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court set the stage Tuesday for what could be a landmark ruling on government authority to regulate wetlands and control pollution, giving new Chief Justice John Roberts his first chance to limit federal regulation of property rights.

The justices agreed to take up claims that regulators have gone too far by restricting development of property that is miles away from any river or waterway.

With more than 100 million acres of wetlands in the United States, a total as big as California, the stakes are high, the justices were told.

The outcome could have implications for government authority in regulating construction in obviously environmentally sensitive areas, like Hurricane Katrina-decimated parts of Louisiana and Mississippi, and even land that is not adjacent to water.

The Army Corps of Engineers regulates work on wetlands, which are home to many plants and animals.

"They define wetlands so broadly that even dry desert areas of Arizona are being called wetlands," said Paul Kamenar, a lawyer with the Washington Legal Foundation, one of the conservative groups that called on the court to intervene.

The Bush administration had urged the court to stay on the sidelines.

Environmental cases have been divisive at the court. In 2002, justices deadlocked 4-4 in a case that asked whether farmers should have more freedom to work in wetlands.

In 2001, the court split 5-4 in a ruling that limited the scope of government protection of wetlands, but the decision did not go as far as environmentalists feared.

Environmentalists have been worried about how Roberts will vote in such cases.

Iraqi negotiators say deal reached on constitution

By Sinia Salaheddin
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq—Iraqi negotiators reached a breakthrough deal on the constitution Tuesday and at least one Sunni Arab party said it would now urge its followers to approve the charter in this weekend's referendum.

Under the deal, the two sides agreed that a commission would be set up to consider amendments to the charter that would then be put to a vote in parliament and then submitted to a new referendum next year.

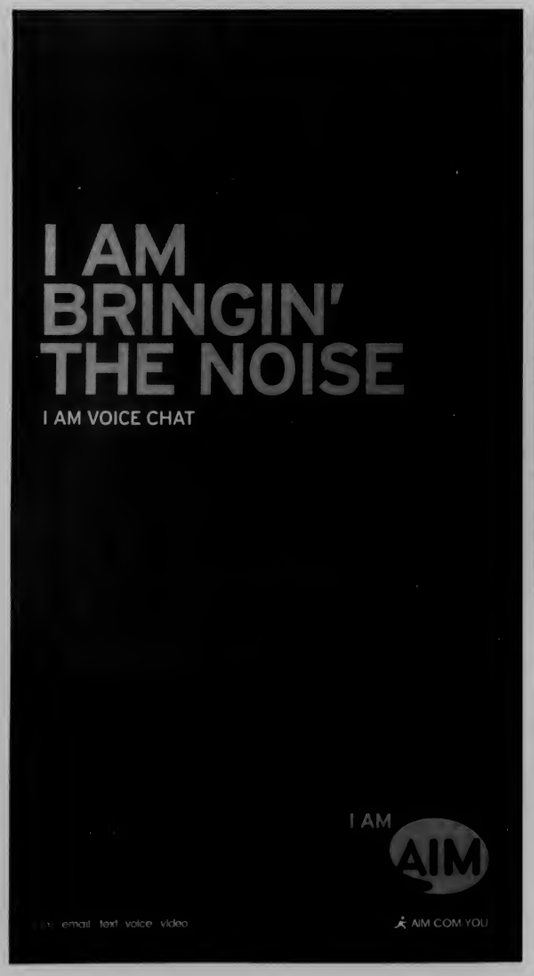
The agreement would allow the Sunnis to try to amend the constitution to reduce the autonomous powers that Shiites and Kurds would have under the federal system created by the charter, negotiators said.

It boosts the chances for a constitution that Shiite and Kurdish leaders support and the United States has been eager to see approved in Saturday's vote to avert months more of political turmoil, delaying plans to start a withdrawal of U.S. forces.

U.S. officials have pushed the three days of negotiations between Shiite and Kurdish leaders in the government and Sunni Arab officials, that concluded with marathon talks at the house of President Jalal Talabani late Tuesday.

A top Sunni negotiator, Ayad al-Samarraie of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said the measure would allow it to "stop the campaign rejecting the constitution and we will call on Sunni Arabs to vote yes." It was unclear if parliament would take a formal vote on the new deal with some lawmakers saying that measure may be read to the National Assembly on Wednesday.

Some other major Sunni parties were not present at the negotiations and it was not clear if they too would be willing to reverse their "no" campaigns.



The Sunni-led insurgents have demanded a boycott of the election and threatened those who would vote.

The announcement was the first break in the ranks of Sunni Arab leaders, who have been campaigning hard to defeat the constitution at the polls.

Ali al-Dabagh, a Shiite negotiator, said the sides agreed on four additions to the constitution that will be voted on Saturday that will allow for future amendments.

The central addition allows the next parliament, which will be formed in Dec. 15 elections, to form the commission that will have four months to consider changes to the constitution. The changes would be approved by the entire parliament, then a referendum would be held two months later.

Sunni Arabs are hoping to have a stronger representation in the next parliament and want to make major amendments to the constitution, particularly to water down the provisions for federalism, which Shiites and Kurds strongly support.

cleaning purposes. Lovley found the microbe converts uranium into a form that is non-soluble in groundwater preventing an easier task of removal. For now, its ability to produce electricity most optimally is a more pressing aspect of research given a need for alternative energies.

The DOE has awarded over $92 million towards a better understanding of microbes and their environments to six researchers including professor Lovley.

Over his ten years of dedication to his research at UMass he's been awarded over $42 million for past projects including this one. He extends his appreciation of the support given by the university as well as the university showing their appreciation to him by revamping the microbiology department in Morrill and supporting his research.

More information on Lovley's research can be found through UMass' Web site: umass.edu.

At the microbiology office inside the Morrill building, there are videos previewing electronics he has been able to power with the Geobacter, such as a robotic dinosaur and multiple battery units he has built using the microbe to power light bulbs.

Potential '08 canidate Romney visits N.Carolina

By Gary D. Robertson
Associated Press

RALEIGH, N.C. — Improving government efficiency makes people's lives better, Gov. Mitt Romney said at a stop Monday in North Carolina during the latest out-of-state trip for a Massachusetts Republican mulling a presidential run in 2008.

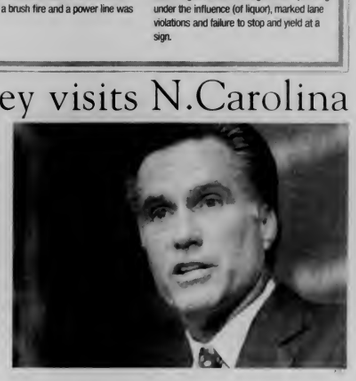
Speaking to a conservative group at a Raleigh country club, Romney chronicled his efforts to help turn around a state government that had a projected $3 billion shortfall when he took office in 2003. The state has a surplus today of hundreds of millions of dollars.

"We did it because we want to see the taxpayers' money spent where it had the biggest positive benefit," Romney told more than 150 people at a luncheon sponsored by the Foundation for NC Future. "I ran for office to try to help people. I didn't run for office to try and balance budgets."

Romney's recent travel schedule has taken him to early presidential primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and Michigan, where his father was governor. Still, despite being hailed as the person behind the success of the 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics, Romney remains largely an unknown political commodity to many in the South.

Romney received polite applause from most of the room during his speech and got a standing ovation after closing his comments with a moving Olympics-related story.

"If he were to be a candidate, his record is exemplary, both in his private life and business life," former North Carolina Gov. Jim Martin said after Romney's speech. Although he's uncertain who else will be running in '08, Martin added: "I'm favorably impressed with him."



Romney didn't mention specifically running for president and has yet to say whether he will run for re-election in 2006. But he did speak briefly about the economic challenges facing the country and the war on terrorism.

Those fighting the United States are "not just intent on blowing up a little bomb here and there at a shopping mall," Romney said. "Awful as that would be, they want to bring down our government, bring down our entire economy. They want to put in place a huge theocracy."

The U.S. is also "under attack economically" as India and China build a work force that will challenge the nation's high-tech dominance, he said. One way to do that, he said, is to make government leaner. Americans must not "lard down government with all of this extra waste, so that our employers and our citizens can't compete globally," he said.

While North Carolina raised taxes during the depths of the recession earlier this decade, Romney said he declined to do so when he took office. He also credited his state's Democratic-controlled Legislature, which can override his vetoes, for helping with reform.

"The problem with raising taxes, particularly in a state that is history of being known as 'Taxachusetts,' is you scare away employers and you also put a bigger burden on working families," Romney said. "It just kills jobs to raise taxes."

Massachusetts Governor, and possible presidential canidate, Mitt Romney speaks to a conservative group at a Raleigh country club.

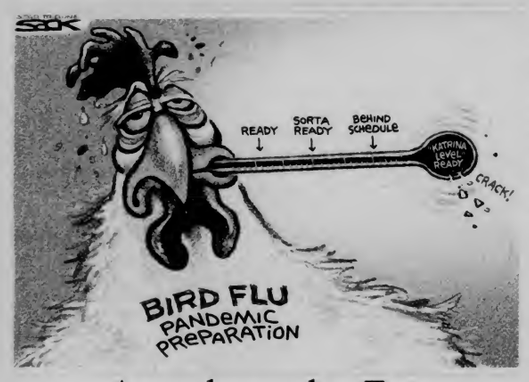
New pedestrian safety plan not entirely safe or necessary

The University of Massachusetts Police Department, in conjunction with the Massachusetts Traffic Safety Research Program (MassSAFE) and the department of civil and environmental engineering through the UMass Transportation Center are finally proposing to do something about pedestrian safety. The plans for this new program center on the concept of surprising the students and catching them off-guard. While learning your lesson the hard way is extremely effective, it may not be the best way to go about it with this campus and these students.

Education about proper Massachusetts pedestrian laws is very important, especially on a campus this size with the amount of out-of-state students who live here. For many people not from Massachusetts, this campus can be very frustrating. Elsewhere, crosswalks are typically only found at intersections and corners. Here on campus, they seem to be about every 200 feet. Having such frequent crosswalks causes more frequent stops by motorists on campus.



However, having police officers pose as pedestrians (while being paid overtime to do so) and ticketing drivers who fail to yield is not the correct solution. According to the article in The Daily Collegian yesterday, "the [police] department plans to stup any non-compliant motorist and, at the discretion of the officer, these drivers could be given a $200 fine, the penalty for not yielding at a crosswalk." The logistics of this plan are not entirely well thought out, unless there were police cars hidden in the parking lots near the heavy pedestrian areas on campus. It is highly unlikely that a police officer disguised as an average pedestrian on a college campus is going to chase down on foot a motorist who failed to yield.

Additionally, the collaboration known as "Cross Safely, Drive Safely" is being funded by a $75,000 grant from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. Surely there are better ways to spend that money than educating students on the importance of slamming the break when someone walks out in front of your car.

The program also proposes to install bump outs on University Drive to help with "improving roadways." Bump outs are extremely dangerous, especially in a heavy pedestrian area. Having the extra land on the side of the curb only increases the possibility that pedestrians will go outside of the crosswalk, thus causing more traffic problems. Also, bump outs are dangerous for motorists as well in that they make it so the driver has to turn the car in an awkward angle to turn the corner safely. Bump outs are designed to make drivers reduce their speed limits but only hinder safe driving as they are not considered to be part of normal driving conditions.

The program is designed to gather information about proper pedestrian/motorist safety and the information regarding its findings will be released at the end of the semester with hopes to solve the problems they encountered. While these results may be useful to those in the administration who are responsible for student well-being, for the students of UMass, this is just another unnecessary movement we will be subjected to without our knowledge or consent.

How to lose the war on terrorism

Andrew Freeman

After Sept. 11, 2001 the American public had one question in mind: how do we lose this war that has been brought upon us? Our leaders pondered this long and hard, and their actions have brilliantly illustrated the best way to lose the war on terrorism. Taken together, these actions give a clear sense of how to lose a global war.

CREATE ENEMIES ABROAD.

The key to any unsuccessful war is to make more enemies than you kill. When your enemies grow stronger with each assault, your defeat is assured. In the Vietnam War, American soldiers destroyed villages and slaughtered civilians in such numbers that the survivors were almost invariably turned against the Americans. In the current war on terrorism, state-sanctioned policies of torture, including the abuse at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere in Iraq, help to rally people against our cause. The practice of "extraordinary rendition," by which suspected terrorists were flown to nations like Egypt or Syria to be tortured, is another example. Torture is just one of the heavy-handed tactics that can be employed to create enemies abroad, however. A far more effective one is war.

START AN UNNECESSARY CONFLICT.

By invading Iraq, a country where Islamic fundamentalist organizations like Al Qaeda were not present, let alone supported, we opened up a new front in the war on terror. Iraqi insurgents are now engaging in acts of terrorism against American troops, as well as against their countrymen. In his Oct. 6 speech, President Bush called Iraq "the central front in our war on terror." This is only true because of our presence there — Iraq played no role in the Sept. 11 attacks, and its leader, Saddam Hussein, had successfully suppressed fundamentalism there. Because we removed Saddam and began to occupy the country, depriving the Sunni Arab elite of political power, they responded by launching an anti-American insurgency.

FAIL TO SECURE AND PROTECT THE HOMELAND.

When the Department of Homeland Security was first proposed by Democrats, the Bush administration was opposed to its formation. However, they soon realized that the idea was an excellent way to score a political victory: they called for a department where the president had expansive powers to hire and fire employees, knowing Democrats would oppose it. Then, before 2002 midterm elections, the administration claimed that Democrats were opposed to national security, leading to Republican gains in Congress.

In the end, however, there is only so much that can be done by our leaders to lose the war on terrorism. We all have to do our part as well, whether it be blindly supporting an inept leadership or being hateful toward foreigners.

Having used national security as a crass political weapon, the Republicans promptly began to waste homeland security funds. In North Pole, Alaska, $500,000 was allotted to protect against terrorism, according to the National Review, and throughout the country states at no risk of terrorism were inundated with homeland security funds. In 2003, $5.47 per person was apportioned to New York, compared with $38.31 for Wyoming, according to the New York Daily News.

DAMAGE THE ARMED FORCES.

Nothing is more effective in losing a war than in squandering the contributions of those who fight for you. The Department of Veterans Affairs, which provides medical services to veterans, announced in June that it faced a probable $2.6 billion shortfall, according to the Washington Post. This resulted from incompetence: the agency underestimated the number of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan who would seek medical treatment by over 70,000. Prior to this announcement, Republican congressmen had successfully defeated attempts by Democrats to raise funding for the VA.

On the field, soldiers are not provided with sufficient armor for their protection, and many have had to purchase it themselves, without reimbursement. This continues despite a 2004 law that required the Pentagon to reimburse soldiers and their families for such expenditures, a law that has not been enforced. Unsurprisingly, military recruitment has declined heavily this year, with army recruiters missing their goals by 7,000 recruits according to the Associated Press. The Bush administration has been doubly successful in damaging the military, weakening protection for soldiers, on and off the battlefield, while discouraging young people from joining it.

In the end, however, there is only so much that can be done by our leaders to lose the war on terrorism. We all have to do our part as well, whether it be by blindly supporting an inept leadership or being hateful toward foreigners. The consequences of not losing a global war are astonishing. The United States didn't lose the Cold War, and look where we are now — the richest, most powerful nation in the world. Unless you want that to continue, it is your patriotic duty to stand behind the president and help lose the global war on terrorism.

Red gummy bears

Sanam Hakim

I like to eat gummy bears. I think they are a great snack. They're not quite as thick and sweet as chocolate, but they have a slight tang to them that makes them the special little snacks that they are. Strangely, however, I only eat the red ones. It's true. I hate the yellow and orange ones because the smell of artificial citrus reminds me of these pills I used to take when I was a kid to help prevent my motion sickness when we went on long car rides. The green ones are just disgusting. Every now and then, I meet someone else that only eats red gummy bears and I think to myself, "Wow, what a coincidence. That is so cool. We are so much alike." Then we become friends.

A common misconception we have adopted in our society is to become friends with people that are similar to us. When we first come to this University, we are encouraged to join Registered Student Organizations or Special Interest groups to meet people that we have a lot in common with. While this is a great way to meet new people, it also puts a lot of students in the trap of "sticking to the same group." You can see this on multiple levels, not only on our campus, but also throughout our colorful nation.

We find comfort in sticking to a group that we have a lot in common with, and there's nothing wrong with that, unless we bind ourselves to it.

I'll start with myself, because I do this too. When I first came to this school, I was immediately drawn to two clubs: the Persian Student Organization (PSO) and Baha'i Club. Why? The Persian Student Organization allows me to be around people that speak the same language as me, have the same traditions as me, who know that the wet green stuff with the kidney beans that my mother brings me is called "Ghormeh Sabzi" and that it is a delicacy, especially over Tadeek.

It is comforting and it gives me a similar feeling to home when I am speaking Persian to someone else. Baha'i Club allows me to be around people who were raised with the same morals as me, who were raised similarly to me, who celebrate the same holidays as me, who fast when I fast and who know who Baha'u'llah is without me having to explain it to them. Usually when I see a Persian on campus, they are hanging out with another Persian, speaking Persian or talking to someone who wishes they were Persian.

The same is true of most racial groups on campus. When you walk around campus, usually you see Koreans walking with Koreans, Dominicans walking with Dominicans, Arabs walking with Arabs, whites with whites, blacks with blacks. Even the living areas are notably "un-diverse." Orchard Hill has a lot of white people. When I say that, I mean that I'm pretty sure if you picked out the minorities from Orchard Hill, there would be six or seven of us standing alone in a corner. If you want to find Black or Latino kids on campus, they're either in Lower Central or in Southwest. If you want to find Asians, head to Northeast.

It's not only racial groups — it's everything else too, which I would describe in fuller detail if I was allowed to use more than 750 words in my column. Think about it — who do you hang out with? Do you have the same interests and backgrounds, the same goals, the same majors? Maybe not, but I'm sure for the majority of the campus, it's true. We find comfort in sticking to a group that we have a lot in common with, and there's nothing wrong with that, unless we bind ourselves to it.

I say go out and join a club filled with people that are completely different from you; learn a different culture, learn to dance, learn a new computer game — do something out of the ordinary. It's a shame to let four years go by without experiencing a little piece of everything this school has to offer or picking up something new while you still have the chance.

I'd like to give a shout out to Brent and Marissa — the tall white boy and short Caribbean/Canadian girl that have gone to three times as many PSO events that I have. Brent was actually the elected PSO Event Organizer last semester. I'd also like to give a shout out to the guys on the fourth floor of Dickinson. Only one of them is Jewish, but they all go to Hillel House and Jewish events regularly, they've learned all the Jewish holidays and they wear "UMass Amherst" shirts, written in Hebrew.

In my four years, I've realized that it's still pretty cool to find someone else that only eats red gummy bears, just like me. However, it's absolutely amazing to find someone that eats only greens, yellows and oranges. That way, we finish the whole bag together and none of the gummy bears go to waste.

An ode to the Zoo

Nick Belanger

I read this page every day, and I am amazed at how serious everyone takes themselves. My fellow columnists here at the Collegian are extremely smart and passionate individuals who produce great insightful columns daily. Granted, in my last column, I too took a serious approach and banged out 700 words of extremely biased journalism, accusing others in the media of being biased, (truly hypocrisy at its best). However I come to you today to tell you that unlike my colleagues, I am neither smart nor insightful. I am an average college dude, and I vow to write for you ZooMass.

Let me begin by saying that I love this school. It's common practice for students to bash the administration, and sure, I can sit here and ramble on about every fee, class sizes and a lack of faculty. Anyone who reads this paper can draw their own conclusions and criticize the university at will, but I want to talk a little about what makes UMass frickin' awesome.

Our mascot alone truly represents the greatness of this school. Could Sam the Minuteman look any more ridiculous? Probably not, and that's why he's great, and a damn fine ice skater as well. Even Playboy Magazine gave him the nod as their mascot of the year. Congrats Sam, you achieved something that we all can be proud of.

I think what makes this school so great is the reputation we have. Yes I am proud that we were named the number nine party school in the nation … and no I don't care what our academic ratings are. Non-students flock here on weekends. UMass is in many ways the Disneyland for keg-loving party goers in New England. I'm proud that other people want to come here to have fun.

Dorm life is truly unique here. With minimal security, and over 40 full residence halls, this place is nuts. There is nothing like smuggling a 30 rack in a duffle bag up four flights of stairs, cramming 10 people in a 10 foot by 10 foot jail cell of a room and throwing a good old fashion dorm party. Seriously, what's better than Keystone Light in a funnel? Nothing, that's what. Nothing, except maybe better beer, and a bigger beer bong.

Pat yourself on the back, you're hot UMass and that alone will get you quite far in life. Sure we may not have a Boston College education, but at least we don't suck.

But the real excitement of dorm partying comes from avoiding RAs and dumping empties in the bathroom trash. If you're lucky the whole floor will catch on, the RAs will mysteriously disappear and the underage alcoholism can spill out into the hallway. Without a doubt, Southwest dominates as far as dorm parties. In particular, I remember as a freshman last year wandering around the halls of John Quincy Adams only to discover a keg on the 14th floor. I cried I was so happy — boozy tears of joy.

Another big reason UMass is way better than any other school in the history of higher education is the extremely attractive student body. I don't want to be rude or sexist, but UMass girls are the best, the coolest and hottest around. And I've heard that us guys are quite the pieces of eye candy as well. Pat yourself on the back, you're hot UMass and that alone will get you quite far in life. Sure we may not have a Boston College education, but at least we don't suck. And we are way more attractive.

UMass is huge, with a student body of about 20,000 there is something for everyone here. Party scene aside, UMass has an RSO for everyone. I encourage everyone to get involved here and make the best of the short amount of time we have here. Take some time off from getting loaded and do something your interested in. Play intramurals, join a crazy political group, pledge a frat or sorority, go to a sporting event, get a job on campus, form a Madden league, whatever. UMass has everything from a comic book club to a rugby team, and if that's not enough start an RSO for yourself.

Identifying with human tragedy

Asif Khan

I came home Saturday night to the news of an earthquake registering at 7.6 on the Richter scale hitting parts of Pakistan, India and Afghanistan. In a couple of minutes I realized that it had hit my hometowns of Islamabad and Abbottabad in Pakistan, two cities where I have spent 16 years of my life. Two beautiful places where the natural beauty is only surpassed by the hospitality and happiness of the people.

The same two places, as well as many other towns and villages, are now in an utter and complete state of devastation. More than two million people have been left homeless, the death count is at 20,000 and rising and relief efforts will be long and tireless as most of the affected areas lie in mountainous terrain with roads blocked off from landslides caused by the earthquake.

Kashmir has been plagued by internal as well as external conflict for the past six decades. This area, arguably one of the world's most beautiful places, has not seen peace until these past two years when the Pakistani and Indian governments achieved a relative peace. Conflict on the border areas in and around Kashmir has since ceased.

This peace and calm would not last for long for these tired but amazingly strong and brave people. The earthquake had its epicenter in the Kashmiri town of Muzaffarabad and caused enormous damage to the surrounding areas. Towns were reduced to rubble, villages disappeared and estimates of up to 30,000 killed and more than 45,000 injured in Pakistani administered Kashmir are now surfacing. These numbers are only going to go up in the next few days.

We get caught up in so many materially oriented actions and goals, and it's sad that it takes something so devastating and tragic like this to wake us up and show us how vulnerable we really are as humans.

Looking back at all of these natural disasters that have affected our world in the past months, I have begun to realize how easily we lose track of what is really important in life. I think that we as humans are sometimes so shallow. We get caught up in so many materially oriented actions and goals, and it's sad that it takes something so devastating and tragic like this to wake us up and show us how vulnerable we really are as humans.

I started to realize this in the past month that my problems and issues are nothing compared to the real problems that people face all over the world, and how I need to help them instead of wallowing in my own self-created problems.

If you are reading this while wearing warm clothes and sitting underneath a warm roof, you are better off than at least 85 percent of the world's population. Certainly better off than the millions left homeless after the South Asian earthquake, the thousands out on the streets in Guatemala because the floods took away their houses or the many people who left all of their belongings to Hurricane Katrina.

My point is, in the future, don't wait for something this extreme to make you be generous and helpful for a day. Make it a part of your life, even if it is a small one. I turn on the news or read it online and everyday there are numbers; 54 killed, 37 injured, 2000 homeless. After a while they just lose all meaning and are just numerical signs on paper or the TV screen. They stop representing people and families and the pain and suffering that is taking place.

This is one of those moments that has changed my life. All this human loss just occurred in a place I call home, and yet I still went on with my day. I had breakfast at 1 p.m., "IM-ed" my friends and it makes you wonder how you got to this point. How did we become so jaded and immune to sorrow and misery? Can it only have any real effect on us if it happens to us or someone we know personally?

While I am studying across the world here in Massachusetts, there is not much I can do except donating to relief agencies and try to get the word out so other people will do the same. That is what I am doing, calling upon the international community to donate whatever they can. Every rupee, dollar, euro or dinar will help these excessively needy people in this extremely trying time.

This disaster is a true human tragedy. The Pakistani people, government and army need all the help and assistance they can get. Whether it is in the form of equipment, food, clothes or money, aid has started to come in, but more is needed, as this disaster will only accelerate. Feeding and temporarily housing more than two million people is no easy task. Since these areas are quite cold by now everything from blankets, clothes and medicines are vital. People have lost everything they held dear. Simple things like blankets or a plate of hot food will bring a smile to their faces. Please visit the Web sites imeworldwide.org and worldvision.org, organizations currently involved in relief work and help them out in any way you can. It is a duty to all of us as world citizens.

Losing faith in the U.N.

Ben Duffy

On the town common in Amherst, there flies the unmistakeable sky blue flag of the United Nations. I guess this shouldn't surprise me; this is the People's Republic of Amherst, after all. It's a left-leaning community, and for reasons unbeknownst to me, lefties seem to get a warm fuzzy inside whenever they think about that massive international body down in Manhattan.

Maybe it's the internationalism of the UN that makes liberals so giddy. The idea of many nations coming together, despite language, race and religion, has a certain appeal. Multiculturalism is, after all, something that every good liberal cherishes.

Or maybe they salivate over the possibility of the first truly worldwide government. Liberals like government, and the more centralized and empowered it is, the better.

My confidence in the UN hovers somewhere around zero. It has many flaws, but its greatest is that it's operated by exactly the people it was originally designed to combat. Essentially, the inmates are running the assylum. The bad guys outnumber the good guys, and the struggle for control over the UN is usually won by a coalition of authoritarian regimes who are looking out for one another.

My confidence in the UN hovers somewhere around zero. It has many flaws, but its greatest is that it's operated by exactly the people it was originally designed to combat.

According to the human rights organization Freedom House, after the fall of communism, free democracies represented only 75 of 184 states in the UN. Liberal western countries, such as the United States, Australia and Belgium were the exception, while notorious regimes such as North Korea, Zimbabwe and Iran were the rule.

And the UN reflects its membership. For example, in 2001, the UN hosted a "Conference Against Racism" in Durban, South Africa. The longest ovations went to the despots Fidel Castro and Robert Mugabe. Castro is certainly a tyrant, and should be given no shelter at any UN conference. But whether he is a racist or not is up for debate. Mugabe, on the other hand, has engineered the execution of, and stolen the land from, thousands of white farmers in Zimbabwe, besides numerous human rights abuses against his own black countrymen, whom he claims to represent.

In 2001, the United States was booted from its position on the UN Human Rights Commission after extensive lobbying from China, a legendary human rights abuser. That year, Libya took over the chair of the "Human Rights" Commission that included Cuba, North Korea, Iran, Niger, the Congo and Saudi Arabia. None of these nations should be within a 10 mile radius of a "human rights" commission.

The membership of this committee is not much better today. Gracing the committee's roster is Sudan, of all countries. In 2005, slavery is still practiced in some parts of Sudan, along with beheading, stoning and crucifixion. Meanwhile, they continue to pursue a policy of genocide that has resulted in the largest humanitarian crisis of this young century. In 2004, at the height of the crisis, the UN attempted to pass a resolution condemning the Sudanese. The initiative failed, with China, Pakistan and Algeria all voting no.

It's not an isolated incident either. Time and time again, the UN has sheltered tyrants.

For the Clinton fans out there, I present to you Kosovo in the year 1999. Kosovo is not a soverign state, but a section of Serbia, and home to an embattled Muslim minority that was being slaughtered by the war criminal Slobodan Milosevic. The Clinton administration intervened, conducting a war that, by UN standards, was illegal.

Clinton was interfering in the interanal affairs of a soverign nation. He did not attempt to secure the blessing of the UN, and for good reason. Russia, a veto-wielding member of the Security Council, would have nixed the initiative.

Clinton saved countless lives and initiated the chain of events that brought Milosevic to justice. This would not have happened if the UN had had its way. Milosevic knew that he was operating under the protection of the Russian veto. By UN standards, Clinton was wrong. Sticklers for UN approval must admit that they believed that following the corrupt UN dictate was more important than stopping the carnage in Kosovo.

Why? Because Russia, through the UN, was sheltering Milosevic. Actually, the UN shelters lots of Milosevics; most recently, Saddam Hussein. The Iraqi dictator bought at least three allies on the Security Council using the corrupt UN Oil-for-Food program. Let's name them: China, Russia and France.

All three of these nations, along with 13 others, approved UN Resolution 1441, giving Iraq "a final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations." The term "final opportunity" was used because this was the 17th, and supposedly the last, resolution to be brought against Iraq over a period of twelve years. But when it came time for action, France, Russia and China, serving their master Saddam Hussein, would not authorize force. They hid, and continue to hide, behind a veneer of "peace" and "prudence."

Dictators all over the world have learned this new trick: make friends at the UN, and you're untouchable. These are only a few examples of dictators taking refuge in the UN. There are more, and there will certainly be more in the future. The UN is a den of snakes, and needs serious reforms before it can ever again be referred to as "the stamp of international legitimacy."

Blue state elitism

Greg Collins

Individuals will frequently form opinions about a person on the basis of unsupported generalizations and assumptions, like a person's race, ethnicity, job or educational background.

This summer, I worked at a wrap and smoothie restaurant in a supposedly liberal suburb of Boston. I would work behind the "line," the place where employees — the vast majority of them being immigrants from Brazil — would make sandwiches and wraps in front of customers. Too often customers would come in and order, and when a worker would ask them to repeat their request, customers would grimace instead of simply repeating the order. Many made no effort to talk to the workers, and when their wraps were finished, the customers would grab them and walk off in disgust without even a thank you.

I learned later that some of the employees had developed their own successful businesses in Brazil and had accumulated a significant amount of wealth before coming to the United States. It is ironic that many of the people we served would have most likely refused to consider working a job like this full time. They would never think about working at such a place, even though making sandwiches and wraps under pressure requires more skill and intelligence than many white collar jobs.

[Many of the people we served] would never think about working at such a place, even though making sandwiches and wraps under pressure requires more skill and intelligence than many white collar jobs.

In a supposedly liberal suburb, why were customers often so curt with the employees? In large part the disrespectful behavior of the customers was based on stereotypes of minorities working in a demanding food service environment while grasping the English language.

I learned more about diversity and self-esteem working at this wrap and smoothie restaurant than I did throughout my 12 years of public school education, which preached feeling "good" about myself and respecting "differences."

Every day the workers would make wraps with expertise, and their patience and food-making precision embodied ideals of humility and perseverance amidst a hectic environment and discourteous customers. Economist and sociologist Thomas Sowell said it best when he noted that the world would be worse off without any nannies than without any sociologists.

Unlike "investigative" journalists and prominent academics, wrap makers, janitors, homemakers, cafeteria workers and auto mechanics don't have bylines next to their work in national journals or international newspapers like the New York Times – even though they provide more essential services to Americans than many reporters and academics do.

Stereotypical thinking is also apparent when the topic of college is brought up. The first level of acceptability is whether someone is going to college, without consideration of whether there are legitimate reasons for them not attending college or for deferring a post-secondary education, such as working to make money for your family or interning at a family business.

The next step is what college you are attending. Among all too many suburban adults and students with whom I have spoken, generalizations associated with the stereotype of the supremacy of private colleges and universities over public institutions are prevalent. The images ingrained in the minds of many northeast individuals is ubiquitous with Ivy League schools and other nationally recognized universities that, either because of their reputation or famous academics, connote certain status symbols superior to those of public schools which have little basis in reality.

It is necessary to be aware of stereotypical assumptions regarding individuals and institutions. The trouble comes when these suppositions trump the truth, whether the truth complies with these vague assumptions or not. Maintaining such generalizations – refusing to recognize that a worker's struggle to learn English well while supporting a family requires great resiliency and intelligence; refusing to recognize that someone may enjoy making sandwiches for a living; refusing to consider the benefits of public institutions – not only does a disservice to all individuals whose unique characteristics transcend every imaginable racial, ethnic and socioeconomic stereotype, but also impoverishes the spirit of the one doing the stereotyping.

Basic human rights for all

Ian Greenleigh

Immigrant-rights groups often rely on arguments that completely contradict their humanitarian cause. The debate rages on in its typical reactionary fashion, where the cloud of accusation and emotional fervor prevents the rational consideration the issue merits. The argument that the United States is utterly dependent on, and should therefore permit, illegal labor, perfectly encapsulates a callous betrayal of the very individuals immigrant-rights groups claim to fight for.

The hard work of undocumented immigrants has indeed contributed to this nation's prosperity. Illegal immigrants are lured across our borders every day by promises of better pay and fair treatment. Some see their dreams fulfilled, and their success stories entice others to try their hand at the American dream. Thousands of hopefuls arrive daily to see if the stories are true. All too many now regard them as myths.

Prosperity does not justify exploitation. Those employing illegal immigrants have little incentive to treat laborers fairly. Tragically, exploitation is profitable. Illegal immigrants are not afforded the same rights Americans take for granted and legal recourse is usually not an option for someone who fears retribution, deportation or unemployment.

Yes, the average American enjoys the low priced goods and services made possible by illegal labor, but this in no way justifies its occurrence.

The people behind the American labor movement fought valiantly to protect the rights of working men and women. The rights of citizens employed in the United States are secured by countless labor laws and regulations. These rights do not necessarily encompass non-Americans. As a result, the exploited remain in the shadows.

Those who want to strengthen border security are labeled racists, rednecks, xenophobes and hypocrites. Anyone opposed to unchecked-border crossing is considered ignorant of the economic benefit resulting from immigrant labor. What about the hypocrisy of human rights groups justifying porous borders, because they allow for a system of labor exploitation to continue? Yes, the average American enjoys the low-priced goods and services made possible by illegal labor, but this in no way justifies its occurrence. The same argument could be used to support the slave trade; the antebellum economy certainly benefited from free labor. Neither form of exploitation can be justified by the economic benefit provided.

Many studies have found a correlation between an influx of illegal laborers and a reduction in wages for native-born United States citizens. This phenomenon is also reminiscent of the South before abolition. Far from benefiting from the institution, non-slaveholding Southern whites had dismal employment opportunity in a system that relied on free labor.

Today, the temptation to utilize the lowest-cost labor possible remains, and creates an economic climate in which native unskilled laborers are simply unable to compete. Those who do find menial jobs are seeing their wages suffer as they are forced to choose between unemployment and an ever-shrinking paycheck.

Some allege that immigrants only take positions American citizens have no desire to fill. A study entitled "A Jobless Recovery?" found that "even those occupations with the highest concentrations of new immigrants still employ millions of native-born workers." Many other studies refute this "lazy American" argument.

Granting amnesty to immigrants who have entered the United States illegally is not the solution either. The problem with amnesty programs is that they promote illegal immigration. While efforts to bestow essential rights to people who live within our borders are noble, they are also problematic. It is unrealistic to grant legal status to everyone who finds his way here. No nation on Earth can be expected to shoulder such a responsibility.

As such, no seriously considered policies have been aimed at granting legal status to all immigrants. However, amnesty eligibility has grown more encompassing resulting in an increase in illegal immigration. The illegal labor market is growing as amnesty hopefuls flood into the country and those that are ineligible or awaiting confirmation seek employment. More illegal immigration results in more exploitation, despite efforts to legally recognize undocumented individuals.

No single remedy exists for the abuse illegal immigrants encounter daily. People who cross the borders are subjected to exploitation at every stage in their journey. They are treated like cargo by the coyotes who smuggle them and are ripped off by document forgers who take what little monies they have earned. Efforts to prosecute foreign nationals for these crimes are opposed and deemed racist. When they finally arrive, immigrants are further victimized by a black market that fails to acknowledge their basic rights.

Sadly, those who claim to speak on their behalf justify illegal immigration by praising the alleged economic benefit it provides. In doing so, they legitimize a system that values them as nothing more than cheap labor.

Blending traditional with contemporary

By Pete Corbett
Collegian Correspondent

New Asian Cinema? What's that? Why bother? Movies with subtitles aren't worth the effort. Why bother learning about other cultures? Asia? Where is that?

This is the standard conversation when foreign films are brought up. People assume that the films will be obscure, nonsensical and serious. What they don't expect are the films that are going to be shown as a part of the Asian Arts and Culture Program put together by the Fine Arts Center this fall.

A series that is designed to increase attention towards gender roles and foreign cultures, New Asian Cinema is not the average foreign film festival. Ranjanaa Devi, Director of the Arts and Culture program, has lined up several films that are directed by women, discuss gender or deal with religion.

The planning for the New Asian Cinema series began five years ago. It was decided upon because it would bring more in-depth understanding to cultures that do not get a lot of press in the United States. The planners, Devi and her colleague Anne Ciecko, an assistant professor in the Communications Department, wanted to incorporate "the traditional and the contemporary" in this series. They wanted a mix of many aspects of the Asian cultures they were representing in this program.

When deciding on which films to screen for the series, Devi and Ciecko were looking for what was "relevant and artistic while still being of social importance." They feel that students at UMass are not privileged elite, and therefore do not have the opportunity to travel to varying cultures. The New Asian Cinema series is a way for worlds to be brought to the UMass population and to give students a chance to "look globally at what kind of connections they can make." The next night of films is Tuesday, Oct. 25. That night there will be Indonesian movies about confused young people. One of the features will be "Ada Apa Dengan Cinta?" ("What's Up With Love?"), by Rudy Soedjarwo. It was a blockbuster in Indonesia, apparently. It stars Dian Sastrowardoyo and Nicholas Saputra. The show starts at 7 p.m., and is free and open to the public in School of Management room 137.

On Tuesday, Nov. 1, again in SOM 137 at 7 p.m., "Anak" ("A Child") will be playing. It is a film by Rory B. Quintos, a female Filipino director. She documents the story of a contract worker who, after years abroad, returns to her family in Hong Kong.

On Nov. 8, two features by Samira Makhmalbaf will be played, "God, Construction, and Destruction," a short, and "Blackboards," a full length.

Nov. 15, in SOM 137 at 7 p.m., "Wheel of Time" is playing. Written and directed by Werner Herzog, this film takes a close look at Buddhism, and what it is regarded as in today's world. Herzog also investigates the rituals surrounding the ordination of Buddhist priests.

The final screening of the series will take place on Dec. 6, a showing of "Becoming X," a series of Asian-American shorts on female gender.

'Sims 2: Nightlife' adds vampires, love and cars to popular series

By Teresa Reilly

Electronic Arts Games has released its newest addition to the "Sims" collection, "the Sims 2: Nightlife." It creates a whole new set of possibilities to the already impressive "Sims 2." This new expansion pack includes everything from a new pleasure aspiration, to cruising around in your very own car, to getting bitten by a vampire.

Publisher: EA Games
Developer: Maxis

After the immense success of the original "Sims," EA Games released an entirely new version of the popular game in Sept. 2004. They're reaching higher with this version; "the Sims 2" adds a smorgasbord of desires and wants to the lives of a Sim, allowing for a much more detailed playing game. Now players can build multiple levels of a mansion, thus opening up the possibilities for houses. Users can also pick the exact facial features of their Sims, which allows you to create a decent replica of yourself.

In older versions of the game, part of the goal was to get married, have children and create a family. "The Sims 2: Nightlife" has taken the process of finding that special someone to a whole new level. If you happen to have trouble finding that person of your dreams you can call up the Matchmaking Service, which will not only hook you up with a date that is destined to go well but will also provide you with love potion (at a cost, of course) that will make you irresistible.

Your dream Sim date will fall from the sky and a meter will appear in the right hand screen to let you know how the date is doing. This meter also provides you with what your date's wants, helping you to figure out what to do in order to have the perfect date. If your date goes well you may receive a love letter in your mail (or a hate letter if things don't go as planned) or even flowers on your doorstep.

If, while on your date, the atmosphere gets a little boring, you can hop into your new car and cruise over to the new huge downtown area. You and your date can do anything from bowling to karaoke to a nice walk in the park to a fine dinner. At night, however, you may want to watch your back for the vampires that prowl. Should you encounter a vampire in your travels and happen to get friendly with them, you might wind up with a bite on your neck and the sudden ability to fly as a bat. If life as a bat doesn't appeal to you, simply call up the Matchmaking Service and buy the anti-vampire potion that will cure you.

"The Sims 2: Nightlife" carries over 125 new objects, including a DJ station, photo booth and karaoke. Perhaps the best new series of objects are cars. Before this new addition, a car would come to pick you up and carry you to work or wherever else you desired. Now you can buy your own car, build a garage for it and

"The Sims 2: Nightlife" challenges players to find romance, party and perfect their karaoke skills.

Stallions dance at Mullins

By Alex Butler
Collegian Correspondent

"Dancing white stallions?" you ask. How will these riders harness this ability? They must be liars, cheats. There is no chance I will fall for this, not me. Not this early in the year, anyway. No Way.

And I was with everyone else when I first heard about this event. Skeptical of this "Austrian tradition," which has been around for more than 425 years, I went right to the source: one Mr. Troy Tinker, the master of ceremonies for the World Famous Lipizzaner Stallions. I need my questions answered. And on the morning of Sept. 27, I got them.

"The horses do it all on their own. The actions the horses perform are not taught by the riders," Tinker told the Collegian in an in interview. "What we do to put a show such as ours is simply teach the stallions cues."

The actual troupe has a prestigious history, as well. The "equine ballet," or, as it was labeled by an English reviewer, the "Rockettes of the Horse community," has a powerful following. They are just third in crowd pleasers, nationwide. They fall behind only The Ringling Bros. and Barnum and Bailey Circus and the Harlem Globetrotters. For thirty-five years, the World Famous Lipizzaner Stallions have wowed audiences across oceans and borders, and have continually cured the non-believers. And now they have set their sights for Amherst.

Tinker went on to describe how the event would unfold. "I basically narrate the act. I explain to the audience what they should expect to see. When the twelve stallions all come out, the audience is usually overwhelmed and they really don't know what comes next, or what to look for. The steps, leaps and kicks of the horses somewhat symbolize the relationship between the rider and horse. The process in which the whole event pans out is more of a refined act of nature than anything else. The dance altogether, I think, shows the relationship between man and animal."

I am told the relationship is not exaggerated. After roughly three to four years, the dozen all-male stallions are taught for another six to nine years in preparation for the event. This is dedication, my friends, no question about that.

So what, though? Who cares? This is probably the dream of some crazy hippie in the woods. Training horses to dance?

Oh no, not this one. Tinker went on. "This 'dance' of stallions is a very long and historic tradition. Roughly 430 years ago, in Austria and in the current area of what is Slovenia, the Austrian army began training their horses for battle. These battle horses were trained so extensively that, even in peace times, the horses kept their routine. The drills from the battlefield kept up. Audiences began to grow around their talents, and soon, the tradition was born. Not long after, Mozart actually created music for the horses to dance along to."

And so it is. On Oct. 15, all of Amherst is invited in to watch the beautiful pearl stallions do their thing. All ages are welcome to come to the Mullins Center and, while listening to the gorgeous classical music, watch the dance of riders and horses, of men and animals. Giddy-up.

The World Famous Lipizzaner Stallions carry on a 430-year-old tradition of horse ballet.

'Maybe' almost always means 'no'

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

One of my best guy friends was seeing this girl who he really liked, and it was obvious that she really liked him, too. The twist to this story is that Miss Wonderful had a boyfriend.

Against my advice, he continued to see her for a few months. Although the situation changed, and the two got closer, and she kept telling him how much she'd rather be with him than her boyfriend, she never did it.

She would tell him things like, "I just need to find the right moment," but somehow that moment never came. Now, I know from what he told me that this girl really did have feelings for him, but in my eyes that wasn't good enough. As he and I have been friends forever, I asked him the tough questions: If she really wanted to be with him instead of her boyfriend, why didn't she just do it? Yeah, breaking up is always difficult, but it's not impossible.

Besides, how would he know, if she did break up with her boyfriend, that a few months down the road she wouldn't do it to him? After being in the hot seat, my friend said to me, "Hannah, I know. I just want to enjoy it for now." I said okay, and didn't bring it up again. A few phone calls later, he had decided the girl was crazy. He realized that she would call him all the time, and that he would be there for her anytime, and that he was doing all the boyfriend duties without actually being able to call her his girlfriend.

This girl may have had innocent motives, but it doesn't change the fact that what she was doing was wrong. It was disrespectful of her current boyfriend and of my friend to think she could hold on to both at the same time without making a decision as to whom she wanted to be with. And by accepting his second-place treatment, my friend was essentially lowering what he was worth in her eyes, without knowing it.

If someone accepts secondary treatment, or any kind of poor treatment, it's only sending the subconscious message that, "yes, you can treat me this way." Guys and girls, never accept anything but the best; any repetitive maltreatment should not be tolerated under any circumstances.

I also told my friend what one of my friends told me (as I used to have the habit of hanging on to less-than-stellar guys who were definitely not treating me how I wanted them to). My friend said to me, "Hannah, never make anyone a priority who makes you an option." Her words have never left me, and it's a motto of mine that I try to remind myself of anytime someone's not treating a friend as they deserve.

In another case, the girl did break up with her boyfriend, before deciding she liked being single and left the guy she was seeing on the side in the dust. She told him maybe someday they'd be together if things were meant to be. This is basically like telling the person to keep trying to push that huge stone wheel up that hill, maybe forever.

If this happens to you, let your head take over your heart: if it's not a yes, then it's some kind of no. You can dabble in the non-relationship for a while if you want to, but eventually you have to cut your losses, pick up the pieces and move on to better things.

The infamous "maybe" tends to play out when people are ending relationships. The dumpee wants to know if they'll be together again, trying to understand why the dumper is ending the relationship. The dumper, still confused about his or her feelings, and dealing with the massive guilt that comes with hurting someone he or she loves, says maybe.

All I have to say, beyond what I've already said, is that this is when you need to play Jack Johnson's "Flake" and sing along to the part that goes, "It seems to me that maybe/pretty much always means no" and cry yourself to sleep.

In both of these cases, the girls probably weren't playing some part from "Cruel Intentions," but they were being jerks. They were both using the on-the-side guys, although not in the conventional sense. Newsflash: using people isn't just physical; people can be used for companionship and the security of having someone there. How do you tell if someone's using you? Ask yourself if it's an equal exchange, if you're getting out exactly what you're putting in. If mutuality doesn't exist, one person is benefiting more than the other, and someone is being used.

'Ultimate Spider-Man' not so 'ultimate'

The Gameroom
Carlos H. Cruz

"Ultimate Spider-Man"
PC, Xbox, PS2, Gamecube
Publisher: Activision
Developer: Treyarch
Action

Everyone knows that Spider-Man is the best superhero ever created. Well, okay, that is just my opinion, but you have to admit, Spider-Man is pretty cool. With the release of the last two "Spider-Man" movies, America has caught Spider fever and the video game industry has come along to cash in with mediocre game adaptations of the movies. The "Spider-Man 2" game was quite fun, though. Unlike the original "Spider-Man" movie game, this time your movement wasn't limited to predetermined paths. This time, you had an entire scale rendering of New York City to swing about at your own will and that was, as they say in this great state, wicked.

The game had decent graphics that did a good job of recreating the atmosphere of the movie, although non-hero characters looked quite pixilated and the gameplay got quite redundant. Besides the very hard story missions, you had to pick fights with random gangs, save people from buildings and the impossible and stupid "stop the little kid's balloon from floating away" mission. I never caught a single balloon.

The game had a bit of complexity to it; you could buy upgrades that made your devastating attacks even cooler looking. The key to getting Spider-Man right is to pull off cool moves and master the swinging controls and that game got them both right. The big problem was that for all the stuff you could do, it was all irrelevant because you could beat the game without purchasing the more complex moves and all the side missions made the game really boring after you were done.

This time around, developer Triarch decided to make a game based on the "Ultimate Spider-Man" universe. "Ultimate Spider-Man" is a modernized version of the Spider-Man character where he is placed in our modern world, is in high school and is just learning to use his spider powers. Everything is retold and revamped, so things are quite different than they were before. The comic is the best selling superhero comic out there now, so it was quite a no-brainer to base the new game in that world.

The story places you in the middle of the series and does a poor job of bringing someone who isn't an "Ultimate Spider-Man" fan up to speed. In the game you play as both Spider-Man and Venom as both of you try to find out what the link is between Eddie Brock, Spider-Man and the mysterious Venom suit that was created by both of the characters' fathers. Correction, Spider-Man tries to find the connection, while Venom just runs around destroying stuff. Yeah, Spidey does most of the legwork in the game. Venom's missions are just arbitrarily placed to further gameplay.

The graphics engine has been overhauled from the previous games this time around. Now, the developers have created a style that recreates the comic book feel. The game is, quite literally, a three-dimensional comic book. This is added by a look that looks like cell shading but isn't. Everything is live and colorful and all the character models are detailed and are gorgeous to look at.

A cool new feature to the game is that you can do heroic things like lift up cars that have fallen on people and get them to safety. Approaching a blue dot that represents a danger area activates a kind of mini-game that requires you to do certain things with left and right triggers. This is a cool addition but it is only done during story missions, and not enough.

New York was recreated again in "Ultimate Spider-Man," but this time it isn't real world New York or even movie New York. You are placed in the New York of the series, with landmarks that fans of the comic book will recognize. The downside to this is that the size of the city had to be reduced in order to allow you to get access to Queens, which is where Peter Parker and all his friends live. It is quite odd to travel around the miniaturized New York because a lot of the time you want to spend your time web-swinging forever and you quickly run out of skyscrapers. The addition of Queens doesn't really help much, because Queens is mostly a residential area with few tall buildings. Lame.

The game is very, very short. I beat the game in two days. The developers added some bonus side quests, but those got boring fast. The story missions are very fun and challenging. The bosses are mostly hard but it feels really great when you finally beat one. Just like "Spider-Man 2," you have some upgrades. The city is littered with race markers where you can go through obstacles courses that, once completed, get you swing speed upgrades. There are no cool trick upgrades for fighting; the technique is just plain button mashing. Even the speed upgrades aren't needed, because it wasn't until I beat the game that I bothered to do the races that gave me the upgrades. At that point there wasn't need anymore. There really is nothing more to the game than this.

Everything else in the titles is just a cut-and-paste job from "Spider-Man 2." You still have to catch people that fall off buildings, get people to hospitals and even run around fighting random British gang members. I don't get it, either. I really wanted to love this game, but it just fell short of my expectations. It may be based on the "Ultimate Spider-Man" comic, but it isn't even close to ultimate in play factor. Just rent this, because that is more than enough time you'll need to get all you need from the game. It seems as though there still isn't a better "Spider-Man" game than the first "Spider-Man" game put out by Activision for the original 32-bit systems.

Diaz impresses in 'Shoes'

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

"In Her Shoes"
Directed by Curtis Hanson
Starring Cameron Diaz, Anson Mount, Toni Collette
Fox Pictures
130 mins.
Grade B–

Curtis Hanson is a director who has one of the most impressive track records in Hollywood. He directed "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle," "The River Wild," "Wonder Boys," and "L.A. Confidential," to name several. In "In Her Shoes," the latest Cameron Diaz and Toni Collette film, we feel his intelligent and capable presence behind the scenes.

"In Her Shoes" is a character study of two opposites: Maggie and Rose. Maggie (Cameron Diaz) is a sexual dynamo who can't hold a job, steals money from her father and gets her sister Rose angry enough with her to never want to speak to her again. Rose (Toni Collette) works at a law firm, is competent and has an enormous shoe collection. Neither Maggie nor Rose feels particularly fulfilled by her lifestyle. As the story progresses, each character goes through a transformation, developing herself further and, as a result, wearing big smiles. For Maggie, it's about getting a more well-rounded personality. She finds a grandmother she never knew she had, played by Shirley McClaine. Maggie goes to live with her grandmother at "a retirement community for active seniors," as Maggie calls it. Maggie's not a strong reader and she begins reading to an old man. Rose, on the other hand, quits her law firm job and starts walking dogs for a living.

Quitting your job and finding yourself is an overused plot device, but I didn't mind it. I felt like saying to the film, "Alright, I'll overlook this generic 'characters who change and find happiness' plotline if the film gives us an ending that says something." But no matter how much I begged the film to deliver with something thought-provoking, in the end, it couldn't pull it off. The conclusion of the film gives us some sentimental hooey along the lines of Maggie and Rose being in each others hearts. I'd have been happy with anything slightly universal. For instance, tell us that breaking up with a close friend can bring the two of you closer together in the end. Tell us that there are people in life who make you see what you're missing in yourself. Give us something for the road, anything, please. Nonetheless, to no avail.

The films strengths lie in the acting abilities of the wonderful Cameron Diaz, who finally shows us why she's a star. She's no Meryl Streep, but it's better than Diaz' previous performances. It's a role almost tailor-made for her — ditzy, sexual and capricious. But she's not playing herself. Collette adds another competent performance to her list of successes. Extra attention goes to the lighting and make-up artists who make Collette appear better and better looking as the film progresses, which assists her character change.

The film is sprinkled with bits of humor, though it's not exceptionally funny, and every once in a while we hit a scene that is like form without content. It's a scene that's frictionless and boring, but doesn't cross over any real taboos. This makes the film a little insipid, yet overall, it still comes across as solid. This is due to the direction of Curtis Hanson, who is so familiar with the methods needed to make good films, that he doesn't break any rules. It's the subject matter that needs work, and Hanson should have had the sense to tweak the ending and give us something to think about.

"In Her Shoes" never quite rises to that level of ambition that wants to "wow" us with what it is. It's the sort of film that is difficult to criticize because it is so technically accomplished. On the surface, there's nothing wrong. But when you realize your mind is starting to wander during some scenes, or you ask yourself how many times you've seen movies just like this only more entertaining, the flaws start to amount. "In Her Shoes" gets by under the critical radar, wearing the guise of something technically accomplished, but remaining, nevertheless, slightly dull.

'Nightlife' lets 'Sims' party

drive yourself to work.

With the creation of the "Sims 2" came the addition of aspirations, which basically define what your Sim's needs and wants will be. In "the Sims 2: Nightlife," a new aspiration is added to the possibilities, pleasure. In the pleasure aspiration, your Sim will crave great dates and crazy parties, while fearing embarrassing moments and anything that requires effort.

All great games have their various downfalls and "Sims 2: Nightlife" is no exception. As the "Sims" games continue to expand and include more things, the space that they require also increases. This new expansion requires 1,303 MB of space on your PC, in addition to the original "Sims 2" (which is required to play the expansion) which needs 2,808 MB of space. With all that space being taken up in your computer, the game tends to lag a bit and if your Sim happens to die (which they tend to more frequently in the expansion for whatever reason) you're most likely going to have to wait out a brief game pause.

"The Sims" alone is an amazing game that allows you to control a world in a way that is impossible to in real life. If you are a fan of the popular game in any of its forms than the $30 you spend on this expansion pack will only add to the fun. The creation of "the Sims 2: Nightlife" will once again leave you open to a new world to discover.

Martz leaves Rams indefinitely

By Jim Salter
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS – Mike Martz has been ailing for weeks, feeling well enough to lead the St. Louis Rams from the sideline but not well enough to live up to his own expectations.

On Monday, Martz decided he'd had enough.

The 54-year-old coach announced he's taking an indefinite leave of absence, hoping to recover from an apparent heart infection that an initial round of antibiotics couldn't cure.

Martz was told by a specialist on Monday that his condition, which kept him out of two practices last week, had worsened. While an exact diagnosis hasn't been made public, Martz had been tested for endocarditis, a bacterial infection of the lining of the heart or a heart valve.

Rams president John Shaw said Monday that Martz will be hospitalized four to 12 days but would not speculate on the length of his absence. Shaw said he wasn't told the specific name of the illness, but was led to believe that Martz's heart valve had weakened since his tests last week.

"I think he was concerned he was letting down a lot of people, but also had concern about the gravity of the situation," Shaw said.

The antibiotics that Martz began taking Friday didn't seem to help, Shaw said, but he didn't know if any additional procedures would be necessary. Severe cases of endocarditis can require open-heart surgery.

Assistant head coach Joe Vitt will take over as coach. Martz told his players during a brief but emotional team meeting that he would step aside, Vitt said.

"The team is his concern," Vitt said. "His health is our No. 1 concern."

Martz spoke with a raspy voice after Sunday's 37-31 loss to the Seattle Seahawks, but sounded optimistic about his health. Still, he said that in retrospect, he should have allowed offensive coordinator Steve Fairchild to run the show.

"I wasn't myself this week, the game plan wasn't clear for me," Martz said. "It's over with now, but I just feel what happened to me has affected this team, and that breaks my heart."

Martz was first hospitalized Sept. 30 with what was thought to be a sinus infection. He coached two days later during a 44-24 loss to the New York Giants.

Seahawks coach Mike Holmgren, a friend of Martz's, advised the Rams coach to be careful with his health.

"Really, what I told Mike was – and I put myself in the same category – you get so caught up in this that it, at times, appears to become more than life and death," Holmgren said. "And it's not. It really isn't.

"So, with the health problem like he seems to have, he's got to take care of it. He's got to take care of himself, his family. He's got to think of way more things than football, of winning a football game. But it's hard for us. It's hard for all of us to back away on something like that."

Endocarditis affects 10,000 to 20,000 Americans each year and in some cases can require open-heart surgery, according to Dr. Arthur Labovitz, director of cardiology at the Saint Louis University School of Medicine. Martz did the right thing by stepping down, Labovitz said.

"It's a very serious condition," Labovitz said. "There can be some serious complications that are probably influenced by how you take care of yourself once a diagnosis is made."

Vitt, 51, was hired as assistant head coach and linebackers coach before the 2004 season after four years in Kansas City. Martz and Vitt worked together on the Los Angeles Rams' staff from 1992-94, when Vitt was defensive backs coach and assistant head coach under Chuck Knox.

Now in his sixth season with the Rams, Martz is 56-36 including the postseason. The Rams have missed the playoffs just once in his tenure (2002) and reached the Super Bowl after the 2001 season, losing 20-17 to New England.

Martz joined the Rams as offensive coordinator in 1999, and his high-powered offense led St. Louis to its first Super Bowl title that season. He became head coach following Dick Vermeil's retirement after that championship run.

Mark J. Rebilas/Associated Press
Mike Martz will leave the sidelines for heart treatment.

NFL coaches are notorious for their long hours, and Martz is no exception, sometimes sleeping at the office. And heart problems have affected relatively young coaches before in the high-stress atmosphere of the NFL.

Dan Reeves had a heart procedure while coaching Denver in his mid-40s. During the 1998 season, he underwent quadruple bypass season at age 54 but returned to the sidelines less than four weeks later to coach the Atlanta Falcons to the Super Bowl.

Dallas' Bill Parcells has had several heart procedures and cited health problems when he quit the New York Giants after winning his second Super Bowl with them at age 49 in 1991. He has since coached New England and the New York Jets, as well as the Cowboys.

In 1988, Chicago coach Mike Ditka suffered a heart attack at the age of 49 and missed just one game. Two weeks later, in Washington, he was supposed to be just an observer, but ended up coaching the game.

Owls wake up with three wins

Hot Streak

The hottest team in the Atlantic 10 right now is definitively the Temple Owls, who have won three straight and six of eight after starting the season 1-6 in non-conference games. The team travels to St. Louis Friday to try to continue its A-10 success.

The Owls (7-8 2-0 Atlantic 10) won their season opener at Lehigh, 5-1, but slid to 1-6 overall with six consecutive losses that included shutouts to North Carolina (1-0) and Penn State (3-0).

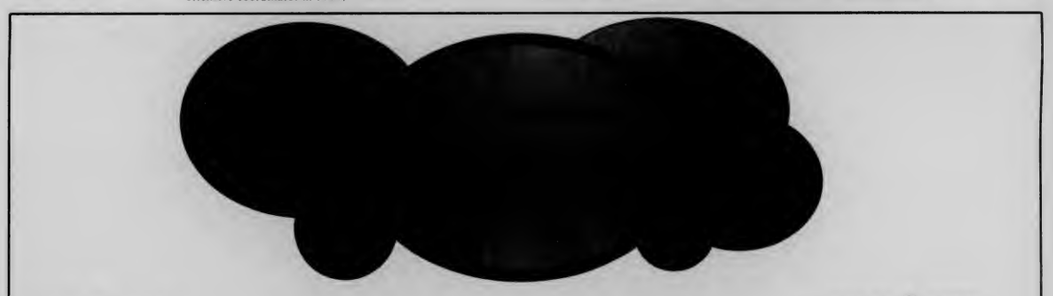
That game apparently sparked the Owls' defense, which heated up with three straight shutouts of their own against Virginia Commonwealth, Delaware and Longwood, scoring two, one and three goals, respectively.

Temple had another two-game skid with losses at Drexel and Rutgers, but quickly righted the ship once more with three consecutive wins, including victories against Atlantic 10 rivals West Chester, a 4-2 victory, and a 2-1 overtime thriller against La Salle.

The defense has been staunch since starting the season 1-6. The Owls have held their opponents to two goals or less, including the three consecutive shutouts in each of the last eight games.

Part of that success can be attributed to last week's A-10 rookie of the week, Temple's freshman goalkeeper Kendra Kennedy, who saw her first action in the second half of the game against Penn State, allowing one goal while making three saves. She got her first start against Rutgers, a game the Owls eventually lost 2-1. Kennedy has four saves in relief of starter Erin Hanshue.

Still Tops in A-10



The surging Owls are not alone atop the Atlantic 10. As expected, the No. 20 Richmond Spiders are ahead early in the A-10 season with two wins last weekend. The Spiders (7-5 2-0 Atlantic 10) defeated UMass 4-1 at home on Friday, and Rhode Island in an 8-0 blowout Sunday at Crenshaw Field. Richmond is the only ranked team in the Atlantic 10, and is favored to repeat as Atlantic 10 champions.

Still, Richmond is only 7-5 overall, raising some eyebrows while showing some vulnerability.

"They're the team to beat even before you saw them [play this year]," said Shea. "They're the ones with the bulls-eye on the back. They're the defending A-10 regular season and A-10 tournament champions, so until that's proven otherwise, they're the team to beat."

Richmond senior Allie Howard was awarded this week's Atlantic 10 Player of the Week honors for her performance in this weekend's games. Howard was credited with live points in the game against UMass, with an assist and two goals, including

Minutemen suffer heart-breaker on Sunday

Rob Greenfield

Sports are often used as a metaphor for life. Grinding through the tougher times, sacrificing mental and physical energy for the greater good, being a leader and working hard to accomplish a common goal are just a few of the many character-building traits that sports engrain in athletes.

These crucial lessons, however, cannot be learned unless a moment is created that allows for adversity to be overcome and athletes to show their fortitude.

That moment was created for the Massachusetts men's soccer team on Sunday.

It was the start of their conference season, and for teams that struggle with non-conference games it provides a rebirth of sorts – a chance for a clean slate, where what the team has done so far disappears from collective memory.

But only some teams are so fortunate.

The Minutemen were 4-6-0 going into Sunday's Atlantic 10 opener. It was a tough 4-6-0, the kind of record that doesn't do justice to a team which has played well enough to win on all but a few occasions, and has had the simple but enormously difficult problem of putting the ball in the net.

Soccer, like hockey, doesn't wow spectators with the vertical prowess of basketball, the violence of football or the towering home runs of America's pastime. The game is played mostly in the midfield, and it is a battle for possession. A team could be dominating the action but have no shots on goal. It is a very unique aspect of soccer.

And it is a very frustrating one for the Minutemen, who have outplayed many teams this season only to see another "1" on the scoreboard at the end of the day. But the speed bumps and near-misses of the first half of the season could have been forgotten with a win against Rhode Island on Sunday.

The match was played with a fire not seen on the UMass sidelines this season, and the sense that it was a must-win game was palpable. UMass coach Sam Koch had said before the season that he wanted his team ready for URI – he saw it as the first game that held weight with the Minutemen's postseason hopes; and as the season wore on and the losses piled up, it was looking more like a shot at redemption.

But the URI game holds a different meaning now. It is a painful memory, one that Koch and company will try hard to forget.

The Minutemen battled for the entire game, trading shots with the Rams for the first half and the better part of the second; tension was building and tempers had short fuses as the game wore on.

Then, with one swift possession, UMass took the lead.

Freshman Nick Kelly took the ball out of bounds on the left sideline. He fired it into a crowd of players on the left side of the goal box, where the towering sophomore Kenny Cook (he is 6-foot-5 and is not hard to spot on the field) headed the ball in front of the net where sophomore Matt Lemire took control and finished off the scoring play with just 7:24 remaining in the game.

The goal came out of nowhere. The crowd had been lulled into a scoreless haze. It appeared to be the deciding goal in UMass' triumphant victory, turning the Minutemen down the winning path to an A-10 playoff berth.

But the romantic thoughts that dominated the minds of all UMass fans in attendance were soon shattered in a ruthless turn of events.

At the 5:43 mark, a devastatingly short amount of time since the UMass strike, URI tied the game.

It was hard to believe: for over 80 minutes of action, there had been nothing – no threatening shots on goal, no diving saves by the goalkeepers, no hard fouls or yellow cards. Now, two goals had been scored within two minutes of each other, the second one a dagger for UMass, which had a 1-0 lead with just over seven minutes left.

Koch thought about the possibility of a let-down after taking the lead.

"Unfortunately, it happens," he said. "You know [letting down is] going to happen, and you do everything you can [to stop it]. [URI] is now up a notch because they, all of the sudden, got scored on. We're down a notch because we're comfortable we have a lead."

Losing intensity after taking a lead is a natural occurrence in sports, and coaches will scream, yell, make substitutions, throw chairs, bench players and do almost anything in their power to prevent it from happening.

But it is inevitable, and only escapes the teams with the utmost discipline.

In soccer, the results of losing intensity are far worse than in other sports because the value of scoring is so much higher. One goal could win or lose a game.

So when the Minutemen took a deep breath with a 1-0 lead and seven minutes left in Sunday's game, URI scored twice before they could exhale.

The second Rams goal came the same way the first did – on a miscommunication. Redshirt freshman keeper Zach Simmons came out to challenge the play after a URI forward got behind the defense on a breakaway. But Simmons was beat to the ball and watched as the ball rolled into the back of the net and the Rams rolled over the Minutemen.

KAREN WINGERA/COLLEGIAN

Minuteman Matt Lemire (9) had reason to celebrate on Sunday against Rhode Island, as he put his team ahead 1-0 with seven minutes remaining. URI came back to score two goals, though, and won 2-1.

"One second you've got the lead, the next thing you know you're tied up, the next thing you know you're down," Koch said. "I have to look at the tape. I don't know what happened. I don't know how it changed so quick."

Koch didn't know what to make of his team's last-second collapse. He did know, however, that the Minutemen had just dropped their first A-10 match, leaving them one more set of twists and turns on the comeback trail.

He knew that his team didn't need to be reprimanded – that the loss was so lethal to the team's already-fragile psyche that encouragement was the best temporary cure, and a win in the next A-10 game the team's only permanent remedy.

The game against the Rams has set up one of those moments for the Minutemen.

Perhaps the toughest task in sports is picking yourself up after getting knocked flat on the floor.

But everybody trips. Who gets up the fastest is what really matters.

Tracy named captain of Pirates' ship

PITTSBURGH (AP) – Former Los Angeles Dodgers manager Jim Tracy was hired Tuesday as the Pittsburgh Pirates' manager, The Associated Press learned.

The move sends Tracy from a team that traditionally has one of baseball's highest payrolls to one with one of the lowest.

Tracy, 49, has been the front-runner from the start of the Pirates' search last week because of his long-standing ties to Pirates general manager Dave Littlefield, with whom he worked in the Montreal Expos' organization in the 1990s.

Tracy beat out the only two known candidates for the job, former Oakland Athletics manager Ken Macha and Atlanta Braves coach Fredi Gonzalez. Tracy replaces Lloyd McClendon, who was fired Sept. 6 during his fifth consecutive losing season and was replaced for the rest of the season by bench coach Pete Mackanin, who was not considered for the job on a permanent basis.

Littlefield also wanted to interview former Pirates manager Jim Leyland, but he took the Tigers' job last week before he could talk with the Pirates again.

Tracy interviewed with Littlefield last week by phone and, after Littlefield met Sunday in Pittsburgh with Macha, Tracy and Littlefield met Monday in Houston, the home of Tracy's agent, Alan Hendricks. Tracy was to have made $700,000 next year with the Dodgers before the two sides parted ways following a 71-91 season, but Tracy is expected to make more than that in Pittsburgh.

With the Pirates, Tracy takes over a team coming off 13 consecutive losing seasons, three short of the major league record, and a 67-95 record but one that broke in a half-dozen promising rookies during the second half of this season, including left-handed starters Zach Duke (8-2, 1.81 ERA) and Paul Maholm (3-1, 2.18 ERA).

Tracy is expected to have free rein to hire his own coaches, as the Pirates coaches were told following the season finale on Oct. 2 they would not be brought back.

Cobbs finds his offensive role

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It took a little bit of extra game planning and a dash of ingenuity to get senior R.J. Cobbs back into the Massachusetts football team's offensive system, but in the end, all it really took was digging up a few plays out of former coach Mark Whipple's playbook to find him a consistent home.

Last season, Cobbs was a defensive back, but with the return of Steve Costello on top of the team's depth in that area this year, coach Don Brown was set to use Cobbs as the team's newest wide receiver.

It wasn't that far of a stretch, as Cobbs is considered to be the most versatile player on the roster, but things didn't really go as planned during the first couple weeks of September. That's why he has gone back to the future to halfback, his original collegiate position.

And as the lightning to reigning Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Year Steve Baylark's thunder, the Minutemen (4-1 3-0 Atlantic 10) have a potent dual threat in their backfield.

Now with five rushing touchdowns over the team's last three games – all wins – and a 99-yard, two-score performance against Northeastern on Saturday, Cobbs has finally found his offensive rhythm.

That doesn't mean he'll necessarily stop lining up at wideout, especially after the team's leading receiver J.J. Moore went down with a season-ending ankle injury over the weekend, but it does show Brown and offensive coordinator Kevin Morris where Cobbs may feel more comfortable when they review and revise the playbook each week.

Cobbs has only registered seven receptions for 44 yards, but over the last three games when he has been relegated to running back duties, he has caught one ball for 14 yards. Conversely, Cobbs has rushed for 217 yards while carrying the ball 45 times this season, with 180 of those yards coming over the same three-game stretch.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior R.J. Cobbs has played cornerback, wide receiver and halfback among other things during his UMass career, but he has been most effective in the role of tailback over the team's last three games.

And again on Saturday, it turned out to be the ability of the tailback that carried the offense to its 27-point performance against the Huskies.

On UMass' second offensive series, the Minutemen called Cobbs' name for the first time, and he took a counter play to the right side 31 yards into the endzone without a single defender laying a hand on him.

"They blocked it pretty well," Cobbs said. "[The defense] fell for it because they thought I was going [left], and then I bounced back to the other side and totally took the linebackers a different way."

It didn't take long for him to strike again. On UMass' next possession, the Minutemen kept the ball on the ground, using a steady dosage of both Baylark and Cobbs to set themselves up for a second-and-11 on the Northeastern 13-yard line.

Cobbs again took the handoff from quarterback Liam Coen, running left this time. He didn't need the offensive line as much on this play, though, as this run involved not a whole lot more than pure athleticism and a bit of creativity.

After finding an open lane, Cobbs leaped over NU senior cornerback Bismark Osei at the five-yard line before diving into the endzone, giving the Minutemen a 13-0 lead and a highlight reel performance to gawk at during this week's film sessions.

"Once I see a guy go down, I'm jumping over him," Cobbs bragged. "I knew from the previous tapes that [Northeastern] was timid in tackling so I knew he was going to try to go down, especially near the goal line, where [the defense] is taught to stay low."

It appears now that the Minutemen know where they can find their offensive weapon, even if opposing defenses can't.

Five NLCS tidbits

By Derrick Goold
Knight Ridder

As the National League Championship Series kicks off between the Houston Astros and St. Louis Cardinals, here are five things to keep an eye on while the two teams aim for a World Series berth over the next week.

1. Andy Just Dandy in October

Missing from last year's NLCS because of elbow surgery, Andy Pettitte could provide the push the Astros need to reach their first World Series. The lefty was 6-1 in ALCS with the New York Yankees. He has pitched nearly 200 postseason innings and is 14-8 in 31 playoff starts. His next postseason win will tie him with the Braves' John Smoltz as the winningest pitcher in playoff history with 15. His second start will be at home where he held opponents to a .208 batting average and had a 2.12 ERA.

2. How Clubs Spell Relief

In a reversal of last year's series, the Astros arrive with the sturdier bullpen, mainly because it has a bona fide bridge to closer Brad Lidge. Dan Wheeler and Chad Qualls combined for 39 holds. Cards' Setup man Julian Tavarez has a 7.36 career ERA at Minute Maid and was 0-2 there this season.

And last October, he had a run-in with the phone after a Carlos Beltran home run. Jason Isringhausen also struggled last fall at Houston, but this season he had five saves vs. the Astros.

3. Left With Power

Highlighted by his performance in last year's NLCS, Cardinals outfielder Jim Edmonds feasts on Houston. He had three homers and 10 RBI in eight games at Minute Maid this year, and is a career .316 hitter verse the Astros. There are fewer off days in this series and having Larry Walker available, healthy and swinging – he was hitless against San Diego – will be essential. Lefty Mike Gallo is no lefty specialist, and righthander Chad Qualls gave up more hits (29) than strikeouts (21) verse 149 lefties this season.

4. Home Sweep Home

Before taking both games of the final regular-season series, Houston had lost 10 consecutive games at Busch Stadium. Four of those were in the 2004 NLCS. The Astros recovered from their early road troubles – losing 21 of their first 23 road games – but they were just 2-6 at Busch. The Cardinals won 50 at home and 50 on the road, the fifth team in baseball history to go at least 50/50 in consecutive seasons. This series could break like the last one with each team winning all of its home games.

5. Finer Points

The Cardinals and Astros ranked Nos. 1 and 2 in squeezes this season with 14 and eight, respectively, and have been offensively inventive all season.

Both teams lean on the hit-and-run. Houston stole the second-most bases in the NL (115), and leadoff hitter Willy Taveras put 66 bunts in play and led the majors in infield hits.

Meanwhile, no catcher caught a better percentage of thieves than Yadier Molina. The Cardinals weave groundballs into double plays better than any other team. And Houston committed the fewest errors in the NL.

Minutewomen end losing skid

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team (4-10 1-1 Atlantic 10) entered last weekend's two-game conference road trip riding a four-game losing skid, and the streak extended by a game with a 4-1 loss to No. 20 Richmond (7-5 2-0 A-10) before they put an end to it with a last-second victory over Saint Louis (5-8 1-1 A-10) on Sunday.

The Minutewomen play their next game this Friday against Atlantic 10 opponent La Salle, part of a three-game homestand.

In driving rain and windy conditions described as "hurricane weather" by Coach Patty Shea, the Minutewomen had the majority of scoring opportunities in the first half but were unable to take advantage of them. They got the ball into the Richmond circle in the first minute of the game, and then several other times early in the first half, but shots by junior Gina Sanders and senior Katelyn Woolfrey proved unsuccessful.

The game went scoreless for the entire first half until a Richmond penalty corner with time expired was replayed after UMass failed to clear the ball. Richmond's Whitney Wells scored her fourth goal on the season on a pass from Emma Bradley on the second penalty corner.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass junior forward Elizabeth Andrews plays the ball in an earlier game this season. The Minutewomen split two games over the weekend.

In the second half, UMass tied the game quickly with senior Patricia Borneo's second goal of the season. Things fell apart after that for the Minutewomen as Richmond scored three unanswered goals, winning 4-1.

"We actually played well," Shea said. "We had opportunities in the first three minutes. We had chances to put them down and not have to fight back, but we didn't take advantage of them. In regards to overall team play, it was some of the best play we've had all year."

However, with the loss, Shea feels there is still room for improvement.

"Broken corners, some miscues defensively – there were some overloaded situations that we let slip by," Shea said. "We performed well, but we can still get better."

After the game, the team traveled to Missouri to take on conference foe St. Louis. The Billikens (5-8 1-1 Atlantic 10) were riding a two-game winning streak, including a win over A-10 member Rhode Island, coming into the game. The Minutewomen played a tight game, and once again the game remained scoreless for most of the first half.

The first goal went to SLU's Courtney Gasparovic on a pass from Carin Boone at 28:16, but UMass responded quickly with freshman Lauren Gillespie's second goal of the season at 31:24. The first half ended with a 1-1 tie, though UMass led 12-3 in shots.

It didn't take long for the Minutewomen to take the lead in the second half, as sophomore Erin O'Brien scored her first goal of the season on a penalty stroke. This time it was St. Louis' turn to tie it up, and the Billikens did so on an unassisted goal by Kristin Lueders.

The game seemed destined for overtime, as neither team could regain the lead. However, with just seconds left, the Billikens committed a critical error, which awarded the Minutewomen a free hit from 25 yards out.

Senior Jaime Bawden took the shot for UMass, which was redirected into the goal by freshman Katelyn Orlando with just 0.6 seconds left on the clock. The game-winning goal was Orlando's fourth of the year, giving her the team lead in that category.

"We played Friday in a driving rainstorm and hurricane weather, then coming out to St. Louis, we played on a completely different surface," Shea said of going from Richmond to St. Louis. "So considering the adjustments we had to make, I think the team played very well."

Shea was more than pleased with her team's improvement over the course of the weekend.

"We really played well in the first half; we really took it to St. Louis. We made a couple mistakes defensively [in the second half], where we lost our mental edge, and they took advantage of that right away.

"We were better in the first half today than we were in the second half, but they took the lead, then we fought back and took the lead, then they tied it up, and we finished it off with no time on the clock."

A-10 play heats up

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Home Away from Home

The Minutewomen returned from their weekend split on the road at Richmond and St. Louis for a three-game homestand that begins Friday against La Salle. So far this year, the team is winless at home. UMass hosted its first four games of the season but lost all of them, only to go 3-1 on the road thereafter.

The only other home game so far this season was a 2-1 overtime loss to Boston University on Sept. 20. Despite being 0-5 at home, however, the Minutewomen are an even 4-4 on the road and 1-1 on the road in the Atlantic 10.

This weekend they will play two games at Garber Field, Friday's game against La Salle, as well as Sunday against West Chester. The team remains at home next week when it hosts non-conference opponent Dartmouth on Wednesday.

This homestand will be the last chance for UMass to get a regular season win in Amherst, as the remainder of the A-10 schedule will be on the road.

UMass coach Patty Shea understands the importance of getting victories on their home turf.

"It's really important," she said. "The most important game is the game Friday afternoon against La Salle."

If the Minutewomen can take advantage of the home games and take two or even three wins back on the road with them, they will be in great shape in the A-10, something Shea has the team focused on.

"It's another conference game, and you want to start to get the edge on your opponents," Shea said. "If you can go in and get the win in that one, then really you're winning [in the Atlantic 10 standings] with two wins under your belt within conference."

At 1-1, the Minutewomen

UMass workers to get pay raise

BOSTON (AP) — Thousands of employees at state colleges and universities will get retroactive pay raises after Senate lawmakers voted on Wednesday to restore budget vetoes from Gov. Mitt Romney.

The Senate voted unanimously to override two of Romney's budget vetoes, which provided $42.2 million for one year of retroactive pay raises at the University of Massachusetts and at state and community colleges.

The Senate vote followed a unanimous vote in the House on Tuesday to override the vetoes.

The restoration of the funds means that thousands of employees will get retroactive paychecks in the coming months.

"Every day that they wait is justice denied," said Sen. Steven Panagiotakos, D-Lowell, vice-chair of the Higher Education Committee. "They bargained in good faith, it went through the process, and it was hung up by the governor, after the previous governor signed."

The funds that Romney vetoed on Sept. 30 included $30.27 million for unions at the University of Massachusetts and $11.91 million for administrators and staffers at state and community colleges. Romney said he didn't support paying for raises on a retroactive basis.

The raises were in three-year contracts that former acting Gov. Jane M. Swift signed in 2001. Romney said he vetoed the increases because he doesn't support retroactive pay hikes.

Graduate Bar reopens in Campus Center

By Anna Dolianitis
Collegian Correspondent

After three years of absence from the University of Massachusetts Campus Center, the Graduate Student Bar reopened on Sept. 19 with the help of the Graduate Student Senate and Auxiliary Services.

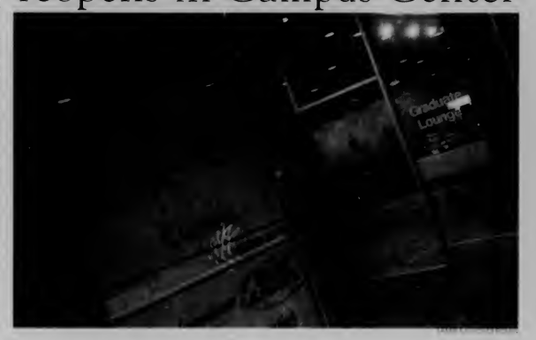
The Graduate Student Bar had been closed for almost three years due to financial reasons, said Meredith Schmidt, director of the UMass Campus Center.

"It had minimal support and was running at a financial loss," said Schmidt. "The space remained open as a study space, but the food and beverage service was no longer offered."

Students still utilized the space, even without the bar being open. One graduate student drinking coffee over a newspaper said that she often came to the lounge even before it reopened, to study, socialize, and meet with students.

"Prior to it having closed, a number of our students would meet there for lunch, primarily to discuss politics," said Brian Donovan, a 23-year-old graduate student studying Electrical Engineering. "I went there for coffee one day and found it closed."

Graduate Students were greatly affected by the loss of the student bar, as another meeting space specifically for graduate students does not exist on campus, nor has one ever existed.



"The graduate students felt that they still had the need for a café style place on campus, and they shared ideas on what might make it successful," said Schmidt.

The graduate students took initiative in convincing those in charge that the Student Bar was a necessity. The Graduate Student Council played a particularly important role in bringing about the change.

Julia Beyer, chairperson of the Student Affairs Committee, explained how her group helped get the bar re-opened.

"Over the summer, our committee met with Meredith Schmidt, director of the Campus Center, and we got the ball rolling in regards to the

'It's now or never,' Bliss says on SGA ideas

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Sean Bliss, Speaker for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association, said in a Collegian interview yesterday that the time for legislative action to be seen around campus is now.

"If there ever was a year that SGA was going to see results, this would be the year. It's now or never," said Bliss. "We have 12 people in the SGA office every day for every moment that we're not in classes, putting in 60 hours a week, trying to rebuild everything from the ground up. We are extremely dedicated to improving not only student life around UMass, but our relationship with the schools' registered student organizations."

"We made some big changes last year, but we were still mired in previous years' problems," said Bliss. "We were forced to deal with negative stuff first before any positives things. This year is the complete opposite."

The SGA and RSOs held a banquet in the Student Union Tuesday night, in hopes of strengthening the bond between the two bodies as well as between the student body and administration. Approximately 300 people attended the banquet.

"The 'SGA, RSO Reception' wasn't just a reception for us to pat ourselves on the back, it was an open invitation to every RSO," said Bliss. "In the past, the SGA has had receptions that only included us and the administration. This year's reception was all about bringing together the SGA, students, RSOs and the administration, as a sign of us working together to improve UMass.

"The new SGA is much more orientated than the previous administrations — working together with the RSOs, serving the students first before the administration, and knowing what they want," said Bliss.

According to Bliss, the "new SGA" is a result of the extensive re-hauling within the inner workings of the Senate in the last two years. One of the changes is the addition of committees, small groups of senators set towards achieving specific goals.

"Having specific committees will allow senators to own specific responsibilities, making it more likely that we will see results by the end of this year," Bliss said.

"Public policy, for instance, will be broken down into groups of five or six senators working towards meeting certain goals, like lowering student fees. The senators will not stop until they either succeed or until every step has been taken. We are focusing on specific issues and not just the things that come off on a whim."

In years past, senators struggled to see any of their legislation come to fruition. Bliss claims that with the addition of smaller committees, most legislation will finally be able to be seen through to the final stages.

"We are not going to come up with legislation on the Senate floor and then pass it in forty-five minutes. Legislation will start in committees, by the time it gets to the Senate, it will have already been debated about, honed and perfected," said Bliss. "This should insure that there won't be many issues that can arrive in the Senate, slowing legislation down."

Romney faces criticism in wake of floods

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney, who has faced criticism for his response to flooding in Western Massachusetts, promised aid to the affected communities on Wednesday after meeting with the region's lawmakers.

Romney met for an hour with Senators and Representatives from areas that received nearly a foot of rain last week, with more expected on Wednesday and in coming days.

"We're safe and sound. Now the question is how are we going to pay for the damage that's been caused," Romney said.

With about a half-dozen lawmakers assembled behind him, Romney said that the state could qualify for federal aid, if the amount of damage reaches $6.5 million. Even if it doesn't, he said that he will work with the legislature on a spending bill to aid cities and towns.

In addition, he said that $25 million in funds allocated to help pay for aid to Hurricane Katrina victims could be used to help individuals who have suffered losses in the floods.

"Clearly it's the intent of these legislators and the administration to provide at least the same level of support to individuals from our own state that have been affected by flooding, as we provided to people who come here from the devastation on the Gulf Coast," he said.

After meeting with reporters, he departed for Western Massachusetts to view the damage himself. In Greenfield, the hardest hit town in Franklin County, about 75 people were displaced after the Green River

The Gas Gauge

In this week's edition of the Gas Gauge, the Daily Collegian finds eight gas stations near the UMass campus with the cheapest prices. This is a change from last week when the cheapest price was $2.82 a gallon for unleaded. We wondered if the local price competition is getting stiff, or if the corporate big-wigs are the ones setting the prices.

"This is a corporate owned office. The office calls periodically and tells me when I need to change the prices," said a man who claimed to be the owner of the Exxon on Northampton Road in Amherst. He added that sometimes, prices can be changed randomly throughout the day.

Here is this week's list of the area's cheapest gas prices:

$2.79 Pride, 445 Russell St., (Rt. 9), Hadley

Film focuses on immigration

A 21-year-old Ithaca College student answered questions regarding his documentary about illegal immigration from Mexico at Food for Thought Books on Sunday.

Jeremy Levine, director of the film "Walking the Line," was introduced by Enoch Page, an associate professor of anthropology at the University of Massachusetts, who talked about the film and the race issues it covered.

Page said that in the movie, many of the people who expressed anti-immigration views were motivated by racism. He said that some of the white residents in the area associated their race to power, and added that this power was being threatened by Mexican immigrants because they threatened to take over as the majority group.

"Walking the Line" begins as an expose on Ranch Rescue, a vigilante group that patrols the United States-Mexico border. They believe that the U.S. Border Patrol is not doing its job of protecting private property owners from illegal aliens and immigrants who use their land to enter the U.S. The members of Ranch Rescue arm themselves with semiautomatic weapons and dress entirely in camouflage as they watch the border themselves.

As the movie continues, its focus broadens into the problem of the United States border policy.

"We originally went down and said, 'Look at these guys with guns, they are the problem,'" Levine said. "It's our [border] policy that is the problem."

The film also showed some of the humanitarian efforts being put forth. Mike Wilson, an ex-member of the Tohono O'odham Reservation, places water for migrants crossing through the Sonora Desert on their way in the U.S. Reverend John Fife drives out into the desert and offers help to immigrants. He was convicted twenty years ago on three federal felonies for aiding and abetting illegal immigrants.

"Walking the Line" succeeds at showing how people living at the border perceive illegal immigration by showing a diverse group of people's reactions to it. The film also allows its characters to develop themselves. By staying behind the camera, the directors allow us to make our own interpretations of the people presented rather than just absorb the filmmakers opinions.

After the movie, Levine stayed to field questions from the audience. He answered questions on where the people were today and techniques he used while filming.

UMass Medical gets poor review in report

WORCESTER (AP) — A number of problems led to the high death rate among heart-bypass patients at UMass Memorial Medical Center, starting with a lack of leadership at the hospital, according to a state report released Wednesday.

The mortality rate at UMass Memorial for coronary artery bypass graft surgery was about 4 percent in 2003, the most recent year for which data is available. The statewide average was 2.19 percent.

The hospital voluntarily stopped performing elective cardiac surgery last month, but has continued to offer angioplasty and stent placements as well as emergency cardiac surgery. A team of outside reviewers — including four heart surgeons and an anesthesiologist — conducted a survey of the program for the state Department of Public Health.

They found a lack of leadership since 2002 may have eroded teamwork and hindered adoption of proven medical practices.

The cardiac program at UMass Memorial lost five doctors that year, including chief of surgery Dr. Thomas Vander Salm. Vander Salm's replacement, Dr. Stephen Lahey, was never fully accepted by the staff and he left in February 2005.

"An experienced nurse can often tell things aren't headed in the right direction," one of the reviewers, Dr. David Shahian, a surgery professor at Tufts University, told The Boston Globe. "They lost that team concept."

Before halting the program, UMass Memorial surgeons performed 300 to 400 bypass operations a year, said Dr. Walter H. Ettinger Jr., president of the hospital since January 2004.

The review team spent 80 hours reading records and interviewing hospital staff before issuing 71 recommendations for improvement that would allow the program to reopen.

"We look at these recommendations as an opportunity for the hospital to come to grips with a problem that had been going on for at least since 2002 and to put in place improvements that will result in a better service," Paul I. Dreyer, director of Health Care Quality at DPH, told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester. "That's everyone's goal."

Ettinger said he hopes to resume the heart surgery program within several weeks. He said the hospital already has started addressing the most serious issues, and is close to hiring a new chief of heart surgery.

Logan Airport back to normal after delays

BOSTON (AP) — Operations were back to normal at Logan International Airport on Wednesday, following two days of serious delays caused by a faulty radar antenna.

The malfunctioning antenna was replaced overnight with one borrowed from the airport in Bangor, Maine, Federal Aviation Administration spokeswoman Arlene Murray said.

Air traffic controllers began seeing phantom blips on their radar screens over the weekend that they knew were not incoming planes.

An FAA troubleshooting team from New Jersey arrived Tuesday and identified the radar antenna as the source of the problem. The replacement antenna was brought down from Maine and brought online early Wednesday morning.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation ruled out sabotage as a possible cause of the problem, an airport spokesman said.

"We're all happy that it has nothing to do with sabotage or terrorism or anything like that," said Phil Orlandella of the Massachusetts Port Authority, which runs Logan.

Logan officials reported minor delays on Wednesday, and those were caused by heavy rains to the southwest and not by faulty radar.

Romney criticized for response to floods crested and destroyed their mobile homes. In other parts of the city, farmland was flooded, roads were washed out and bridges, dams and sewer lines were damaged.

Greenfield Mayor Christine Forgey said damage estimates have already reached $500,000 and may exceed $1 million.

Forgey said she spoke with Romney by telephone Wednesday morning and encouraged the governor to declare a state of emergency for Massachusetts. That would allow her to go after federal disaster assistance that she says is needed to help the people who lost their homes in the Wedgewood Gardens mobile home park.

"The governor did not drop the phone and do what I wanted him to do, but I'm certain I made an impression," Forgey said.

U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry, as well as U.S. Reps. John Olver and Richard Neal, all Democrats, issued a joint statement calling for Romney to declare a state of emergency.

Some local officials and lawmakers have criticized Romney for not responding more quickly to the flooding. Rep. Christopher Donelan, D-Orange, who was not at Wednesday's meeting, said he was dismayed by how little the administration appeared to know about the damage.

"It's amazing to me that the governor's people aren't more on top of this," he said. "The people I talked to had no clue anything happened out here. In western Massachusetts, you really have to shake the tree hard to get anything."

Romney, when asked about that criticism, said that administration staff was quick to respond and assess damage in all 120 cities and towns. He also said that the flooding was not severe enough to warrant his early return from North Carolina on Monday, where he was attending fundraisers for an organization there.

"The floods weren't of a nature of such significance on Monday, based upon the reports that suggested that my being in Western Mass would have made any difference whatsoever," he said, later adding, "There will always be occasion for people to say why didn't you do it this way or that way. You do the best you can, based on the information you have."

Marlon Branch loaded friend Michael Van Camp's clothes into a truck yesterday. Van Camp's Greenfield mobile home was flooded over the weekend when the town received over 10 inches of rain.

Rice promises Pakistan aid in recovery

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — The devastation of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita fresh in mind, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice promised Wednesday that the United States would provide help over the long haul for Pakistan's recovery from a killer earthquake.

Rice detoured from a trip to Afghanistan and Central Asian nations to briefly visit Pakistani leaders and American troops ferrying supplies in and wounded out of the rugged earthquake zone.

"The United States has, as other parts of the world have, been through natural disasters," Rice said following a meeting with Pakistan's foreign minister. "This one is of epic proportions, and I want the people of Pakistan to know that we will be with you."

That promise is good "not just today, but tomorrow," Rice said. Rice came with no specific new pledge of U.S. money beyond an initial $50 million contribution. She predicted more American financial aid will come, and said she will encourage other nations to be generous.

The 7.6-magnitude earthquake demolished whole communities Saturday, mostly in the Himalayan region of Kashmir. The U.N. estimated that 2 million people have been left homeless.

The Pakistani government's official death toll was about 23,000 people and 47,000 injured, but those numbers are expected to rise. More than 1,400 people also died in Indian Kashmir.

The United States is providing military helicopters, planes, pilots and supplies, with more at the ready. Rice toured a landing zone at the Islamabad airport where a battered U.S. CH-47 Chinook helicopter had dropped off 65 wounded earlier Wednesday.

Some of the world's poorest nations offered help to the United States after Hurricane Katrina swamped New Orleans and blew apart homes and businesses along the Gulf Coast on August 29. Perceptions of a slow and bungled federal response to Katrina dented the can-do U.S. image abroad.

Pakistan offered doctors and paramedics, and Afghanistan pledged $100,000.

Pakistan is a key ally in the Bush administration's war on terrorism, but President Bush and U.S. foreign policy are unpopular among many Pakistanis. Rice tried to make a personal appeal. "This is not just friendship between governments. It's friendship between people," she said.

Earlier Wednesday, Rice pledged long-term commitment to Afghanistan, another regional ally with trouble at home.

Like Pakistan, Afghanistan's close ties were forged out of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, after which the United States led an invasion to topple the hardline Taliban regime and launched an unsuccessful search for terror mastermind Osama bin Laden along the Afghan-Pakistan border.

Afghanistan has seen more war than peace in recent decades, but now has a more stable democratic government and celebrated successful elections last month with 6 million participants.

Bird Flu concerns local hospitals

By Jen Ed
Collegian Staff

"Avian Influenza A," the latest pandemic-threatening worldwide outbreak that could ultimately kill up to 1.9 million Americans, is raising concern from area medical practitioners.

The illness, more commonly known as "Bird Flu," is primarily found in and spread through birds. "Certain birds, particularly water birds, act as hosts for influenza viruses by carrying the virus in their intestines and shedding it. Infected birds shed virus in saliva, nasal secretions, and feces," says a statement on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) Web site.

While it's most often spread from bird to bird, different strands of the virus have been seen in humans since 1997. The possibility that the influenza can spread to humans through bird droppings has hospitals as well as the government preparing for the worst.

"If the [Bird Flu outbreak] happened now, it wouldn't be good," said Linda Riley, an infection control nurse at Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

According to Riley, who receives daily alerts from the CDC and other health organizations, every hospital must be preparing for the worst outbreak imaginable. She says hospitals are prioritizing needs and creating designated areas specifically for such flu-patients.

"People with routine surgery would be put aside to make room for those infected," Riley said.

Other areas that are normally used as rehabilitation centers and next-level care providers are acting as medical facilities in the threat of an outbreak.

To make matters more complicated, the Bird Flu has many similar symptoms to the standard flu.

The flu has all hospitals across the U.S. on alert for signs of the virus. "Our emergency rooms ... will be on the lookout for patients with symptoms," said Jayne Heede, a registered nurse at Wing Memorial Center, a member of UMass Memorial Healthcare.

While distinguishing between the different viruses may prove to be difficult, another possible problem revolves around Tamiflu, the specific drug used to treat Bird Flu.

While pharmaceutical companies have Tamiflu available, if a worldwide epidemic were to occur, the need for the drug would far exceed the amount that is currently available.

In the face of an outbreak, the government would then step in and allocate the reserve stockpile they are in possession of based on specifically prioritized criteria. Criteria are based on aspects assessing the need. Before these people, health care workers and other medical workers would be given Tamiflu first to prevent further spread while working with those infected.

Instances of humans being infected with the disease have occurred in 2003 and 2004 in Asia. The fact that it's been found in infected chickens in the United States in 2003 and 2004 has researchers worried that it could mutate and spread.

"Right now the virus is only in birds. We don't want it to mutate and change genetically so it can spread from bird to man, and then man to bird," said Riley.

Officers defend brutal arrest

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A police union official and a lawyer for officers accused in the beating of a retired teacher on Wednesday sharply disputed the man's contention he was brutalized during his arrest, which was captured on video.

Attorney Frank DeSalvo said the video shows a truncated version of the Saturday night arrest and he disputed details the video appears to have captured, including whether the 64-year-old suspect was punched in the face.

"I see an incident of a man trying to be brought under control who doesn't want to be brought under control," DeSalvo said.

Herman who was beaten, Robert Davis, pleaded not guilty Wednesday to charges of public intoxication, resisting arrest, battery on a police officer and public intimidation.

Davis has described himself as a recovering substance abuser who has not had a drink in 25 years. His lawyer asked prosecutors to dismiss charges, but his trial was set for Jan. 16.

The two city officers accused in the beating, and a third accused of grabbing and shoving an Associated Press Television News producer, are due to go on trial on battery charges a week before Davis' trial.

Davis' lawyer, Joseph Bruno, said an APTN videotape of the confrontation shows his client being brutalized by police for no reason. After the arraignment, however, leaders of the city's police union offered their own interpretations.

Police union officials described Davis as so intoxicated that he staggered down the street, stumbled into a police horse and became belligerent when officers intervened.

DeSalvo said police union officials had "broken the thing down frame by frame" and saw officers trying to bring under control an angry man. "He brought it on by his actions," DeSalvo said.

No tests for intoxication were administered following the arrest. In such cases, judges typically rely on officers' observations, said police spokesman Marlon Defillo.

The officers involved in the incident — Lance Schilling, Robert Evangelist and S.M. Smith — did not speak during the news conference. DeSalvo said Schilling and Evangelist hit Davis' shoulders, and he denied the arrest was as violent as has been portrayed.

"He clearly was not hit in the face," DeSalvo said.

DeSalvo also disputed Davis' lawyers contention that Davis suffered fractures to his cheek and eye socket. DeSalvo said the injuries were scrapes caused when he was placed face down on the pavement.

The three officers have been suspended without pay. Lt. David Benelli, president of the police union, said the suspensions would be appealed, although that's been delayed by a city government stalled in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Greenwich named in assault

Police confirm location of Hampshire College assault

AMHERST — Police have now named the dorm where investigators believe an assault on a male Hampshire College student took place this past Friday, which left him severely beaten.

As previously speculated, Amherst police have confirmed the assault took place inside the Greenwich dorm on campus.

Investigators believe an 18-year-old Hampshire student was severely beaten after a man whom he used to date, 23-year-old Salvador Perez of Dumont, N.J., broke into his dorm room.

Perez pleaded not guilty to charges of assault with the intent to murder, domestic assault and battery and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon in Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley on Friday.

Police say Perez entered the victim's dorm room as he slept. Once the victim woke up, Perez allegedly stuck him on the head several times with a metal flash light and strangled him with a nylon cord until he was unconscious.

Student sues Amherst police after 2003 Red Sox riot arrest

AMHERST — A University of Massachusetts student who was placed under arrest during the 2003 riots after a Boston Red Sox game is suing the town and the two Amherst Police officers who arrested him.

Derek Kuykendall, a UMass junior from Ayer, filed a complaint in Hampshire Superior Court for unspecific damages, charging false arrest and criminal prosecution.

The suit states that officers Matthew J. Donah and Keller W. Williams approached Kuykendall inside Chicago Pizzeria on Pleasant St. and claimed to have him on video engaging in riotous behavior.

Kuykendall says in the suit that the incident caused him "public humiliation and scorn" and he had to leave UMass as a result. He served 10 days in the Hampshire County Correctional facility after he was found guilty for disturbing the peace and disorderly conduct.

Amherst police have not yet commented on the case.

Sunderland man faces arson, burglary and other charges

SUNDERLAND — A Sunderland man who police say ignited several fires in town is expected to be jailed for some time on pending criminal charges, which include arson.

Steven F. Kmiecik, 23, of 63 Silver Lane pleaded not guilty in Franklin Superior Court last Thursday to a long list of charges regarding arson cases. He is being held on $100,000 cash bail or $1 million surety.

Police say Kmiecik set several fires in Sunderland in 2004, including a storage shed behind Dove's Nest Restaurant, a vacant home at 38 Silver Lane and several fires at the Lantern Court apartments, among others.

His criminal charges include assault with a dangerous weapon, two counts of arson on a dwelling, one count of breaking and entering at night to commit a felony, three counts of burning personal property, one count of unarmed burglary, four counts of defacing property and one count of damage to a motor vehicle.

UMass Hillel offering trip to Israel for several students

The University of Massachusetts Hillel, an on-campus Jewish community group, has announced that they will be offering a free trip to some students over winter break.

The trip is being offered to anyone between 18- and 26-years-old who has at least one Jewish parent and has never been on an organized trip to Israel before.

Organizers say the reason behind this trip is that it is considered every Jewish person's birthright to visit Israel at least once in his or her lifetime. Participants would be guided through the biblical, historical, and modern sites in Israel. The trip is primarily made up of UMass students.

Anyone seeking more information about the trip should visit Hillel's Web site at Israel.hillel.org. Registration closes on Friday at 9 a.m.

Ammendments pass for Iraqi constitution

By Maryam Fam
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Iraqi lawmakers approved a set of last-minute amendments to the constitution without a vote on Wednesday, sealing a compromise designed to win Sunni support and boost chances for the charter's approval in a referendum just three days away.

The deal, brokered with intense U.S. mediation, came as insurgents pressed their campaign to wreck Saturday's referendum. A suicide bomber killed 30 Iraqis at an army recruitment center in a northern town where another bomber had struck just a day earlier.

At least one major Sunni Arab party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, said it will now support the draft at the polls. But some other Sunni parties rejected the amendments and said they would still campaign for a "no" vote.

The most significant change is the introduction of a mechanism allowing Sunni Arabs to try to make more substantive changes in the constitution later, after a new parliament is elected in December.

Sunnis want to weaken the considerable autonomous powers the Shiite and Kurdish mini-states would have under the constitution. But there's no guarantee they will succeed: They will still likely face strong opposition from majority Shiites and Kurds in the new parliament.

The amendments passed Wednesday also made some key symbolic concessions to Sunni Arabs, starting with the first article underlining that Iraq will be a single nation with its unity guaranteed — a nod to fears among the disaffected minority that the draft as it stood would fragment the country.

That was not enough, however, for many Sunni leaders.

"The added articles do not change anything and provide no guarantees," Muthana Harith al-Dhari, spokesman of the influential Association of Muslim Scholars, told Al-Jazeera television.

"We have called for boycotting the elections or rejecting the constitution," he said.

Still, the changes will likely split the Sunni vote enough to prevent them from defeating the draft constitution. The draft will be rejected if more than two-thirds of the voters oppose it in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces, and Sunnis have the potential to do so in just four.

The charter's passage is a key goal of the United States, since failure would mean months more political instability and would delay U.S. plans to start pulling troops out of Iraq.

Sunni Vice President Ghazi al-Yawer said the amendments meant Sunnis had to work harder in the December parliamentary elections to ensure a strong presence in the next parliament to try for future, deeper changes in the constitution.

They have only 17 members in the current 275-member parliament after largely boycotting Jan. 30 elections.

"This is the best we have. We have to be practical," al-Yawer said. "This has opened the door for major amendments of the constitution. This will happen through participating in the elections. The more turnout there is, the more chances there are for amendments."

Iraq's top leaders, including the Kurdish president and Shiite prime minister, lined up on stage before the gathered lawmakers in parliament, lauding the deal as a show of unity between the country's often divided factions and communities.

"We have the right to be proud in saying that today was a day of national consensus," President Jalal Talabani said. "So congratulations to our people for their constitution."

The hour-long session, attended by 159 of parliament's 275 members — ended without the lawmakers voting on the amendments, but Parliament Speaker Hajimi al-Hassani said no actual vote was necessary and that the compromise was approved.

The deal had already been accepted by the main parties in parliament after it was reached Tuesday night following three days of marathon negotiations, shepherded by U.S. officials. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad attended Wednesday's parliament.

MUZAFFARABAD, Pakistan — Rescue efforts gave way to relief, as hopes faded Wednesday of finding more survivors in Pakistan's devastated quake zone. Still, miracles emerged amid the misery: A Russian team rescued a 5-year-old girl trapped for nearly 100 hours under the rubble of her family home.

Trucks and helicopters with aid from dozens of countries choked roads up to the crumbling towns of the Himalayan region of Kashmir, but the hungry and homeless in hard-hit areas remained isolated four days after the temblor.

"No country is ready for such a disaster," said President Gen. Pervez Musharraf in a nationally televised address, acknowledging delays in his government's response, but saying that relief operations were now fully under way.

The 7.6-magnitude quake Saturday demolished whole towns, mostly in Kashmir, divided by a cease-fire line between Indian and Pakistani territories. The death toll was believed to be more than 55,000, with tens of thousands injured.

A strong aftershock shook the capital Islamabad early Thursday, causing buildings to move for a few seconds. It was not immediately clear what the aftershock's magnitude was or if it caused any damage.

U.S., Pakistani, German and Afghan helicopters delivered tents, blankets and medical equipment and brought back dozens of badly injured people on each return flight. The choppers flew in clear skies after storms would've forced the suspension of flights Tuesday.

The war-torn city of Saigon is not a likely setting for a musical, but stranger things have happened. Singing and dancing cats have taken to the stage, right? Indeed, 1970s Saigon is the setting for Claude-Michel Schonberg and Alain Boublil's epic pop opera "Miss Saigon," loosely based on Puccini's "Madame Butterfly."

This is the second of three productions to be presented by Broadway in Amherst, a new theatrical venture that hosted a successful production of "42nd Street" on Sept. 25.

Set in 1975 during the last days of the American occupation of Vietnam, "Miss Saigon" is a passionate love story about the relationship between an American GI and a young Vietnamese woman. Kim is working in a sleazy Saigon nightclub owned by a greasy conman known as "The Engineer." John, a soldier in the United States Army, buys his friend Chris the innocent and beautiful Kim for the night. That one fateful night changes both of their lives forever.

The entire production is one giant piece of eye candy. The sets elicit gasps from the audience on numerous occasions, including the climax of the show where, I kid you not, a helicopter lands on stage. Stylistically, "Miss Saigon" is also extremely successful. Its soaring melodies and epic love story can make even the biggest cynic a believer in true love, even if it's just for an evening. Chris and Kim have become some of the most famous lovers in the musical theater pantheon. Their moving Act I duet "The Last Night of the World" is one of the signature moments of the show.

"Miss Saigon" is considered to be one of the last great megamusicals to be brought stateside from Britain, a trend that took over Broadway in the 1980's and early 1990s. Starting in 1985 with "Cats," then-unknown producer Cameron Mackintosh imported and produced a slew of musicals from London, mostly lavish, multi-million dollar ventures with sweeping scores and enormous sets. Thanks to Mackintosh, American audiences have been introduced to some of the most famous and popular musicals of the last quarter century, including "Cats," "The Phantom of the Opera," "Les Miserables" and "Miss Saigon."

On Broadway, "Miss Saigon" was one of the most expensive musicals ever produced, and it was also one of the most successful. Before it opened in the spring of 1991, it had an unprecedented advance sale, with prime seats going for $100, the top ticket price on Broadway at the time. It was also one of the most technically advanced and complex shows ever mounted. Each night over 230 people worked on the production, but only 47 of them appeared in front of an audience.

After its opening, Newsweek declared "the musical is already a legend!" and rave reviews followed. It went on to be nominated for 11 1991 Tony Awards including Best Musical and nominations for Jonathan Pryce, who played The Engineer, Lea Salonga who starred as Kim, and Willy Falk and Hinton Battle, who played Chris and John respectively. "Miss Saigon" lost most of its awards to "The Will Rogers Follies," including Best Musical, but Pryce, Salonga and Battle all won Tonys for their performances. The show went on to have an extremely healthy run, playing for 10 years and just over 4,000 performances.

Since its premiere, "Miss Saigon" has been translated into 10 different languages, 21 companies have opened in 19 different countries and it has been seen by over 31 million people worldwide. Critical and audience reception has proven that "Miss Saigon" is one of the greatest love stories of our time. So come and fall in love like it's the last night of the world.

Catch the final performance of Broadway in Amherst's presentation of "Miss Saigon" tonight at 7:30 p.m. at the Mullins Center. Tickets range from $40 to $64 and can be purchased at the Mullins Center Box Office or online at www.ticketmaster.com. Students receive a 10 percent discount on tickets purchased at the Box Office, and an hour before show time, students can get half priced tickets.

Christopher O'Riley to play benefit show

By Carey Zegouras
Collegian Staff

In an effort to preserve one of the most important venues in Western Massachusetts dedicated to music and art, the Northampton Academy of Music will host a benefit concert this Sunday, Oct. 16 at 5 p.m. The versatile talents of pianist Christopher O'Riley will be accompanied by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, led by Maestro Kevin Rhodes.

The show, in addition to meeting the fundraising goal of $50,000 to continue the survival of the arts center, will be a gathering of those devoted to the tradition of classical music, while simultaneously advocating interest in other musical genres.

In addition to complimenting the musical selections with his brilliantly perceptive style, O'Riley's presence as the featured pianist alongside the orchestra will enhance the performance in more ways than one. Widely known for his interpretations of Radiohead songs and having recently recorded Elliot Smith tracks, O'Riley has been dedicated to highlighting the value and originality of modern music despite his traditional roots.

Although the audience won't see any covers of "True Love Waits" this Sunday, they will instead be able to view the magic of O'Riley along side an orchestra as he performs Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 3." The symbolic presence of an artist such as O'Riley, who appreciates a diverse array of influences, also attests to the Academy's aim of maintaining a place for music to continue evolving.

In an interview with The Republican, O'Riley commented on the upcoming benefit and the linking elements of what interests him in such a broad collection of artists.

"What draws me to both of them (the Rachmaninoff and the Radiohead) to what draws me to most things that I enjoy playing [is] elements that I find compelling are harmony and texture," he said. "Rachmaninoff was, of course, a great melodic writer — but the way the melody is couched and accompanied in the piano part in particular is very integrated and complex and compelling."

Despite the way people divide music into distinguishable categories, the most thoughtful musicians experiment with the same qualities that bring the music to life. As O'Riley also stated, these are the things he respects when it comes to integrating music classified as outside of your own genre.

"Radiohead has that element of texture as well. Even though it's a five-piece rock'n'roll band, it's less a vertically-oriented sound with lots of power chords being churned away — really more of each of the members of the band contributing one particular motive or thread that makes each song unique. That in turn, because of the interwoven texture of the Radiohead songs, makes them compelling, unique for piano," he told the Republican.

On Sunday, the audience will see O'Riley's musical interpretation radiate from his fingertips, and by sticking to Rachmaninoff, he will allow viewers to experience the complex melodies of the Russian composer's classical pieces.

Kevin Rhodes, who began his conducting career at age 16, will be leading the 80-person Springfield Symphony Orchestra in their debut at the Academy. Together they will put on a riveting performance of Brahm's "Symphony No. 1" sans O'Riley. In addition, Rhodes' immense experience of working with opera will shine in their performance of the overture from Johann Strauss' "Die Fledermaus." Together, these talented musicians hope to encourage interest and enjoyment of the classical tradition, while perpetuating curiosity by presenting artists who have tested seemingly un-similar musical waters. Tickets range from $10-$15.

Christopher O'Riley, perhaps best known for his piano interpretations of Radiohead songs, will accompany the Springfield Symphony Orchestra this Sunday to raise funds for Northampton Academy of Music.

UMass' own metal band draws influences from jazz, literature

By Patrick Rennick

It is relatively quiet on Friday nights in this Amherst neighborhood. Yet, deep within the basement of the "Metal Mansion," a blistering sonic assault is taking place. Amidst a washing machine and a small library of books, local metalheads Deathamphetamine are rehearsing their brutal blend of death thrash metal.

The "Metal Mansion" is a seven person house located a couple of miles away from the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus. The site of many weekend gatherings, this cozy living space is adorned with band posters ranging from power metal masters Rhapsody to innovators of melo-death Carcass. Deathamphetamine members and UMass students Scott Beckett, Ben Hunsdorfer, Cristian Gazmuri, and Marcus Frattura share the house with three other roommates.

Guitarist and Economics major Scott Beckett remembers starting the band in high school with former lead guitarist Asaf Jalfin, who also once lived in the Mansion.

"Back then we went by the name 'Buried Dreams.' We had been trying to start bands on and off for a while," said Beckett.

After they had begun jamming together, Beckett and Jalfin hooked up with Gazmuri. Deathamphetamine's drummer. With three years of experience in a high school jazz band as well as jamming with various people over the years, Gazmuri's technical skills fit right into the band's vision.

"I've always been a big fan of Art Blakey," says Gazmuri. "He was just this awesome drummer and band leader. I like to play a lot of different languages of drumming other than metal, especially jazz." Residents of the Central dormitories at UMass would often hear the band jamming in the Van Meter basement.

"We tried to play all original music," says Beckett. "We kept it low on the covers except for maybe one Misfits song." The band was even attacked on one occasion with some angry editorials in the Daily Collegian from residents of Van Meter complaining about the noise.

After a rehearsal one day the band met former bass player Chris Paulfrey. Shortly after, Beckett met Ben Hunsdorfer while working at the Franklin Dining Common on the UMass campus. After talking about grind music and the band, Hunsdorfer, currently a co-manager at the People's Market student business at UMass, became interested and decided to take over on vocal duty.

Despite the noise complaints, Deathamphetamine quickly began playing shows in Van Meter as well as at various local gatherings.

"It was kind of funny," says Beckett. "We're a metal band and we kept getting all these shows with these hippie jam bands, so we've kind of developed this strange hippie following that you wouldn't normally see with this kind of music."

Paulfrey decided to leave the band due to his affiliation with another band, The High Rise. Frattura, who had become friends with the band, decided to fill Paulfrey's absence on bass.

Utilizing his connections, Hunsdorfer began to set up shows for the band. Deathamphetamine went on to play shows in Boston, Easthampton at the Flywheel, Worcester, Providence, Allston, and Quincy.

The combination of a consistent practice schedule and regular live shows gave Deathamphetamine the confidence and experience to start recording. The band decided to hook up with Will Killingsworth of local band Ampere at Dead Air Studios in Amherst.

"He's really good," says Hunsdorfer. "He can stop the tracks right on the dime." Deathamphetamine recorded two demos in the past at Dead Air, and more recently released an EP titled "From Hand Axe to Laser."

"It was the end of June and it was about 99 degrees out," said Beckett. "The studio was more like an insulated garage. We were getting brain fever in there."

"I think I speak for everyone," said Frattura. "In that atmosphere we just couldn't think. The heat definitely had an effect on the recording."

"It definitely got sticky and sweaty, but it wasn't that bad," said Gazmuri. "I wasn't playing my best on the day of the recording but I think that was more me than the heat." Yet, after 28 hours in the face of brain fever, the EP was complete and the metal gods sent their regards.

"Right after we finished we walked out of the studio and there was this thunderstorm," said Beckett. "These huge chunks of hail just started falling from the sky!"

After the recording, the EP was mastered at New Alliance Audio in Boston. "The New Alliance studios are really nice. It really made me appreciate what a real recording studio is like," Beckett said.

"From Hand Axe to Laser" takes Deathamphetamine into a much more intense, brutal territory. The track "Crush," written by Frattura, exhibits his old-school death metal influences with speedy riffs and agonizing screams.

"I kind of wrote it the way I thought our songs should sound, really fast and really brutal," says Frattura. "I was experimenting one night and I came up with these interesting patterns. I wasn't even thinking about the way the riff sounded. I was focusing more on patterns on the fret board, and some of them came out to be cool-sounding riffs, especially when I played them really fast." Hunsdorfer also mixed in some of his crust and doom influences for the title track.

"'From Hand Axe to Laser' is based on this book I read about the evolution of man's use of energy over time," says Hunsdorfer. The lyrics to this track weave an intricate comical tale, spanning the dawn of tools to the unknown future of technology.

"The riffs to this song were really difficult for me to learn

Learning to 'Just Breathe'

Anna Nalick's debut album, "Wreck of the Day," is a pleasant surprise of a pop album. Actually, it's difficult to call it a pop album. Nalick cites influences such as Jeff Buckley, Nirvana, Blind Melon and Sheryl Crow, and these all shine through. Nalick is much more a singer/songwriter than a pop star, and her lyrics — yes, she writes them all — are as much of an attraction as her voice. The musical side of the album, too, is difficult to attach the pop label to. Certainly, there is some pop influence, but it often calls to mind the Wallflowers — with whom Nalick recently toured — and various classic rock influences. Producers Christopher Thorn and Brad Smith, both of Blind Melon, manage to make all of the instruments sound good without crossing into the realm of overproduction; everything still sounds real.

Last Friday at Pearl Street, Nalick played the second show of her first headlining tour, predictably called the "Wreck of the Day" Tour. In an interview with the Collegian, she expressed her nervousness and excitement about the tour stating that things felt different when it was her name on the marquee.

Of course, being the headliner does have its benefits; Anna related the story of the bus they were in while touring with the Wallflowers, which was missing its back window due to a drunken episode involving the person who used it before her band. Of the first show of this tour, she said, "That was the first time an entire audience sang along to every song. Usually everyone sings 'Breathe,' but I could have stopped at any time, and the audience would have known the words. It was very flattering."

Opening for Nalick on this tour are Nashville's Blue Merle, a band whose sound can best be described as a combination of Dave Matthews, John Mayer, Coldplay and Nickel Creek, although the last may come to mind simply because of mandolinist Beau Stapleton. This wide range of similarities would be appealing, but somehow every Blue Merle song manages to sound exactly like a song one of those artists would write. All of their songs sound like some thing you've heard before, which is especially disappointing because the members of Blue Merle are all excellent musicians. An energetic cover of the Police's "So Lonely" was a welcome addition to their set, but in all, they just weren't very exciting. Given the talents of the individual musicians, they should be able to do better.

The easiest difference to spot between Nalick's live show and studio work is the fact that, aside from Anna, none of the band members are the same. Drummer Ronnie Hart and bassist Tim Hogan fill in quite nicely for the musicians on the album, but the real standout is guitarist Luis Maldonado. At times it's hard to take your eyes off of him — like when he's playing blazingly fast solos with his guitar behind his head, for example. You might not think that a progressive guitarist who has played with U.F.O., Michael Schenker and a host of other bands would quite fit in with Anna's sound, but he actually complements the band quite much — even with the behind-the-head solos. It's nice to have an occasional, good distraction from the lyrics, too.

Anna does the live lead singer thing quite well, and her vocals retain much of the quality they have on the album — she can actually sing, apparently. She also does a good job entertaining the fans, and even recognized a girl in the audience — "Evanescence shirt girl," as she called her — from a previous show. Well, three previous shows, but who's counting? She even takes acoustic guitar duty for a few songs, and doesn't miss a beat — or many beats, anyway. All in all, Anna puts on a good live show, especially if you already like her music. She'll be on tour with Rob Thomas early in November.

'Unleashed' and 'Heaven' are enjoyable DVD packages

By Michael Dehan
COLLEGIAN CONTRIBUTOR

"Unleashed," starring martial arts superstar Jet Li, mentor-on-call Morgan Freeman and the incomparable Bob Hoskins, is now available on DVD in an unrated format. The disc also has the option to watch the "extended cut" of the movie, which features deleted scenes spliced into the film. The fights in the theatrical cut were already brutal to begin with, and the scenes added by director Louis Leterrier are even harsher.

The extras are less than impressive, there is a director's commentary, and even the standard behind-the-scenes documentaries are little more than interviews cut into deleted scenes from the movie.

'Unleashed'
Directed by Louis Leterrier
Starring Jet Li, Morgan Freeman
Audio/Visual 3/5
Extras 2/5
Value 2.5/5

The video transfer is fine, and what is to be expected from a major studio release. Presented in anamorphic widescreen, Leterrier's gritty urban setting comes through perfectly, warts and all. Sound is available in either Dolby 5.1 surround sound or DTS surround. The clarity of the audio is a valuable aid when trying to understand the dialogue spoken between the heavily accented characters. The pulsing beat of the soundtrack that accompanies many of the fight scenes aids the intensity of the movie.

The first feature is a short interview with director Louis Leterrier. Leterrier discusses how the movie came about and shows his enthusiasm for making it something more than a typical action flick. He praises Li and Lee for their performances and actions in awe of Jet Li's martial-arts abilities.

"Serve No Master" begins with an interview with star Jet Li. Li discusses his character's journey from inhuman killing machine to emotionally tender protagonist. The bulk of this feature, however, is the lengthy dissection of a gladiatorial pit-fighting scene. We see how Li and fight choreographer Woo-ping Yuen meticulously plan and execute each shot of the fight, side-by-side views of the production and finished film show how the effort came together and paid off in a highly energized scene.

"The Collar Comes Off" is a fairly traditional behind-the-scenes featurette focused around cast interviews and clips from the movie. As with the other bonus features on this disc, the documentary contains a little too much footage from the film you've just watched — two minutes of listening to Bob Hoskins praise Morgan Freeman does not make up for five minutes of a previously viewed scene. The mini-doc comes off as more of an advertisement for the movie than a supplement to it. It provides little new insight into the workings of the film, and as cool as Bob Hoskins is, even he can't keep this glorified commercial entertaining.

The DVD also spotlights two music videos. "Atta Boy" by Massive Attack and "Unleash Me" by The RZA. The "Atta Boy" video is a fast-paced collection of fight footage from the movie set to Massive Attack's techno track. It's short and sweet, showing the best battle shots the film has to offer. The sound effects from the movie are intact in the video, however, making anything but the beat almost impossible to hear or appreciate. The RZA video is a bit better, showing the same movie footage but edited into a stylized kung-fu comic book setting with the rapper overlooking the action. It's an interesting effect and should be enjoyable to any fan of the song.

Kingdom of Heaven DVD

Director Ridley Scott reinvigorated the historical epic genre with "Gladiator" in 2000. His latest stab at the "heroes with swords" category, "Kingdom of Heaven," failed to live up to the high standards, both critically and financially, established by that earlier film. Originally released in May of this year, "Kingdom" hit store shelves Tuesday in a two-disc edition that brings out the best, but preserves the worst, that this ambitious film has to offer.

'Kingdom of Heaven'
Directed by Ridley Scott
Starring Orlando Bloom
Audio/Visual 4/5
Extras 3/5
Value 2.5/5

The strengths of the movie, the fierce battle sequences and jaw-dropping scenery, are presented well in the disc's 2.35:1 widescreen format. From the subtle differences in the tone of the desert battlefields to the brilliant rainbow of color exhibited by the crusaders' banners, the colors here are vivid and crisp. The epic scope Scott puts on displays, from stunning shots of ships at sea to the mustering of a 20,000-man Muslim army, might loose some impact seen on anything but the best of home theater systems, but there's still a enough punch in the visuals to make this a great looking film.

Sound is available in 5.1 Dolby Surround, the superior DTS Surround and the standard 2-channel Spanish and French language tracks. An action film like this presents the opportunity to take advantage of DTS' ability to render crystal clear audio down to the tiniest of sound effects. Arrows zoom from one corner of the room to the other, music slowly creeps from background and foreground, and dialogue stays the center of attention throughout the movie to create a satisfying and immersive audio experience.

The DVD lacks the familiar director's commentary (possibly due to the persistent rumors of the director's cut edition coming along soon), but does offer many other worthwhile bonus features. Aside from the standard and increasingly boring "behind the scenes" featurettes, television previews and trailers, the set includes a television special looking at the historical evidence surrounding the crusades and a text-based "Pilgrim's Guide" which provides historical factoids and quotes throughout the movie. The second disc contains an interactive "production grid" that allows the viewer to choose which portion of the documentary features (directing, crew and cast) they would like to see. The historical material is educational, but the rest of the features are roughly the same stuff you've seen a dozen times on other DVDs.

The worth of this film is in the effects and the strong supporting performances from Liam Neeson (when was the last time he lived through a movie?!) and Jeremy Irons. The almost inevitable release of a full-fledged director's cut makes this disc hard to recommend to any serious DVD collector, but if you're willing to put up the $15-$20 just to have it, it's a worthy presentation of the film's theatrical cut.

Orlando Bloom stars in Ridley Scott's historical epic, "Kingdom of Heaven." The DVD lacks features one may come to expect, such as director's commentary, but offers other worthwhile bonuses.

UMass, raise your horns for Deathamphetamine

at first," says Frattura. "But I ended up getting them down really good." Frattura and Jalfin spent a week during the summer sleeping on couches at the Metal Mansion before recording began to practice. The band has come to call this practice session the "Epic Metal Boot Camp."

"I ended up having to help Asaf out with a bunch of riffs during that week," says Beckett. "It was kind of strange, because when we started out Asaf was the one who taught me how to play 'metal guitar' and now I was teaching him."

Beckett wrote the epic power-metal tinged, "The Savage Curtain."

"This song is based around a Star Trek episode I saw once called 'The Savage Curtain,'" says Beckett. "The song revolves around a guy who watches this episode and takes it to heart. The guy watches way too much Star Trek, so it makes him paranoid. He decides to hijack a nuclear sub so he can wage war against mankind." The song ends with a quote from Captain Kirk: "What gives you the right to hand out life and death?"

After the completion of this latest recording, Jalfin stepped down from lead guitar. With a management degree from UMass, Jalfin has gone on to a managerial position at Walgreen's Drug Stores.

"The E.P. is kind of a tribute to Asaf," says Beckett. "We wanted to give him a nice send-off."

Luckily for Deathamphetamine, Nick Tranghessi was on hand to take over for Jalfin. Tranghessi, whom the band has affectionately dubbed "the De Niro of metal" (due to a striking resemblance to the actor), has always wanted to play in a metal band, but he never had the chance. Luckily, the UMass alumnus was referred to the band, and now he plans to put his 12 years of guitar shredding experience to good use.

"Asaf was really happy for us when he heard Nick play," says Hunsdorfer. "He said that Nick's playing style was what he had always been going for when he played."

With several years under their belts and a solid lineup, Deathamphetamine is now looking to set up their own tour. If all goes well, the band will start the tour sometime in December through World Leader Records. They plan to play shows along the East Coast, stopping in Philadelphia, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Virginia. If all goes well, the band plans to hit the recording studio with Tranghessi next spring.

"We want to go back and maybe re-record some of the songs with Nick," says Hunsdorfer.

Deathamphetamine will be playing a show on Nov. 18 at the Compound in Fitchburg alongside Boston's Cryptic Warning, an old-school thrash band consisting of a handful of talented musicians barely breaking the age of 19. Tickets are $10 for adults 18 and over and $5 for adults 21 and over. Also appearing at the show are thrashers The Accursed and Smite the Righteous.

Pivotal game for Minutemen against defending champions

UMass [illegible] JM

Swim seasons to begin

By Brendan Hall
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When it comes to water sports, the University of Massachusetts [illegible] a thing or two about success.

The men's and women's swimming and diving teams are beginning to [illegible] out a niche in his[illegible] by consistently maintaining their own [illegible] and this year the light [illegible] does not get any dimmer, [illegible] several outstanding [illegible] coupled with quality [illegible] make this squad well-[illegible].

[illegible]-mindedness will [illegible] the pool — no pun [illegible] this weekend, when the [illegible] arrive in Storrs, [illegible] Invitational [illegible] provide some good [illegible] experience. The [illegible] and White aren't exactly [illegible] on creep, which could [illegible] as helpful. Recent his[illegible]

[illegible] Russ Yarworth [illegible] large incoming class, [illegible] up.

"[illegible] have 14 or 15 [illegible] are going to have [illegible] of, maybe the [illegible] be cohesive right away," [illegible] 2005 Atlantic 10 [illegible] Yar[illegible] said. "It seemed [illegible] days we had a good [illegible] team cohesion. That [illegible] makes an individual [illegible] easier for the [illegible]

[illegible] to them, too. With [illegible] level experience [illegible] look to the [illegible] step up for leadership. [illegible] no seniors.

[illegible] division is punishing? [illegible] UMass won the last [illegible] after the Minutemen [illegible] this school.

[illegible] wants to be the [illegible] to win the [A-10] [illegible] Yarworth said. "So [illegible] [people] a lot easier for me. I'm surrounded by a good coaching staff and good captains. Motivation isn't a problem."

Women

After a strong finish to the 2004-2005 season that saw the Minutewomen end up in fourth at the A-10 Championships, head coach Bob Newcomb is optimistic about carrying that momentum into the beginning of this season and, possibly, the rest.

"Our goal is to continue to work our way back," Newcomb said, alluding to the Minutewomen's last A-10 Championship season in 2001. "That was a great finish [last year] ... I think we've tried to address some of the issues from last year to be able to help us go from fourth to third now."

Sophomore Samantha Dennis, the team's Rookie of the Year last season, figures to help shoulder some of that load on the way up. She ranks fourth all-time in UMass history in the 200 and sixth all-time in the 100, to put things into perspective.

Like the men, the women feature some talented recruits that Newcomb feels "filled in some areas where we needed filling in." Unlike the men, however, the women have the luxury of senior leadership, with six of them.

"The upperclassmen really made a concerted effort to come back really ready to go this year," Newcomb said. "We've been able to step things up this year early, and we've been able to [illegible] the way they've shown up and the atmosphere they've created."

Third place in the A-10? Don't rule it out.

Divers

When asked about her divers' potential this season, diving coach Mandy Hixon cuts right to the chase.

"This is the best team I've had," Hixon said. "This is the first year that all of the kids are kids I've recruited, so I'm excited about that. They're hard workers."

They, like the swimmers, are young on the whole. The team features no seniors, two juniors, one sophomore and three freshmen, but at the same time packs a lot of punch.

Mary Jenkins, for one, was named the team's Most Valuable Player last season as a sophomore. She holds the school record in the three-meter dive, totaling 397.25 points on six dives.

Then there's Reuben Rappe, a Farmington, Minn., native who advanced to the NCAA Regionals in the one-meter dive — as a freshman. This season, there's no telling what he'll have in store for the competition this time around. Another trip to the Regionals sounds reasonable.

"I think we could have four kids at the NCAA zone meet [Regionals] this year, pretty realistically," Hixon said. "And I think my freshman girl, I think she's honestly good enough to make it to the NCAAs."

That freshman she's talking about is Karen Upperco, a three-time All-American at Hopewell Valley Central High School in Pennington, N.J., who was also a ten-time National Diving Qualifier.

Again, youth isn't such a bad thing.

Scioscia makes the right moves

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

CHICAGO — The old catcher knows his limits. Handling a pitching staff is practically second nature for Mike Scioscia. Sensing when the other team wants to steal a base is something he can do with his eyes closed. Coaxing an honest effort from his team comes easy to a guy who made his name by never once backing down in dozens of collisions at home plate.

But after dragging his Los Angeles Angels across the country and then halfway back in the span of 30 hours, Scioscia knew he couldn't wave a wand and wipe away the fatigue. Ditto for the disorientation. But his ballplayers' attitude?

Well, that's one department where Scioscia never hesitates to tinker.

"He makes sure nobody complains about anything — ever," Angels third base coach Ron Roenicke said. "Obviously, it doesn't do any good and Mike just hates ..."

And here, Roenicke paused. He glanced down the hallway of the visitors' clubhouse, making sure the boss was nowhere within earshot. Scioscia has a well-deserved reputation as one of the nicest guys in the game, but there are places you don't go with him. Jose Guillen, one of Los Angeles' most productive hitters last season, showed Scioscia up in the closing days of the playoff race, got benched on the spot and shipped to Washington soon after.

"Anytime he hears any negativity," Roenicke added, his voice lowered, "well, Mike just jumps on that."

The way Los Angeles stole the opening game of the ALCS is simple: Garrett Anderson homered in the second, the White Sox made enough bad choices on a few slow rollers to surrender two more runs in the third, and Angels starter Paul Byrd made them stand up long enough for the bullpen to ride to his rescue.

How Los Angeles did it, though, is a little more complicated. It was one of those games where a manager has to walk a fine line, where what he doesn't do is every bit as important as what he does.

That deft touch is one reason why the Dodgers faithful want their old catcher back in blue, this time as a manager, especially now that the vacancy is official. But for all the clamoring, it's the same reason why Scioscia likely won't trade one end of Los Angeles for the other anytime soon. He's already got a ballclub willing and able to follow his lead.

After beating the Yankees in Anaheim, the Angels jumped on the redeye and finally wheeled their luggage into hotel rooms in Chicago at 7 a.m. When Byrd rolled over and checked the alarm clock Tuesday — "One of those days when you wake up, the room is dark and you say, 'Where am I?'" — it was 1 p.m.

Compared to a few of his teammates, though, Byrd already looked like a morning person. Pitching coach Bud Black considered holding a few one-on-one meetings with his staff to go over the White Sox hitters, but quickly decided most of the guys would be better served holding "individual meetings with their beds." Even so, Scot Shields, the reliever who bailed Byrd out of a jam in the seventh, would have to splash some water on his face sitting in the bullpen four innings earlier to keep himself from falling back asleep.

When the whole motley crew finally gathered at the ballpark, Scioscia must have been tempted to deliver one of those "I-know-you're-tired, we're-all-tired" speeches. Make that really tempted, and his ballplayers knew it. He's won a World Series and a few playoff rounds in Los Angeles, but in six tries, Scioscia has never won a series opener. Even so, he scrapped the pregame talk altogether.

Maybe Scioscia figured opening up the floor to any discussion would be inviting a gripe session. Maybe he just figured everybody felt as lousy as he did.

"The last 48 hours," Scioscia acknowledged afterward, "have been a blur."

St. Louis looking tough

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (4-7-0 0-1-0 Atlantic 10) began its conference season last Sunday with a 2-1 loss to Rhode Island (5-5-1 1-0-0 A-10), the product of a meltdown in the final minutes that allowed the Rams to turn a 1-0 deficit into a 2-1 victory.

It left the Minutemen looking up at the rest of the A-10 competition, including decorated teams like the Duquesne Dukes and the Saint Louis Billikens — both teams are undefeated in the conference and boast impressive resumes, and it looks to be a two-team race for the conference title this year.

What's a Billiken?

The Saint Louis Billikens were added to the A-10 this year, and they will be unwelcome competitors for teams that would like to avoid a confrontation with a team as potent as Saint Louis. Further research into its mascot, the Billiken, suggests that it is a fictional character made up by the University. The mascot shown in a picture online resembled an elephant, but the origin of the nickname is not clear.

Mascot woes aside, the Saint Louis men's soccer team had been a perennial powerhouse in Conference USA for the last decade before its recent move to the A-10. It won eight championships in 10 years in Conference USA, and is considered by many to be the home of soccer in the United States. As a result, the A-10 welcomed its new addition with open arms and granted it the honor of hosting the NCAA men's college cup in December of 2006.

The Billikens' on-field presence doesn't fall short of expectation, as five players were selected to the preseason A-10 All-Conference teams. Junior midfielder John DiRaimondo won Player of the Week honors for his performance last weekend in Saint Louis' first conference games; he posted back-to-back two-goal games in both A-10 contests, propelling his team to the top of the A-10 early in the conference season. DiRaimondo also had two goals and three assists, good for seven points, in an 8-0 win over Saint Joseph's on Oct. 9.

The Billikens also carried the Rookie of the Week honors, as freshman forward Larry Geraghty posted the first hat trick of his career in the 8-0 shutout of the Hawks. The Billikens were the preseason prediction by the National Soccer Coaches Association of America poll to win the A-10 regular season, and with a 2-0 start they are well on their way.

The Dukes have also had early conference success, as they are knotted atop the A-10 with the Billikens, both owning 2-0 records. Duquesne was ranked No. 16 nationally in this week's NSCAA Top 25 poll. St. Louis is riding a three-game winning streak after defeating St. Josephs and Temple this weekend in its first conference games.

Mr. Clutch

URI forward Jeffrey Gonsalves had himself a pretty good week; his recent goals have been timely and have been the difference in the Rams' previous wins over the Minutemen and the Harvard Crimson, he scored the game-winning goal in a two-overtime match against the Crimson, and he came through again with another game-winning strike in the final minutes of a match with the Minutemen to put the Rams up 2-1 and seal the victory.

Strong weekend for UMass

By Joey White
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's cross country team finished 17th out of 44 teams at the New England Championships last Saturday. This finish was a few spots back from last year's race, when the Minutewomen placed 11th.

For the 11th consecutive race, sophomore Christina Derosa led the Minutewomen with a 21st-place finish out of 301 runners and a time of 18:38.

As in its previous race at the Paul Short Invitational, UMass had a new second place finisher. Junior Cuisle Kierans placed 89th with a time of 19:32. Third to cross the line for the Minutewomen was sophomore Amanda Bodette, who placed 118th with a time of 19:55. Sophomore Ashley Davidson followed in 128th place with a time of 20:02. Erin O'Donnell rounded off the top six runners for UMass, with a 140th-place finish in 20:08, and senior Suzanne Simmons crossed the line at 216th-place with a time of 21:05.

The Maroon and White will return to action on Oct. 22 at the Central Connecticut State Mini-Meet. The last time the Minutewomen were in New Britain was in 2003, and they finished seventh out of nine teams.

The Massachusetts men's cross-country team placed 16th out of 47 teams at the New England Championships last weekend at Franklin Park in Boston. The Minutemen finished 21st at this event last year.

The Maroon and White were led by sophomore Nils Fischer for the fourth consecutive race, as he crossed the line 22nd out of 321 runners with a time of 25:38. Fischer improved 100 spots from his freshman race here.

Next to cross the line after Fischer for UMass was senior Ryan Corbett, who placed 69th with a time of 26:33. The next two for the Maroon and White finished together, as freshman Jesse Regnier placed 101st (26:56) and junior Michael Dulong, one second behind Regnier, had a 103rd showing. Senior Sean Corbett rounded off UMass' top six, finishing 141st with a time of 27:16, and senior Matthew Clark placed 180th with a time of 27:39.

This week the Minutemen are gearing up for another big meet at the Penn State Invitational on Saturday.

This is the first time the Maroon and White will be competing at this meet, and it will consist of 38 teams and roughly 350 runners.

"I think the team was prepared [last week]," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "We're still a little inconsistent."

The next time the Minutemen will be in action is at the A-10 Championship in Philadelphia next weekend. This meet means more to the athletes, said O'Brien, and is about half the size of the previous meets they have been competing in.

"We had some guys go out fast last weekend," O'Brien said. "Now we're working with solving the problems with opening paces."

This meet is similar in size to the Paul Short Invitational on Oct. 1, where the Minutemen placed 34th out of 44 teams, and is a notch behind the New England Championships. These are big meet packages, said O'Brien, who added that the runners need to work on adjustments to help them pursue their race better as a team.

"This is how the season progresses," O'Brien said. "We need to approach problem solving for the best style of running for our runners, the best combinations. We haven't put that together yet, and so we have been inconsistent."

The Maroon and White do have some nagging injuries, in senior Ryan Corbett, sophomore Ryan Durkin and freshman Jesse Regnier. O'Brien said that they can't tell yet how their injuries are going to affect them, and will not make a decision whether or not they will compete this weekend until later in the week.

One team has it, and the other one wants it.

Though the No. 4 James Madison Dukes (4-1 2-0 Atlantic 10) probably won't be sporting their 2004 national championship rings during their Saturday meeting with the No. 13 Massachusetts football team (4-1 3-0 A-10), the Minutemen will be attempting to move one step closer to completing their mission of taking JMU's jewelry away by knocking off the defending champs at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium at noon.

The matchup pits the last two teams in the Atlantic 10 with undefeated conference records and two coaches — UMass coach Don Brown and JMU coach Mickey Matthews — who are close friends, as long as they aren't playing one another.

"We talked Sunday," Brown said. "I told him, 'Don't call me anymore, because I'm not your friend'."

On the field Saturday will be two of the best defenses in the nation. Add that to sloppy field conditions due to Saturday's Mud Bowl against Northeastern along with more rain expected this weekend, and scoring could be at a premium.

The Minutemen are ranked No. 1 in the NCAA in total defense (162 yards per game), scoring defense (5.8 points per game) and passing defense (81.6 yards per game) and are ranked eighth in rushing defense (80.4 yards per game).

The Dukes are ranked No. 4 in total defense (233.2 yards per game), No. 3 in scoring defense (10 yards per game) and No. 2 in rushing defense (53.4 yards per game).

"They're big guys," UMass quarterback Liam Coen said of the Dukes defense. "They are veterans up front. The linebackers run very well to

UM ready for tough stretch

The day has finally come. It is the day to get amped, pumped and completely enthralled in the concept of Atlantic 10 football, or football in general. The Division I-AA playoffs do not officially kick off until Nov. 26, but for the No. 13 Massachusetts football team, the fate of its very existence in the 2005 playoffs truly lies in the upcoming weeks.

For UMass, Saturday screams the word "playoffs." The Minutemen will be hosting No. 4 James Madison — the defending national champions. JMU is a team that sits at 4-1 and has outscored its opponents by a margin of 201-19 during those four wins. And most importantly, the Dukes are an A-10 foe.

The very fact that the Dukes are sporting rings that signify a title is enough to get the Minutemen's maroon-colored adrenaline pumping. When the first ball gets kicked and the first whistle blows on Saturday, helmets will collide and there will be plenty of KOs to wince about. But UMass coach Don Brown is expecting exactly that.

"This isn't going to be pretty now," Brown said. "This is going to be physical, and you better button up your chinstrap and get ready to go."

There is, however, even more incentive to tack onto the fact that they are the defending champs, the No. 4 ranked team in the nation and hold a 4-1 record. James Madison beat UMass 28-7 during the regular season in 2004.

I don't know about you, but my chinstrap is buttoned up.

It doesn't stop with the Dukes, though — JMU is just the beginning of a strenuous second half of the 2005 season for the Minutemen.

After traveling to Maine on Oct. 22 for its first road trip since Sept. 10, UMass will return home for yet another challenge against the No. 8 Wildcats of New Hampshire, a team that made it to the quarterfinals of the 2004 playoffs.

Despite a shocking 42-10 loss against William and Mary on Saturday, the UNH game is still a battle ready to happen, and the Wildcats are certainly loaded with ammunition.

Don't get comfortable. We're not even close to being finished yet.

Following a visit by the Wildcats, the Minutemen get to take a trip to compete against another A-10 threat — No. 22 Delaware on Nov. 5. Delaware was also a playoff team in 2004 and won the National Championship in 2003.

The Fightin' Blue Hens' rings aren't as shiny as the Dukes, but they certainly aren't dusty either.

The 2005 regular season for the Massachusetts football team is then capped off in none other than — you guessed it — the great state of New York. First the Minutemen take on Army on Nov. 12, its first and only Division I-A opponent of the season, at Michie Stadium in West Point, N.Y. Then they travel to Hempstead, N.Y. on Nov. 19 for the final contest of the season against Hofstra.

With practically every game from here on essential towards UMass' playoff run, there is some hard-hitting, helmet-denting, jersey-tearing football on the horizon for the Maroon and White. And there is no doubt in my mind that they are looking forward to every minute of it.

Midnight Madness is chance for fans to show their support

Dan Duggan

I can remember earlier this semester, tailgating before the Albany and URI football games and thinking how much different it must be to go to a school with a big-time football program where tailgating is the number one thing going on every weekend.

Clearly, there are reasons why UMass will never be a school where the football team is a huge draw, the most obvious being that the team competes in Division I-AA and plays in a stadium that needs to rent lights just to have night games.

But even if UMass eventually makes the jump to Division I-A and gets a new stadium, there's an even bigger reason why this will never be a football school: because UMass is a basketball school, first and foremost.

Sure, there are high-profile sports — namely football, hockey and lacrosse — that have had successful seasons recently, but the first sport that always comes up when discussing UMass is basketball.

And while attendance was embarrassingly low during the Steve Lappas era, the fan support could turn around just as quickly, as evidenced by last year's UConn game — a packed Mullins Center filled with fans going crazy during a nationally televised game.

The point of all of this is that Midnight Madness is coming back to UMass tomorrow night after a two-year hiatus — a hiatus that is almost unimaginable considering how big this program was just a decade ago.

This year some of the interest in this once-storied program is back, and it's due mainly to the hiring of new coach Travis Ford. Ford has been focused on bringing in top players and traveling around the area to meet fans, and in just seven months he has done an impressive job in both bringing in talent and exciting the fan base.

Tomorrow night at the Cage at 10 p.m. fans will have their first chance to truly welcome Ford and show the team that there will be more support this year.

And while I will always think about being a fan of the Calipari, Roe and Camby teams whenever UMass basketball comes up, my job as a journalist is to cover this team objectively, and I plan to do so. But I feel the need to take this one opportunity to let you know that the team seems to be on its way to getting back on the national scene, and that, as a fan, there would be nothing better for this campus than for the team to return to prominence.

Now, I'm not trying to come off like some cheerleader for the team, and I promise that I will never write a column begging fans to attend games. I know that if the team is good, you'll show up, and if it's not, you won't — and I won't blame you. My point is that the team has a good chance at being competitive, and you should get on board early.

Will this team win 20-plus games and bring back memories of '96? Probably not, but this year's team will be better than the last few years, and fans can count on seeing an energetic team playing an up-tempo brand of basketball.

All the fans have to do is show up and try to bring back some of the atmosphere from the mid-90's, and hope that the play on the court can begin to get back to that level. And the first chance for fans to show up and get behind this team will be tomorrow night.

So give up one Friday night. It's getting too cold to stand outside at parties at Hobart and the Townhouses, and Charlie's and McMurphy's aren't going anywhere. Just take one night and go have fun in a way you won't be able to again once you pull onto the Mass Pike for the last time and leave this campus for good.

This might only be your team for one more year, or maybe two; maybe you're lucky and you'll get to see this team grow for your whole college career.

But no matter what, if this team ever gets back to the top, it'll be an unforgettable experience, and tomorrow night is your first chance to hop on for the ride.

Minutewomen host A-10 foes

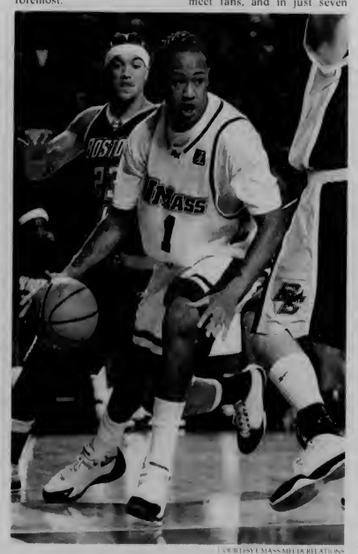
By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

With the first weekend of Atlantic 10 games in the books, the Massachusetts field hockey team returns home for a week-end homestand against conference rivals La Salle and West Chester. Last weekend, the Minutewomen (4-9 1-1 Atlantic 10) split a two-game road trip, losing Friday to No. 20 Richmond 4-1 and rebounding to defeat St. Louis 3-2 Sunday on Katelyn Orlando's last-second goal.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Sophomore midfielder Patricia Borneo and the Minutewomen will host LaSalle Friday at 2:30 p.m. and West Chester Sunday at noon.

This weekend is part of a stretch of three straight home games that includes next Wednesday's game against non-conference opponent Dartmouth.



On Friday the Minutewomen will host La Salle (3-11 1-1 A-10) in their third conference game of the season. Despite a 3-11 overall record, the Explorers have played their conference rivals tough, defeating Saint Joseph's 2-1 in double overtime, and then losing to a hot Temple team 2-1 in a single overtime period. The loss was their third consecutive overtime game, as La Salle fell to Lafayette on the road 5-4 in extra time the week before.

UMass will be looking to build on last year's 3-2 victory over the Explorers that went to a second overtime and was eventually decided by penalty shots. UMass has lost just once to La Salle, a 2-0 defeat in 2003, and is 9-1 all-time against the Explorers.

The Minutewomen won't be going anywhere after Friday's game, as they will be hosting West Chester on Sunday. The Golden Rams (7-6 0-2 A-10) were a promising 7-4 before A-10 play began last weekend, but dropped two straight games to conference foes Temple (4-2) and St. Joe's (5-2). UMass historically has had plenty of success against its rival, but has lost the last two years to the Golden Rams. Overall, the Minutewomen have won 11 times against West Chester, while losing only four times. The two teams have also tied once with a 0-0 overtime split in 1988, a year that the Minutewomen won the Atlantic 10 Championship.

At 1-1 in the Atlantic 10, UMass coach Patty Shea knows her team is in great position to advance to this year's conference tournament. But to do that, there is more work to be done.

"We need to work on our finishing — we have to be able to put the ball in the net," Shea said. "We also have to work on our ball positioning. We work so hard and make some great defensive plays, but then give it right back to [the other team]."

Steam sets off alarms in UMass' SOM

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Fire alarms that went off in the Isenberg School of Management today at approximately 2:45 pm were chalked up to a burst steam pipe on the basement floor of the building.

Emma Dusenbury, a senior philosophy and Spanish major, was in class in the basement when the fire alarms went off. According to Dusenbury, the students thought nothing of the fire alarm at first, assuming that someone had simply pulled it. The students stayed in the classroom for a few minutes to pack up their notebooks and put on their jackets.

"Then we went out in the hall and saw smoke or steam at the other end. It smelled more like steam, so we figured the boiler had blown or something. There wasn't any noise beforehand or anything, the alarm just went off."

Firefighters arrived minutes after students evacuated the building, but stayed for only half an hour before giving the all-clear call and allowing students to re-enter S.O.M. The steam pipe was turned off and the steam and water stopped gathering.

The basement of the building, however, had to be blocked off for the rest of the afternoon since it had been flooded with up to an inch of water in some places.

Addison, an OIT telecommunications worker, arrived soon after the event to check on the telecommunications station located near an area with minor flooding. "The switch room is flooded, with about a half an inch of water in some places," he said, "But [the water] didn't affect the equipment."

Patrick McRae and Tina Baceski, maintenance workers at S.O.M., were already plugging in a machine to vacuum up the water and inspecting the halls for damage done by the time Addison arrived. McRae suspects that the water will be cleaned up completely by the morning. "The night crew will finish taking care of it," he said.

Dining Services serves up 'Local' flavor

By Hannah Leung
Collegian Correspondent

Well, apparently, the University of Massachusetts and its students like their apples locally grown. Since the start of the school year, the University has been taking an active role in the "Be a Local Hero, Buy Locally Grown" agriculture program.

The change can already be seen on menus at the dining commons. Students may have noticed the signs that detail the local origin of the food and vegetables, such as carrots, cabbage, corn, cucumbers, eggplant, onion, summer squash, turnips and even honey. All hardboiled brown eggs on the morning menu are also local.

It is also hard to miss the massive displays of apples in many dining halls, such as the Berkshire Dining Common. Recently added was the local fresh turkey, a popular hit among students. These healthy yet delicious choices please the palate of both students and staff alike.

"I love the carrots," says Russell Goetze, a freshman sociology major. "I used to eat them frozen at home. Now, I eat a lot more vegetables and fruits than I used to, just because they're so readily available."

The "Be a Local Hero" program is a non-profit organization founded in 1999 by the Community Involved in Sustaining Agriculture (CISA). The goal of the CISA is to sustain and strengthen agriculture in western Massachusetts by building relationships between consumers and farmers. CISA programs and services are effective at enhancing the local economy, according to the organization.

Fresh, healthy products of small farms are available, affordable and accessible, proving cooperation between UMass and local farmers to be mutually beneficial.

UMass is actively buying produce from local farmers in the Pioneer Valley. Ken Toong, Dining Services director, is one of the leading forces in this switch. Toong was first introduced to the "Be a Local Hero" program through the chef conference that takes place each year. After seeing the benefits it reaped for both sides, Toong set the goals to increase the total amount of local produce used in the cafeteria from the current status of 12 percent to eventually 50 percent by the end of this year.

Toong reports that UMass is planning on spending $150,000 of the nearly $1 million it spends annually on produce (approximately 15 percent) on local produce. In fact, in September, Worchester Dining Commons alone used 11 tons of locally-grown goods.

"The students love it. Local farmers really appreciate it, it's a win-win for everyone," Toong said.

Toong also notices that students themselves have begun noting the differences in the tastes and freshness of the produce.

Eduardo Pinto, a sophomore in the mechanical engineering program, also voiced his love for the tomatoes.

"I like the tomatoes a lot," said Pinto, "especially the ones that look like jelly."

UMass joins the other surrounding colleges to take an active role in supporting local farms. Amherst College, Smith College, Mount Holyoke and Hampshire College all take part in this program. Toong said that UMass hopes, though, to take the leading role through investing itself greatly in the program.

"We are proud to be taking a leadership role in support of the local farmers and growers," he said.

Worcester Dining Common held its annual "Apple Week" celebration using apples from local orchards. The celebration acts in conjunction with its active role in the "Be a Local Hero, Buy Locally Grown" agriculture program.

Local hospital reaches out to cancer patients

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Correspondent

St. Jude's Research Hospital is the single largest treatment center for pediatric cancer and other childhood catastrophic diseases in the United States, and on Nov. 8, University of Massachusetts students will be able to contribute to their cause for the third year in the "Up 'Til Dawn" fundraiser being held in the Student Ballroom.

St. Jude's, based out of Memphis, has made tremendous strides in the treatment of childhood cancer, raising the survival rate from less than 20 percent in 1962 when the center was opened to more than 70 percent today.

However, the cost to operate such an enormous facility is expensive, to the tune of $1,027,832 a day.

This is where the students of UMass factor into the equation.

The "Up 'Til Dawn" fundraiser, which runs from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m., calls upon students to sign up a team of six people and bring the names and addresses of 50 people that they know down to the Student Ballroom.

Once they arrive, they will each fill out a pre-written letter provided by St. Jude's with a name and address one by one until they've etched out 50 specific names and addresses.

Each letter asks the recipient for a donation to the hospital and research center. Once the student has finished with their 50 letters they receive a complementary St. Jude's Nalgene water bottle and are given the chance to stay in the ballroom and enjoy the free food, prizes and music provided by St. Jude's.

Also on hand will be a St. Jude's patient to tell their own first-hand account of the work the research center is doing.

This is nothing new to some students here at UMass. The first time St. Jude's came to Amherst for a fundraiser, the university was able to raise a sum of just over $12,000.

However, last year the students stepped up and were able to double the previous year's total, raising $23,449 by taking the time to accumulate 50 names and addresses.

Not only are UMass students involved in raising the money for the foundation, there is also an Executive Board comprised of students who have been working all throughout the summer and into the fall planning the event and doing all that they can to recruit people and raise awareness for the effort being put forth by St. Jude's.

St. Jude's is also stretching its arms out even further to reach those in need of help. Hurricane Katrina, the disaster that disabled the Gulf Coast of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, had left many children stricken with cancer without a place to seek refuge and treatment.

The hospital is currently taking in non-St. Jude pediatric cancer patients through one of its affiliate clinics located in Baton Rouge, and in the most severe cases are even transporting some to its main campus in Memphis.

For more information on the work that St. Jude's is doing to help treat and prevent pediatric cancer, log onto their Web site at www.stjude.org, and if interested in obtaining further information about signing up for the "Up 'Til Dawn" fundraiser, send an e-mail to umassuptildawn@yahoo.com

White House says Miers won't withdraw

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House is seeking the help of Republican activists in Iowa and New Hampshire to pressure GOP senators with presidential hopes to support Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers.

The effort, coming as the White House seeks to reassure conservatives skeptical about Miers' qualifications, is largely aimed at turning up the heat on Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas. White House aides acknowledged on Thursday.

Brownback, who is considering a White House run in 2008, has not said whether he will vote for the nomination. His support is particularly important to the White House because he is one of the 10 Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will have the first vote on Miers.

Iowa and New Hampshire are early primary states important to any candidate running for president.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan dismissed the possibility that Miers might withdraw if she encounters heavy fire in her Senate confirmation.

"No one that knows her would make such a suggestion," McClellan said. "And no one that knows her record and her qualifications would make such a suggestion."

While President Bush and top aides have emphasized the nominee's evangelical faith in recent days, McClellan told reporters in a heated exchange:

"You all want to focus on side issues like religion.

"We've always talked about her record and her qualifications," McClellan said. "And I think that we are doing a disservice for the American people when we focus on other issues and not her record and qualifications and experience, because that's what matters when you're on the nation's highest court."

Conservative critics have complained that Miers, a former corporate lawyer who serves as White House counsel, lacks a clear judicial philosophy.

They have questioned whether she is the best-qualified nominee, given that she has never been a judge and has little public record.

The White House effort to try to pressure Brownback and others through prominent Republicans in New Hampshire was first reported on Thursday by the New Hampshire Union-Leader. White House aides confirmed the account and said a similar effort was being made in Iowa.

Some GOP activists attending a Brownback appearance at Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H., on Tuesday brought with them a letter to the senator signed by Republican National Committeeman Tom Rath and three others expressing confidence in Miers.

White House counsel Harriet Miers, President Bush's nominee to serve as an associate justice on the Supreme Court, meets with Senator Lindsey Graham (R-SC), in his office on Capitol Hill.

Students to explore inter-group dialogue

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Correspondent

This spring, students will have the opportunity to participate in a study of "inter-group dialogue" through a three-credit course called "Exploring Differences and Common Ground."

The course was funded through grants given to a group of universities and colleges to explore the outcome of such dialogues in fostering understanding between various social groups.

Prior studies have been based on single institutions and focused little on the processes that produced results.

The current study, initiated by the Program on Intergroup Relations at the University of Michigan, seeks to explore the impact of various processes within the dialogues at several institutions apart from the University of Massachusetts.

These institutions include the University of Michigan, Occidental College in California, the University of Washington, the University of Maryland, the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, Syracuse University, the University of Texas at Austin and the University of California, San Diego.

Assistant Professor Ximena Zuñiga will teach the course with the help of graduate students from the social justice education program at the School of Education.

Martha Stassen, director of assessment in the university's Office of Academic Planning and Assessment, will help Zuñiga with the study of the Romney promises aid for Western Mass.

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — Just hours after Gov. Mitt Romney met with lawmakers from western Massachusetts to discuss the aftermath of heavy rains and flooding there, he made his way to the area to survey the damage himself.

Romney had faced criticism for his response to the flooding, and on Wednesday promised aid to the affected communities after meeting with the lawmakers.

"We're safe and sound. Now the question is, how are we going to pay for the damage that's been caused," Romney said.

Romney said the state could qualify for federal aid if the amount of damage reaches $6.5 million. Even if it doesn't, he said he will work with the Legislature to provide financial assistance to the affected cities and towns.

He also said some of the $25 million allocated for aid to Hurricane Katrina victims could be used to help those who suffered losses in the floods.

"Clearly, it's the intent of these legislators and the administration to provide at least the same level of support to individuals from our own state that have been affected by flooding as we provided to people who come here from the devastation on the Gulf Coast," he said.

Romney spent the rest of the day assessing the damage for himself, driving along damaged stretches of Route 2 with state Highway Department officials, and visiting the hardest hit areas.

In Greenfield, among the hardest hit towns, about 75 people were displaced after the Green River crested and destroyed their mobile homes.

In other parts of the city, farmland was flooded, roads were washed out and bridges, and sewer lines were damaged.

Course addresses diversity

results of these courses on how students have come to understand other social groups.

"From our perspective, this project fits in well with the university community's recent efforts to better understand the quality of the campus' responsiveness to issues of diversity," said Zuniga.

Diversity issues have become a prominent feature of campus life in recent years. Last year the university appointed the Commission on Diversity which issued an action plan for the improvement of campus diversity this past April.

An abstract of the study states the most important question that will be faced by the program is what sort of academic programs can use diversity to promote understanding between various social groups.

The effects of the program will be measured by comparing students that are randomly assigned from the applicants and those on the waitlist. Additionally, dialogue participants will be compared to other students who are enrolled in small social science classes on race and on gender, residential learning programs and community service projects. The study will involve various measures to assess the participants of the study both before and after the course, along with a one-year follow-up.

Smoke and mirrors

Katelyn Harding

When Bush was re-elected in 2004, I assume a majority of the people trusted him to fix the "problem of weapons of mass destruction" overseas. Along with that, I think it's safe to say that Bush supporters trusted him with the lives of our American troops, believing that Bush would do anything to keep our soldiers alive, and to return them home as quickly as possible. People believed Bush could accomplish these things, but our strong leader was only a figment of our imagination. We believed that he was capable of accomplishing feats which we now know he was, and still is, inept at achieving.

In an article written by New York Times columnist Kitty Kelley on Oct. 10, 2005, Kelley brings up a very interesting, yet seemingly unknown, fact to the public. In Nov. 2001, Bush signed Executive Order 13233, which, according to Kelley, means, "a former president's private papers can be released only with the approval of both that former president (or his heirs) and the current one." Coincidentally, Bush issued this order just as the National Archives was preparing to release a small portion of the records of the Reagan administration, some of which might prove embarrassing to the president's father due to his involvement in the Iran-Contra Affair.

Basically, anything that Bush did not and still doesn't want to be public knowledge won't be. That leaves us in the dark once again, believing in a man that has to cover up his actions. This is not an example of someone we should trust to be the leader of our country.

Basically, anything that Bush did not and still doesn't want to be public knowledge won't be. That leaves us in the dark once again, believing in a man that has to cover up his actions. This is not an example of someone we should trust to be the leader of our country.

Of course, there are multiple plans of action to thwart this executive order, but if none of them succeed, Bush and Bush Sr. will have accomplished the task of letting their "administrations pass into history without examination." Anything that will make either of them look bad will be private; the people that voted for, and trusted Bush will not be receiving the information they should.

According to the column, "Their [George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush's] rationales for waging wars in the Middle East will go unchallenged. There will be no chance to weigh the arguments that led the administration to condone torture by our armed forces. The problems of federal agencies entrusted with public welfare during times of national disaster – Sept. 11 and Hurricane Katrina – will be unaddressed. Details on no-bid contracts awarded to politically connected corporations like Halliburton will escape scrutiny, as will the presidents' role in the Environmental Protection Agency's policies on water and air polluters."

Why would the president withhold all this information from us? If George W. Bush is going through this much trouble to conceal his actions in the White House, wouldn't you say that we would be stupid to believe in anything that he does? The blind faith that Americans have for Bush is scary. He is a man that has to cover up any trails that he leaves, for fear of the repercussions and backlash. It seems to be too convenient of an idea for Bush to be able to get off this easily.

Come on, people, are you going to put your trust in a man that is working so hard to keep his actions a secret? When are you going to realize that he is full of lies and deceit, and that he fooled you into re-electing him into office? The joke's on us – instead of a decent president making choices that will benefit America, all we get is an idea glorified by Bush, but never actually carried out. It's as if there really is nothing about Bush we can believe. He surrounds himself with smoke and mirrors and we are caught in the midst of the illusion.

The 'Dubya' papers

Gil Jenkins

The year 2008:

In a powerful move by the Democratic majority, a landmark bill is passed through Congress overturning former President Bush's Executive Order 13233. This order stipulated that all presidents' private papers could only be released by the approval of both the former and current presidents. Under the new bill, the power to release such papers is returned to the National Archives, which first had that power under the Presidential Records Act of 1978. The bill requires that the archives release all presidential papers not dealing with national security 12 years after said president leaves office.

The year 2020:

The first set of presidential papers is released from George Walker Bush's first and second terms. One such paper released from his second term is a transcripted oval office conversation between President Bush and Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, dated Oct. 2005. The contents of the conversation prove to be quite unsettling:

Bush: (To Rove) Come on in T.B. (Turd Blossom)

Rove: Yes sir, Mr. President. Thank you for meeting with me, Bush: Always a pleasure to meet with my "architect." Karl, I'm going to give it to you straight – I need you, partner. Times are tough. My legacy is in jeopardy. We need your best strategy here. This Iraq mess is really a pickle.

I don't know how to get out, and the bean counters are on me about the price tag. Plus, I just promised billions to help with the hurricanes. They're telling me there is no money if I want to keep up my tax cuts and spending.

Now one of my staffers tells me I'm being accused of cronyism across the board. There are all kinds of whining about gas prices, and I've got both Republican majority leaders of Congress under criminal investigation. Plus you and Scooter Libby might get indicted at the end of the month for revealing a CIA agent's secret identity. Then there's getting Harriet Miers on the Supreme Court. I'm scared, Karl.

Rove: Relax, Mr. President. I'm glad you called me in, because I have some great ideas. I have one word for you, sir: fear. Fear is the answer.

I've assured the right wing Christian leadership that Miers will overturn Roe v. Wade, though that assurance will never be made public.

Instill fear in the public again and they'll overlook everything. Remember what worked last year around this time, Mr. President, when it looked like you might lose to Kerry? Fear worked. Fear that we might get attacked by the evil-doers again, but we need to be more careful about covering our tracks this time and we need to up the ante a bit. People are getting a little cynical. Let's get our pal Michael Bloomberg from New York to announce a terrorist plot against the subways. We'll let it play out for awhile. Then we can deny we had approved the credibility of the threat later. We'll seem capable and responsible again; but more importantly, we'll have instilled fear and diverted attention from our shortcomings.

But just to make sure people are really afraid, I think we need to get the media to play up a pending flu pandemic. This time of year any mention of the word flu pandemic will get attention. How about avian bird flu? The threat has been known as discussed previously, but we'll tell people you read a book over your vacation that made you worry. You'll show leadership. People won't care that the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases says a bird flu pandemic is unlikely this year.

Bush: I like that. "Pandemic," that's worse than epidemic, right? (Snicker) Anyway, what about getting Miers through to the court?

Rove: That won't be too hard, sir. The wheels are already in motion. I've assured the right wing Christian leadership that Miers will overturn Roe v. Wade, though that assurance will never be made public.

Trust me, this is working. We're going to let the Democrats think there is a division amongst the parties, have a few Republican senators blast the nomination, which will make Democrats support her. It creates a wonderful illusion that this pick gives something to the Democrats and moderates; the fact that she's a woman and a lawyer whom Republicans oppose is all they see. They think she'll change to their side on social issues, but boy, are they wrong.

Bush: Oh Karl, I could kiss you, man – genius stuff. I want you to know something, man, if you get indicted, I got your back. I have some pardons I intend to use before I leave office. One is for you, and Scooter, Kenny-boy. Delay and Frist will each get one if they need it. Man, I love being the chief. I'm off for a bike ride – you want to come, Karl?

Rove: No thank you, Mr. President – I've got a 12 o'clock with Satan.

The awful journey of math

John Gruenenfelder

Math and I have had a long and bitter struggle throughout my college career. As a result, I can say with a fair amount of conviction that I don't particularly enjoy math. At the same time, though, I recognize its enormous importance. This might all be a moot point were it not for the fact that I am an astronomy and computer science major, hardly the sort who will get by without it.

I wasn't always so troubled by math. Back in grade school and right into high school I excelled at it. Basic math, sure. Geometry, great. Algebra, bring it on. Then trigonometry came along and ended that little ride. Of course, by now I've progressed well beyond that, but the trip was not what I would call fun.

In the end, though, I stuck with it. Astronomy and computer science interest me, so much so that I'm willing to take the steps necessary to learn even the decidedly un-fun aspects. Strangely enough, there are people who really do enjoy math. Fortunately we have universities to sequester these people and keep them off the streets where they might hurt others.

So math isn't fun, but what's the issue here? If it was just me I might attribute it to laziness, but it's an issue affecting students all across the country. Does the phrase "I hate math" ring true to anybody? The answer is probably "yes." That is the real problem. When a student dislikes a subject, that student is far more likely to do poorly than a student enthralled by the subject.

The problem, unfortunately, goes a bit deeper than I originally thought. In the office next to mine at my old school was Dr. McCarthy, an astronomy professor. He teaches many basic science classes to freshmen and it's quite a passion of his. One day he posted a letter on his door that he had written to the local paper's editor regarding math education. Its contents were more than a little startling, so of course I had to ask him about it.

He had found, much to his dismay, that the average math skills of college students were far below his expectations. Even some simple algebra and properties of fractions were confounding to some of the students. It wasn't that these students had made it to college without learning basic math, but rather that their skills had atrophied right to the point of forgetting.

I wasn't always so troubled by math. Back in grade school and right into high school I excelled at it. Basic math, sure. Geometry, great. Algebra, bring it on. Then trigonometry came along and ended that little ride.

The root (but not sole) cause of this troubling problem is that most students dislike math with a passion and proceed to give the minimum amount of effort when they learn it the first time. While this example is from the University of Arizona, I can say that the similarities between there and the University of Massachusetts are vast. This is not a localized phenomenon.

So what is to be done? My experience is certainly not extensive, but I believe there needs to be some major changes in how math is taught. Disinterested teachers do not seem to be the problem; those I've had always enjoyed the subject. Presumably the methodology is at fault. Some new way needs to be explored to make math "fun" for students, or at the very least, a way which eliminates the "I hate math" mentality.

Anecdotal evidence suggests that students in other countries do not all share this problem, so perhaps some good lessons may be taken from there. Not being a teacher, I'm afraid my ability to suggest changes is limited. I merely know that what I've experienced hasn't been a walk in the park.

The important idea here is to realize that it is a real problem and that having students hate math will only cause major troubles. Pundits and politicians often discuss how America is falling behind in science education. This is a symptom of the larger math problem. The majority of the sciences are built firmly atop all manners of mathematics. Science is math and many students will avoid science to avoid math. This is not a conscious decision that a freshman might make when deciding on a major, but rather a mindset that will slowly build throughout his or her years of schooling.

I do wish math was more entertaining. Too often math texts feel like my own personal version of kryptonite, but, in the end, I'll stick with it. The subjects that lie atop the mathematical foundations are what I am truly interested in. And what of those students who will continue to avoid math? They'll go into business school or become lawyers, and I'm sure we can all agree that this is a future we must work to prevent.

What do you think of the proposed pedestrian safety plan?

A) Any help is good. Walking across North Pleasant St. is a death trap.
B) It's unnecessary to get the UMPD involved
C) Just look both ways and you'll be OK. It's not that hard.
D) Bump outs are fun when I'm stumbling home on a Friday night.

PEDESTRIANS HAVE THE RIGHT OF WAY

I agree with the majority of the staff at the Collegian about the policies regarding what can be done about traffic safety at UMass. The fine of $200 dollars is excessive, and should not exceed the state's appointed $150 fine. The money being spent by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration could be spent in other ways. I would suggest, given the immediate problem, affecting the Amherst College solution of raised pedestrian crossways and nifty blinking signs. In addition to these points, the Collegian staff appropriately sites bump-outs as dangerous and unnecessary. However, I do think that an immediate solution is required, and there are two ways of dealing with it.

One way requires no university regulation, but it does require some work on the part of motorists. Welcome to Massachusetts, for those of you who are from out-of-state. As you may or may not know, states in this country do have different driving laws, two of which you may find interesting here. One, you do not have to submit to a breathalyzer test, and two, you must always yield to pedestrians who are walking in a cross-walk or crossing a roadway. So, foreigners to Massachusetts and natives alike pick up your driver's manuals and reread. Find some common sense, know the laws and respect the people walking in the roads. If you don't, you could wind up paying $100.

The second way, which I think I may prefer, would be to ban all non-official university traffic from the roads running through UMass. I understand this would create a whole bunch of logistic problems for the surrounding area, but it remains a considerable scenario. Only faculty, staff and public transportation would be allowed in the throughways. The problem of so many vehicles clashing with pedestrians is solved, and people will get more exercise, too. Restricting cars to the outer parking lots and roadways is certainly radical, but I would feel safer crossing Massachusetts Avenue without worrying about being hit by some jerk speeding (the limit is 30 mph by the way) down the road.

What it comes down to is people using common sense. Don't be jerks. Be respectful of people walking in the road. Learn the laws of the state you're temporarily living in. You may learn things that can protect you and help you out when you find yourself in trouble. Just remember that in Massachusetts, pedestrians always have the right of way. We're all here to learn and look out for each other, and if we can't accomplish a micro-setting such as the university, how do we expect to leave here practicing such socially responsible values?

Collegian Staff

This Friday on the eve of Homecoming Weekend, the University of Massachusetts Department of Music & Dance faculty together with students, staff and colleagues will be hosting the 31st annual "Multiband Pops" concert at the Fine Arts Center to benefit relief efforts for the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

This event will feature over 400 students with ensemble directors. The concert will present a fast-paced combination of dance, jazz, percussion and wind music.

Award-winning jazz groups performing at the event will include Jazz Ensemble I and the Chapel Jazz Ensemble directed by Professors Jeffery Holmes and David Sporny, respectively. Jazz Ensemble I is a big band that has gained national and international recognition, including top honors at major collegiate jazz festivals. The Chapel Jazz Ensemble is also a big band known for experimental compositions in pop and rock styles with annual on-campus concerts and regional tours.

Also performing will be the Vocal Jazz Ensemble with director Catherine Jensen-Hole. This group of talented vocalists emphasizes jazz, blues and soul styles.

Students from the dance program will be performing choreography by Professor Billbob Brown. Brown has choreographed and performed in television commercials for the Chicago Cubs, Molson Canadian Beer, Disney and ABC. He has also taught and performed in Japan, England, Switzerland, Mexico and the United States.

My Chemical Romance and friends make everything OK

By Bethany Sherwood
Collegian Correspondent

Tired of the local music scene? Maybe, my friend, it's time for you to range a little farther afield to fulfill your musical appetite. This Saturday, Oct. 15, the Tsongas Arena in Lowell will be presenting a House of Blues production —headlined by My Chemical Romance, MTV's latest dark darlings. Supported throughout this tour by friends Reggie and the Full Effect and Alkaline Trio. My Chemical Romance is touring in promotion of their latest album, "Three Cheers for Sweet Revenge." You've heard of them, believe me.

My Chemical Romance
Tsongs Arena
Sat., Oct. 15
7:30 p.m.
$19.99 at door

If you've missed their videos for "Helena," "I'm Not Okay," and "The Ghost of You," then that would be quite a surprise.

Even though MCR is a relative newcomer, with only two albums released, they've already proven that they're one of the few listenable bands being glorified by MTV – no average feat when most pop singers sound like over-produced copies of one mediocre performer. If you were lucky, you may have seen them perform as openers to Green Day's phenomenal concert at the Mullins Center last spring. Alkaline Trio, Reggie and The Full Effect are old tour buddies who have released solid albums after solid album, and their latest work doesn't let old fans down while bringing new fans in. MCR and Alkaline Trio's sense of anger and betrayal is skillfully lightened by Reggie's breathless, self-deprecating humor and manic stage antics. Saturday night is going to be the best way to relive the highs and lows of teenage life without having to deal with puberty again.

This show isn't just about exploring what else is out there — it's about helping out bands that still have to write awesome songs and tour relentlessly to survive. I can promise you that not one of these bands will try to sell you perfume with their faces on it, and you won't see them in STAR magazine next to speculations about the latest celebrity fiasco. Music, my friends, is about sensations and feelings, and while you may not like songs that favor dark imagery over slick, monotonous hooks, you've still got to appreciate the fierce energy that these bands expend every night on stage. Remember those sports commercials, where they're asking if the game is played for love or money? For these bands, it's love – and life. They're still having fun and they're proving, night after night, that they don't need backup dancers for support – just for a nice touch. MCR's "Helena" video proved that emphatically.

There is too much simulated sex and glorification of music. Music should tell a story that relates to life, that resonates with an individual's own experiences. Everyone's been dumped, everyone's been jealous, but not everyone lives in a mansion and most happy endings can't be ensured with a fairy-tale wedding. These bands represent hard work, talent and amazing musical ability.

They're role models for the disaffected, because while they sing about despair, their own stories communicate a more realistic kind of hope. These bands are the ones that deserve support – when you pay to see their shows, you're guaranteed to get what you paid for, not a copy of a copy.

If you like your angst worn on your (ubiquitous black) sleeve and your humor keyboard-driven, then come to the Tsongas Arena in Lowell this Saturday.

Nintendo's Fusion Tour suffered identity crisis in Lowell

The Gameroom
Carlos H. Cruz

The Fusion Tour put on by Nintendo is a very lame excuse to parade kiddy-pop punk bands around the country in order to get said bands more recognition. The fusion part of the title implies that two or more elements will be combined to present the ultimate rock experience possible. The elements being fused in this case are the already mentioned "punk" bands with upcoming Nintendo products. The bands include "Panic at the Disco," "Motion City Soundtrack," "The Starting Line," "Fallout Boy" and "Boys Night Out."

Something Nintendo doesn't seem to realize is that most college kids aren't big fans of any of the bands in the show. There is one reason why this is so. The first reason is that college students are not sophomores in high school (duh). This is the demographic that these bands are marketed towards and gosh darnit, the marketing gurus that dish out this commercial punk sure are doing a great job at reaching 15 to 16-year-old kids.

At the Tsongas Arena in Lowell, Mass., (where the event was held) a college student would feel like Gulliver wandering among the Lilliputians. The arena was packed wall to wall with tons of high school kids ranging from your typical 13-year-old girl in clothes that remind one of the kinds of ladies you see in the not-so-admirable parts of town to the "misunderstood" semi-goth kids decked out in the latest fashions from "Hot Topic." For these kids, that must have been the greatest concert they have ever been to. But for a university-level person, the concert was nothing more than a very loud and crowded obstacle course, complicating the journey to the actual reason for being there.

A scene that really did a marvelous job of summing up the ambiance: In the eerie silence of the outer causeway, behind a very large cement pillar, tucked into the corner where the pillar met the wall of the inner arena, there sat a lone middle-aged woman in a fold-out chair reading a very thick book. Does this need to be spelled out? In short, that woman really loves her kids.

Commenting on the music – it was nothing great, and at the same time, nothing horrible. The content was your typical high-pitched complaining done by a guy that looks very gender-confused (although something tells me that's the whole point). There was no substance in the lyrics of any of the bands, but again it doesn't seem like they were aiming for deep philosophical meanings in the verses. This whole emptiness was cemented when the front man for one of the bands (I can't really remember which one it was because all these bands were the same group with different names) mentioned their cameo in a recent episode of "The OC."

Enough babbling about the lame part of the event. There was much good there that rainy night. The good was found in a small, secluded section of the upper level where the Nintendo portion of the show was stationed. In this relatively small area were many kiosks with Gamecubes and Nintendo DS systems showcasing the latest and greatest that Nintendo had to offer. They had everything form the gorgeous "Resident Evil 4" to the eagerly anticipated demos for "Mario Kart DS" and "Metroid Prime Hunters." But there was one game being demoed there that far outshined the others: a playable demo of "The Legend of Zelda: Twilight Princess." Yes, you heard correctly. The game has been delayed to the spring of next year but the Nintendo Fusion Tour is offering you a chance to get your hands on it very early.

"Twilight Princess" is truly the game Zelda fans have been waiting for since the Nintendo 64's "The Legend of Zelda: The Ocarina of Time." The game is beautiful, the controls are what one has come to expect from a Zelda title and the scope of the story is epic. As most fans already know, gone are the more animated visuals of "The Legend of Zelda: The Wind Waker" (which were gorgeous in their own right). Now the game is going for the realistic look that fans have been waiting for. The scale of the game seems gigantic, though not much wandering was available in the demo.

You get a feel for what the game is going for in a boss battle that is playable in the demo. Link (the hero, i.e. you) is chasing an ugly monster that has kidnapped a fellow villager. The monster is riding a pretty mean looking boar-like creature and is surrounded by other smaller monster-riding-similar creatures. Link is riding his faithful horse as he chases this monster across a very large open field while fending off the monster's goons. The battle has two parts in which the second consists of a really tense joust between link and the monster on top of a lowered drawbridge in which you must control your steed while pressing certain buttons in order to knock your enemy off the bridge.

"The Legend of Zelda: Twilight Princess" was demoed at the Nintendo Fusion Tour at Tsongas Arena. The game's release was pushed back to spring, so fans were ecstatic to see and play the game.

If this demo is any indication of how the game is going, we can safely say that it is a good thing Nintendo is taking their time with this title. The Game Room hopes to bring you a full review when the game is released this spring.

All in all, the concert isn't a place for college students. The focus was mainly on the bands despite the fact that the name of the show suggests equal exposure for both games and music. At the game kiosks one feels more at ease with people one's own age that are chaperoning their brothers or sisters. I hate to say it, but if Nintendo wants to showcase their product they should take a cue from Microsoft, which tours college campuses with large set ups geared towards the gamer and doesn't over-shadow it with lousy music. A lot of people might miss out on the chance to play the new Zelda game just because the names on the marquee turned them off

Moreno's 'Dracula Vs. King Arthur' big hit

By Mackenzie Issler
Collegian Staff

Wizard World Boston offered comic fans with everything expected: comics, t-shirts, figurines, posters, new video games and sketches. No one walked out empty-handed. The convention was also an amazing opportunity for artists to show their stuff. "Artist Alley" displayed rows and rows of artists, all busy showcasing their works of art.

The group of artists consisted of big names in the industry, such as David Mack and Joe Quesada, as well as those aspiring to make it into the comic book industry.

David Mack, the creator and artist of "Kabuki," stood at his table with a smile on face, ready to talk and interact with his fans. Mack's table was packed full of his graphic novels, sketches, t-shirts and replica Noh masks. "Kabuki: Circle of Blood," the first collection of Kabuki, was one of his graphic novels displayed at the show. It was done as his senior writing thesis in college. Mack's appearance at Wizard World Boston marked his first visit to Boston, along with the festival's.

Chris Moreno is a rising star in the comic book industry. His current project, "Dracula vs. King Arthur," hit shelves this year. Moreno illustrated the comic in collaboration with his co-writers, Christian and Adam Beranek. Comic book publisher Silent Devil Productions released Moreno and Beranek's full color mini series.

Moreno was introduced to comics by his father. It was not an unusual sight to see Moreno's father sitting at their kitchen table drawing pictures of Spiderman and Thor when Moreno was a kid. It was at a very young age that he developed an affinity for comics.

As a child, Moreno was a big fan of cartoons. "I wanted to be Bugs Bunny, so I'd have my mom give me whole carrots and I'd run around the house making wisecracks," he said.

Moreno was a self-taught artist until his sophomore year in high school. It was at that time that he was brought under the wing of Tommy Castillo. For the next eight years, Castillo apprenticed him.

Moreno received his first job in comics because of his connection with Castillo. Castillo introduced him to writer Tony DiGerlamo, who gave Moreno his first work on his comic book "The Travelers." He did a 12-issue, bi-monthly run on that book. Eventually, "The Travelers" was cancelled and Moreno worked in the gaming industry. Then, he met Christian Beranek and the opportunity to illustrate "Dracula vs. King Arthur" was presented to him.

Moreno is also the co-creator of the comic series "Monkey in a Wagon vs. Lemur on a Big Wheel" with writer Ken Lillie-Paetz. "It's exactly what the title proclaims, the ultimate battle for primate supremacy!" he said.

Moreno felt that the convention was a success. "I love conventions. It's a great way to get your work out to fans one-on-one. It's the personal connection that's such a long-lasting part of the business, and I'm definitely into making fans for life," said Moreno.

As well as connecting with fans, conventions are an opportunity for artists to get feedback on their works.

"It's also a great barometer for how well your project is going to do, based on the reactions you get from people, many of whom are seeing your work for the first time. I am proud to be part of something that so many folks feel passionate about, and coming to shows is a way of saying 'thank you' to them," he said.

Comics are not just for nerds. The combination of text and pictures are seen everyday.

"I think people should realize that the language of comics is something they participate in everyday – from the instructions on a box of Pop-Tarts to the sign that tells you which bathroom is the Ladies Room. Most of us take for granted that the marriage between images and words is something we can all appreciate," Moreno said.

Captivating quintet performs at UMass

By Michael Hardman
Collegian Correspondent

Well-known for its adventurous and virtuosic performances for many years throughout New England, the Avanti Wind Quintet will open the mind once again with a concert of music from three continents on Tuesday, Oct. 18. The concert will take place in the Bezanson Recital Hall on the University of Massachusetts, Amherst campus at 8 p.m. The quintet consists of faculty members from UMass' Department of Music and Dance with Christopher Krueger on the flute, Fredric Cohen on the oboe, Michael Sussman on the clarinet, Laura Knock on the bassoon and Stephen Walt on the bassoon.

The program will feature the "Woodwind Quintet" by Chinese composer Chen Yi and came to the United States in 1986. She is currently a professor at the University of Missouri, Kansas City.

"The creative inspiration for my 'Woodwind Quintet' came from the booming tide of the Chaoyin Cave in the Putuo Mountain located in southeastern China, the dull chanting from the Buddist nunnery, the reciting tunes played by Xiao, a Chinese traditional woodwind instrument and the rude, primitive roaring by Changjian, a Tibetan low-range wind instrument," said Yi.

This piece was designed for traditional western instruments flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon to create an eastern sound by bending notes in different ways.

"She asks us to do things with our instruments that are unusual," explained Laura Knock.

"The piece is fascinating, because in effect what we are doing is imitating ancient folk instruments from Tibet and China, with very loud shrill notes over low, booming notes," adds Stephen Walt. "It may seem like Tibetan nuns chanting. They are not chanting together, each nun is chanting a different prayer, but it comes together beautifully."

This particular piece will sound extremely different and almost controversial to our western ears and is expected to be captivating.

For their next piece, the Avanti will be joined by guest pianist Susan Nowicki. The piece, entitled "Sextet in Bb Major, Op. 6," was composed by Austrian Romantic composer and pianist Ludwig Thuille, who is known for his chamber works and operas. Thuille's "Sextet" was an immediate success when it was composed in 1891, with its lyricism and well-balanced instrumentation.

North America will be represented by Quebecois composer Jacques Hetu's "Quintette, Op. 13." Hetu wrote that the work "intends to be a divertimento based on a play of timbres. Its four movements follow the traditional structures: sonata-form, scherzo, lied and rondo."

The final work of the program not only intends to be a divertimento, but in fact is one "Divertimento for Flute, Oboe and Clarinet" was composed by the versatile and prolific English trumpeter-turned-composer Malcolm Arnold.

"'Divertimento' is a very lush, melodic work. This type of work is intended as a light piece of music to entertain," Knock said. After the intense performance of Chen Yi's work this seems the perfect ending to what is sure to be a fascinating night of music.

Tickets for the concert are $5 for students, seniors and children under 18. $10 for the general public. Tickets may be purchased at the Fine Arts Box Office, (413) 545-2511, or at the door of Bezanson Recital Hall after 7:30 p.m. on Oct. 18.

UM looks to make playoff run

ers who reaped the benefits while playing with Anderson are Werner and junior Garrett Summerfield, who were often on the same line together before the injury disrupted that.

Werner finished last season as the team leader with 14 goals and 27 points, and his 13 assists had him tied for second. Summerfield faced some injury problems of his own last year, as he only saw action in 20 games, but he is expected to contribute regularly now that he is a junior.

Another junior the coaching staff believes will have somewhat of a breakout campaign is Kevin Jarman who, at 6 feet 1 inch and a shade under 200 pounds, can bang around with any forward in Hockey East. He got hot at the end of last season, scoring at least one point in five of UMass' final six games, and he closed out the year with seven goals and a team-high 14 assists.

It should be interesting to watch the maturation process of the two most productive freshmen from a year ago, P.J. Fenton and Matt Burto. The two share tremendous chemistry when they are on the ice together and should continue to play on the same line again.

"I think those guys will look to improve on last year," Werner said. "P.J. had a lot of success last year in terms of scoring, and I think Burto is definitely going to score a lot this year. The two of them are playing together, and they play really well. The maturity and experience of that [first] year will help them a lot."

Fenton lit the lamp 13 times in 2004-05 and dished out 12 assists while Burto showed a few great flashes, picking up seven goals and six helpers.

Of the 11 freshmen making their UMass debuts this year, seven of them are forwards and three of them should be able to contribute right away while the lone continue to learn the college game a little better.

Alex Berry, who picked up a goal in UMass 5-2 exhibition victory over St. Francis Xavier on Saturday, is much more agile than his 6-foot 2-inch, 212-pound frame suggests he should be. Berry is a natural scorer, and his accurate shot will land him on the scoring sheets early.

Cory Quirk benefited by playing a season for the Waterloo Blackhawks of the USHL, where he was named Rookie of the Year after notching 14 goals and 26 assists.

"Cory Quirk is kind of an energy player," Cahoon said. "He is a sparkplug type of player who is good away from the puck and can get on loose pucks. He seems to be pretty consistent with his play. He is going to be able to help out, in some degree, right away."

Cahoon is also excited about Chris Davis, who already has the speed and physical makeup to fit into the system right away, and he is confident that Kevin Maresco, who is a pure center and very cerebral player, will come along a few months from now.

DEFENSE

It's no secret that Degon is the anchor of this young defense, as he can hurt the opposition on both ends of the ice. He was third on the team with 10 goals last season, and he also contributed eight assists. An integral part of UMass' special teams, Degon should have a monster senior year.

"Marvin is the most important piece to our defensive corps in that he is the most dynamic," Cahoon said. "He shoots it the best. He skates the best. He is clearly an all-star player for sure. He is a little bit of a risk-taker. He is always looking to take a chance. I wouldn't trade Marvin for anyone."

One blueliner everyone is looking at to make a big jump is junior Mark Matheson, who must take over Dusty Demianiuk's spot on the top line with Degon.

"[Matheson] has really good offensive instincts, and his strength and conditioning are finally where they need to be for this level," Cahoon said. "I really think that Mark is the one player back there who can make the most major jump, and I think you'll see it on special teams, in his ability to carry the puck and set up offensive plays."

"He has been kind of in the shadows the last couple years," Degon said. "He hasn't really had the chance to step up, and I think this year he is going to prove he is in the upper-echelon of defensemen in the league."

All eyes will also be on sophomores David Leaderer and Mike Kostka, who are the last two returning players on the blue line for the Minutemen. How they develop in their second seasons will be crucial to the defense as a whole this year, and Cahoon is looking for them to just be steady and dependable players who don't need to worry about scoring goals.

Four new players have been added to the roster in this area, too. Three freshmen – Topher Bevis, John Wessbecker and Jesse Downey – and Bentley transfer Patrick Dineen will vie for the two remaining roster spots each night.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Kevin Jarman was third on the team in scoring in 2004-05 for the UMass hockey team. Jarman and the rest of the Minutemen will begin their season tonight against St. Lawrence.

Bevis is the most ready of the group. Wessbecker is considered the most physical and Downey has the most offensive skills, though he probably won't step in and make an impact right away the way Bevis and Wessbecker should.

GOALIES

No different from in the last three years, this is Gabe Winer's job once again. The senior netminder has started 92 of a possible 112 games in three seasons. That counts for 92 more starts than the other two goalies – sophomore Jamie Gilbert and freshman Jon Quick – on the roster combined.

Winer has entered camp in the best shape of his career, and he had a strong showing in the exhibition, making seven saves without allowing a goal in just over 28 minutes of work. Winer struggled to just a 10-16-2 record last season, but he only allowed 3.09 goals per game while boasting an .889 save percentage.

Quick enters the program as one of the most highly touted freshman goaltenders in the entire country. Before even wearing the UMass sweater, he became the school's highest drafted hockey player ever when he was selected by the Los Angeles Kings in the third round (72nd overall) in this year's NHL draft.

Quick went a combined 52-3 as a starter during his last two years at Avon Old Farms, and he finished his high school career with 17 shutouts, a 1.70 goals against average and .935 save percentage.

"He is going to be pushed to measure up [to Winer]," Cahoon said. "He has extraordinary quickness. He has the big body. He is extremely athletic and he has the makeup of being a great goaltender. He has youth on his side, so there is a lot of room to grow."

Gilbert's evolvement over this year is every bit as important as anything else. He isn't expected to see a tremendous amount of playing time this season with the arrival of Quick, but the coaching staff wants him ready to be able to compliment Quick next year after Winer graduates.

"A year from now, Gilbert becomes a critical piece with two years under his belt and Quick just starting to emerge as a top-end goaltender," Cahoon said. "We need Jamie Gilbert to be able to contribute and be depended on. I see moderate improvement, but we need him to really take his development seriously so we can have the insurance."

Note: UMass opens up its regular season schedule this weekend, traveling to St. Lawrence tonight and Clarkson tomorrow.

New faces for UMass hockey

is true up front; we've got a couple of freshman that will get a couple of more minutes because we'll need to fill some voids."

Some of the rookies have already embraced the complimentary roles in which they've been assigned. Bevis and Quick know that when coach calls on them to fill those voids they need to be ready.

"[Looking to] playing solid defense and chipping in on offense when I can," Bevis said.

As highly touted as he is, Quick also knows he needs to take advantage of the opportunities that are given to him.

"When coach tosses me in the net [I need] to be there and play good," Quick said. "Whenever I'm in the net I'm just looking to give the team a chance to win."

It's well known that hockey at the Division I college level, especially in the Hockey East, is a lot different than any high school or prep school level. The game itself is faster and the players are bigger, stronger and more experienced.

Bevis and Quick each had different views as to how hard adjusting to Division I hockey has been.

"It hasn't been too bad. I've played at a high level before," Bevis said of his days with the Boston Junior Bruins. "It hasn't been too much of an adjustment."

Quick had a differing opinion.

"The skill level is definitely a lot different," he said. "The players are a lot stronger and bigger and they shoot harder. There's an adjustment period, of course, and it takes time."

Hockey isn't the only thing these players have to adjust to. As with any incoming freshmen, college life is something completely different than what they are used to. Managing their time and getting schoolwork done is something a lot of freshmen struggle with. It is especially difficult for student-athletes.

Not only do student-athletes have to juggle essays, reading and exams, but they also have other obligations such as practices and games. Time management is key for a lot of athletes.

These players aren't alone, however. There are many places students can turn for assistance. They have their captains and older players to look up to, their coaching staff and the university itself has a number of programs to help out student-athletes.

Each one of the captains says they've been helping the freshmen with their adjustments.

"Away from hockey, making sure that they're all set with school and that they're comfortable," Degon said. "And after that, once hockey starts it will be a lot easier for them."

Werner also says he has tried to look at himself as a mentor for the rookies and try to pass along some knowledge to them.

"There's so many of them and it kind of makes it easier because there's more guys who you have to look up to you, so I just try to tell them some of the things I've learned over the years, whether its about school or hockey," Werner said.

Bevis and Quick commented on how helpful the captains and the rest of the upperclassmen have been.

"We have good leadership on the team with the juniors and seniors and great captains. They're hard on you but at the same time they're your friend[s]," Bevis said.

"They've been helping out a lot with little things, like if you don't know where your classroom is or where to get books," Quick said. "They help you manage your time a lot better, like tell you that you should be here at this time."

UMass itself has programs such as an academic resource center where freshman student-athletes are required to attend study hall sessions. There is also the Student-Athlete Advisory Committee.

SAAC consists of student-athletes representing each varsity sport. Their mission is to promote UMass student-athletes and teach them leadership skills.

"There are many influences on these young kids that if they take advantage of the resources, they can really help them keep on track for success," Cahoon said. "When you've done it for as long as the coaches have done it you're kind of prepared for what [the freshmen] are going to encounter and try and be there as a safe guard so that if they start to fall off the ledge a little bit, you've got that hand-out to keep them from taking the big fall."

Soccer has tough road

17 points, good enough for fourth in the A-10, with Winchell scoring seven and assisting on three and Hughes scoring six and assisting five. Kelly Ferguson and Courtney Huleer, a second team All-America last season, are next with 15 apiece (Ferguson 7-1-15, Huleer 2-11-15).

None of these four aside from Ferguson (5 feet 8 inches) is incredibly tall, but as their statistics prove, they are truly big game players.

Players, of course, that are behind a goalie that is playing just as big, if not bigger.

Senior keeper Amanda Martin was an All-Conference USA selection last season after posing a conference-leading 0.20 goals against average, and although she has been sharing time with freshman standout Abby Goellner in net this year, she still carries the shut-down ability. Martin is second in the A-10 with a 0.97 GAA.

Behind her in that statistic? UMass's keeper Kristin Walker, who is third in GAA with 1.05, third in saves with 84 and leads the conference in shutouts with five. It will surely be an interesting matchup between these tale-of-the-tape keepers – how interesting Saint Louis makes it will be the main event.

Last weekend, the Minutewomen made some adjustments on defense to counter Rhode Island's scoring attack, and the result, coupled with bad weather, threw a wrench into URI's offensive spark in spite of a loss. Is another change on the horizon this week?

"We're going to tweak it a little, and we have to be ready to improvise," Rudy said.

they don't walk on water. They're beatable but we're going to have to play our best to do it."

The Dukes are equally dangerous with an 8-2 overall record and going a perfect 2-for-2 in conference play this season. Duquesne, in a recent Top 25 poll by the National Soccer Coaches Association of America, was placed 16 in the nation for Division I soccer. It is riding a three-game winning streak after winning its first two conference games last weekend.

"[Duquesne is] a good team – very well organized, they're coached well," Koch said. "They will play for 90 minutes. They will put us under pressure and they will make it very difficult for us to play.

"I think Rhode Island has some better individual players but [Duquesne plays] so well as a team," he continued. "They have two very good midfielders, a good front runner and the goalkeeper is very good. It's not a surprise [Duquesne is] tied for first."

The Minutemen are staring at a three-game losing streak if something magical doesn't happen this weekend. They have two chances to defy the odds, but just one win against the powerhouses will restore some needed swagger to the UMass squad.

A brand new 'face'off

Minutemen open the season with new faces on its roster

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The youth movement started last year, but it has hit full stride in Amherst this season. The Massachusetts hockey team has a 28-man roster, which is currently comprised of 11 freshmen and seven sophomores.

Obviously, with youth comes inexperience, but in the case of the Minutemen, youth is coming with tons of talent and high expectations as they try getting back to the level they were at a couple years ago.

The purpose of coach Don Cahoon's recruiting trips over the past year were to accomplish one main goal: build a foundation for the future by bringing in players who fill certain roles. He brought in speed players, scorers, smart athletes and physical presences.

The philosophy, at the beginning of the season, anyway, is to let the veterans carry the team while the young guns acclimate themselves to the new game, and if the rookies can start contributing by the turn of the new year, UMass has a legitimate shot at making another run for the Hockey East Championship at the TD Banknorth Garden in March.

And in a league that saw most of its big names either graduate – like Sean Collins, Preston Callander, Jason Guerriero and Keni Gibson – or bolt early for the National Hockey League – such as Jimmy Howard, Ben Walter and Patrick Eaves – the talented Minutemen are expecting to have the right amount of depth to make a postseason run.

"I think we can do really well in the league," senior captain Stephen Werner said. "It's going to be competitive this year. There is no hands-down favorite – maybe UNH right now – but it's going to be really competitive. It depends on how the younger guys respond to the strength of our schedule, but my goal is to make the NCAA Tournament this year, and I think we are capable of doing that."

"I think the ceiling for us can be put pretty high," senior captain Marvin Degon agreed. "I think there are going to be a lot of expectations. I don't think other teams around the league really know what to expect from us, but I know within the locker room, we all think that we can really compete this year."

With all of the young blood on the roster, it's been up to the veterans like Werner, Degon and the other captain, junior Matt Anderson, to keep things running smoothly on the ice but also in the locker room.

"That is something we are really trying hard to have on our team, is the older guys mixing well with the younger guys," Werner said. "Sometimes on teams, the older players are isolated from the younger players, and we don't want that to happen. We all get along, and we all have a good time together."

Without further ado, here is a positional breakdown of the 2005-06 Massachusetts Minutemen.

FORWARDS

The biggest storyline in regards to the forwards this season is, once again, the return of Matt Anderson to the lineup following a season-ending injury. Anderson broke his right ankle on Dec. 9 last year while getting hit along the boards during a 4-0 loss at New Hampshire.

At the time, he was the team's leading scorer, registering seven goals and 13 assists during UMass' first 18 games.

His goal-scoring ability was sorely missed, and the Minutemen struggled to a 5-13-1 record after his injury. Anderson is one of those special players who makes everyone around him better, and his presence in the lineup over the course of a full season will account for five wins alone.

"Matt distributes the puck, opens the ice up, brings [defensemen] to him and then he has good timing and good feel on when to give [the puck] up," Cahoon said. "We're a more productive team when he is in the lineup."

Among the returning play-

The Massachusetts hockey team is getting a lot younger before it's getting any older.

UMass will have 11 freshmen on the roster for the 2005-2006 season. That number constitutes nearly 40 percent of the Minutemen's entire program. The breakdown goes as follows: seven forwards, three defensemen and one goaltender.

Minuteman coach Don Cahoon commented on the unusually high number of rookies on his team.

"That's an odd number," Cahoon said of his newcomers.

"There [are] 28 players in the program and 12 [11 freshman, one transfer] are new. That's a big chunk of your team."

This past off-season Cahoon said he was looking for specific qualities in the players he was recruiting. He needed players to buy into his system and help the team improve upon its 13-23-2 mark of a year ago.

"I think each and every year you try to enhance the chemistry of the team. Get kids that really represent what we want represented in our program," he said. "How well former players did allowed us to go out and maybe improve the quality of student athletes given the same type of personality."

These 11 freshmen are no slouches by any stretch of the imagination. A number of them are very talented and eager to contribute much to the Minutemen's season.

The list includes players like defensemen Topher Bevis and forwards Chris Davis and Alex Berry, who scored two goals in the UMass exhibition win over St. Francis Xavier on Oct. 8. The class of 2009 is headlined by goalie Jon Quick.

Quick was selected in the 3rd round (72nd overall) of the NHL Entry Draft by the Los Angeles Kings, but chose to come to school instead. He stands as the highest UMass player to ever be drafted.

When asked to describe his class of 2009, Cahoon said "[They have] a lot of different dimensions. They're going to be a nucleus class for the next three or four years."

Despite the talent in this group, Cahoon is not looking for any of his young players to take the team on their back and carry it.

"All I ask the freshmen to do is to compliment the core leadership of the team," Cahoon said. "The majority of the freshman will be asked to fill roles, to grow, to learn and to understand what it takes to compete at this level. If we can get good complimentary efforts out of the younger kids then we'll have a very competitive team and a team that could be in the fray."

The core leadership of this team that Cahoon was talking about is very talented. Many roles have already been taken by older, more experienced players like senior captains Matt Anderson and Stephen Werner at the forward position. Senior captain Marvin Degon and junior Mark Matheson anchor the defense. Finally, the net will belong to senior Gabe Winer as it has been for the past three years.

"From the goal out we've got a capable young goaltender but we've got a senior who's experienced and prepared maybe to have his best year. So we'll need Jon Quick to compliment Gabe Winer and I'm sure he'll do a nice job of that," Cahoon commented. "We have three freshman defensemen and maybe one or two of those guys could be asked to play more minutes than maybe we would really want them to play. The same

Two on tap for UMass soccer

By Rob Greenfield

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch is keeping things light. His team suffered a shocking defeat to the Rhode Island Rams last Sunday in a game that, in at least some of the players' minds, was already won. It was the first of the conference games and for a team that was two games below the .500 mark already, it was a game that, if won, could have propelled UMass (4-7-0 0-1-0 Atlantic 10) down a more merciful path.

But instead, the URI loss has cornered the Minutemen in a situation that few would envy.

UMass had three days to practice before they departed this morning for Pittsburgh to face the mighty Duquesne Dukes (8-2-0 2-0-0 A-10). Under a lifeless gray sky and a piercing rain, Koch concluded practice on Wednesday and offered a steady dose of optimism and humor.

First, he shed some of his pent-up anguish for the Duquesne soccer fans.

"A lot of the fans in the stands don't appreciate my mother," he joked. "And they let me know that. I doubt that they ever met my mother. It's disrespectful."

Then it was on to more serious matters, like the morale of the men's team, which took a severe psychological blow with the Rhode Island loss. But Koch maintains that the recovery is underway and the team is looking ahead to the Dukes tomorrow.

"Under the circumstances, [practice has been] very good," he said. "I'm very pleased. The effort yesterday morning was very good. And the effort today, in this weather, was very good. We're still making the mistakes we're going to be making. We're working on it. I think, going into Duquesne, that the guys have a good game plan and we're ready to do it."

Though it is early in A-10 play, and the one loss to the Rams – despite its rip-your-heart-out quality – won't deter the players much; the Minutemen now find themselves facing two goliaths of A-10 soccer this weekend: the Dukes and the Saint Louis Billikens (5-4-1 2-0-0 A-10).

The Billikens are a new addition to the conference this season, and are a sore sight for the rest of the league. Saint Louis carries a successful resume, winning the Conference USA title eight out of the last 10 years before making the switch to the A-10.

It has many star players including a junior midfielder (John DiRaimondo) in the Top 25 players on the 2005 Missouri Athletic Club Herman Trophy Watch list. Translation: he's one of the best players in the nation and is up for the prestigious national Player of the Year Award.

DiRaimondo also won the A-10 Player of the Week honors after he posted back-to-back two-goal games last week – against Saint Joseph's he scored two goals and had three assists, good for seven points in the 8-0 route of the Hawks. The Billikens also had the Rookie of the Week in the A-10, Larry Geraghty, who posted a hat-trick against the Hawks in the same game.

This will be the first-ever meeting between the Minutemen and the Billikens ("With a name like Billikens I think you'd remember if you played them," Koch said, poking fun at the newcomers) and it will be in Saint Louis, a renowned haven for soccer in the United States.

Koch concedes that the Billikens are a force to be reckoned with, but he knows that there is still a game to be played.

"[Saint Louis] probably has two of the better players in the country," he stated. "They definitely have some of the premier players – having said that, they have to play together as a group. They're not undefeated. They've been beaten so they're not perfect.

"And I think that that's going to be the toughest part for our guys to understand," he added. "For the first 15 or 20 minutes they have to realize that

Difficult road for Minutewomen

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Let it be known that from herein, the road for the Massachusetts women's soccer team does not get any easier. It only gets steeper, bumpier – harder.

There is no rest for the weary following the Minutewomen's (5-6-1 2-1-0 A-10) 2-1 loss at Rhode Island last weekend, as they head back for their final two home games of the 2005 season against two of the Atlantic 10's finest; Duquesne on Friday, and Saint Louis on Sunday.

"Whatever points we get [this weekend] will be valuable," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We have one of the harder A-10 finishes. With three weeks remaining, there [are] already a few teams [in the conference] that have no chance [of making the A-10 tournament]."

Again, two of the A-10's finest are in town.

The Duquesne Dukes (9-2-1 4-1-0 A-10) are currently on a four-game winning streak, having not lost since dropping a 1-0 decision to St. Francis (Pa.) on Sept. 25. But judging by the way they have performed all season long, that looks to be a fluke game.

Or maybe it was a rookie mistake. After all, the Dukes are led in scoring by a red-shirt freshman (Shannon Rengers) and a sophomore (Audra Matthews), so maybe something ought to give. Then again, those two have combined for 31 total points this season.

Rengers is a strong and athletic midfielder out of the back who is one of the most in-shape players on the team. With no pun intended, it's only fitting that one of the fittest leads the team in points, racking seven goals and two assists for 16 points.

Matthews, on the other hand, is a threat to score every time she has the ball. One of the most talented forwards in the league – as a sophomore – she was only the second freshman in school history last season to make both All-A-10 and All-Rookie. The Cincinnati native leads the Dukes in shots by a mile (47), so expect her to be shouldering most of the load in the front.

Duquesne typically deploys three forwards in the front, and while all three are capable of scoring, they have two more on the bench to throw into the rotation, like freshman Michelle Esposito. The speedy forward garnered A-10 Rookie of the Week honors last week after tallying a game-winning 11th-hour goal in a 2-1 win over Saint Joseph's.

As for the Saint Louis Billikens (10-3-0 5-0-0 A-10), they beat Duquesne by a score of 5-0 earlier this year. Needless to say, the first ever match-up between these two teams shall be an interesting one.

Whether that's good or bad for UMass is up to them, but you might say they have their work cut out for them.

The Billikens are returning virtually everyone, and currently standing in first place in the A-10, while looking to wrap up their campaign with an NCAA berth; all thanks to a plethora of offensive production. Four players have garnered more than 15 points this season, and three more have above five.

Cassi Winchell and Maureen Hughes both lead the team with

State of emergency lifted in Massachusetts

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Gov. Mitt Romney lifted the state of emergency for Massachusetts on Sunday, deactivating the National Guard and sending a signal that the worst of the weather problems is over.

Under blue skies near the banks of the swollen Merrimack River, Romney said by and large the state was returning to "normal" after a day when driving rain and flooding forced about 1,000 people from their homes, swept away cars and closed highways statewide.

"The all clear will be sounded on a local basis," Romney said. "Recognize we were ready for something more substantial than hit. We have to be."

In Rhode Island, emergency management officials were warily monitoring still flooding rivers and checking on dams, a few of which were damaged on Saturday.

But though the rain had left and major highways had reopened, a high wind warning was in effect.

The National Weather Service said winds powerful enough to uproot trees and bring down power lines were expected and gusts may reach 55 miles per hour at times.

Romney said no one was missing in Massachusetts after Saturday's rain that followed more than a week of wet weather in the Northeast.

No injuries or deaths were reported in either Massachusetts or Rhode Island.

Bay State officials had been concerned that dams would burst in several communities and had prepared buses to evacuate up to 6,000 people from Southbridge in the south central part of the state.

"The impact has been widespread, not Biblical in terms of its depth and the kind of devastation that sometimes is associated with floods," Romney said.

The governor said the state Emergency Management Agency would continue to monitor conditions throughout the day, including the environmental consequences of the downpour.

Romney said a power outage at the Deer Island Sewage Treatment Plant in Boston spilled an unknown amount of sewage into Boston Harbor. In Worcester, he said, a treatment plant spilled millions of gallons of sewage into the Blackstone River.

The governor said about 75 cities and towns experienced extensive flooding Saturday and about 30 communities evacuated residents whose homes were flooded. Romney said most evacuees would be able to return by the end of Sunday.

The yard surrounding this structure, located on West Pomeroy Lane in Amherst, was flooded by the torrential rains that fell yesterday and last week. Many other parts of New England were also flooded.

Police arrest two suspects in stabbings

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Two arrests were made last week for the six stabbings that took place Oct. 2 on N. Pleasant St. and more are expected soon.

Meanwhile, one University of Massachusetts student who police named as a stabbing victim now claims he was never stabbed.

Police arrested a 16-year-old male from Sunderland on Wednesday afternoon at the Amherst Regional High School's alternative Annex School on Southeast St., where the suspect is a student. He was charged with assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon (shod foot) and assault and battery.

The suspect was released into the custody of his parents. He was arraigned Thursday morning at Hampshire County juvenile court. After his arraignment, he was placed into the custody of the court, according to Det. Ronald Young.

The second arrest in the case occurred Thursday morning when police took a 15-year-old Amherst male into custody. The arrest also occurred at the Annex School, where the suspect is also a student.

The second suspect was originally arrested the night of the assaults and charged with illegal possession of a class D substance (marijuana). However, new information led police to file additional charges.

According to police, witnesses observed the second suspect kicking stab victim Alp Mimer as he fell on the ground.

Library opens new 'Learning Commons'

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts W.E.B. DuBois Library will reveal its newest addition to the building, "the Learning Commons," with an official grand-opening ceremony this Friday at 10 a.m.

Tours of the new area will be provided for the following the event until noon. The Learning Commons will feature a 21st century-style workspace, which includes new Mac and Dell computers, wireless Internet and quiet rooms to study. The library administration, as well as building officials, expressed their excitement over the new construction.

"This place is high-energy with a community feeling, it's the happening place to be," stated Theresa Warner, Assistant Director for Administrative Services.

According to library officials, the Commons were built swiftly within a few months due to the efforts of contributors like O.I.T., Pre-academic advising, Career Services, and Learning Support Services.

An initiative of the provost and part of UMass Chancellor John Lombardi's "Campaign for Amherst," the Learning Commons is one of the many developments being established on campus to make the University one of the top research-centers in America. A report on campus diversity released last semester also indicated the need for a Learning Commons.

According to a newsletter posted by Lombardi on his Web site, he emphasized a need for change in the educational-atmosphere.

State Legislature overrides Romney veto

By Melissa Blankstein
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts State Legislature voted unanimously last Wednesday to override Gov. Mitt Romney's veto of a bill that would have paid union members on the University of Massachusetts campuses, state and community colleges retroactive pay raises due from the 2001-2002 school year.

"It's going to be great for campus morale, and for the economy of Western Massachusetts," said Dan Clawson, president of the faculty union at UMass Amherst, and a professor of sociology, in a phone interview. "A bunch of people have stopped me on the street to congratulate us."

Catherine Boudreau, president of the Massachusetts Teachers Association, was also pleased.

"[The members] are thrilled," said Boudreau on the phone. "It's very nice when a promise is made and it is kept."

Former Gov. Jane Swift had approved the contracts and pay raises in 2001. After the legislature approved the measure earlier in September, Romney vetoed it because he "does not support retroactive pay raises."

According to Sen. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, state legislators were not given enough time to vote on the measure.

"But those contracts," Rosenberg said in a phone interview, "were still in force as far as we were concerned and so it needed to be funded.

Rosenberg also said he expected the veto and the override.

"I was surprised it was unanimous, and I was delighted it was unanimous," Clawson said. "Given that Gov. Romney vetoed it, it means that every member of his party voted against his veto."

Although this bill includes $30.27 million for UMass unions and $11.91 million for state and community college administrators and staffers, the work is not yet done.

Governor Mitt Romney, shown above, vetoed a bill that would provide retroactive pay raises to UMass union members. The Massachusetts State Legislature recently voted to override the veto.

"We hope soon that they will fund the contract for 2002-2005 year," Boudreau said.

As for the last piece of the contract, "it would be great if [the legislature] would fund that piece this year," he said.

Clawson has set the new funding as goal number two. First, he would like to see the newly signed contract approved.

"The most immediate next step should have happened a year ago," he said. The newest contract was

Sunni opposition may accept Iraq constitution

By Lee Keath
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's landmark constitution seemed assured of passage Sunday after initial results showed minority Sunni Arabs had fallen short in an effort to veto it at the polls. The apparent acceptance was a major step in the attempt to establish a democratic government that could lead to the withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Opponents failed to secure the necessary two-thirds "no" vote in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces, according to counts that local officials provided to The Associated Press. In the crucial central provinces with mixed ethnic and religious populations, enough Shiites and Kurds voted to stymie the Sunni bid to reject the constitution.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani issued a decree setting Dec. 15 for Iraqis to vote again, this time to elect a new parliament. If the constitution indeed passed, the first full-term parliament since Saddam Hussein's fall in 2003 will install a new government by Dec. 31. If the charter has failed, the parliament will be temporary, tasked with drawing up a new draft on which to vote.

But the outcome could further divide the nation, with many Sunnis fearing the new decentralized government will deprive them of their fair share in the country's vast oil wealth. Large numbers of Sunnis voted "no," and some of their leaders were already rejecting the apparent result.

While a strong Sunni turnout on Saturday's referendum suggested a desire among many to participate in Iraq's new political system, there were fears that anger at being ruled under a constitution they oppose could push some into supporting the Sunni-led insurgency.

"If the constitution was passed, the attacks will definitely rise against the occupation forces, and the security situation is going to be worse," said Sheik Abdul-Salam al Kubaisi, a prominent cleric with the influential Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars, which government officials accuse of links to the insurgency.

In a sign of the relentless danger, five U.S. soldiers were killed Saturday by a bomb in Ramadi, a hotbed of militants west of Baghdad, the military announced. It was the deadliest attack on U.S. troops since a Sept. 20 bomb blast in the same town also killed five soldiers. A Marine was also killed by a bomb Saturday in the town of Suqlawiah, the military said.

The most recent deaths brought to at least 1,976 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the war began in 2003, according to an AP count.

President Bush congratulated Iraqis on the referendum, which across the country saw few attacks and no deaths of voters in violence.

A U.S. Army patrol stops along a street in Jalalah, Iraq. The area is dominated by Sunni Muslims, some of whom say they will vote for the proposed consitution, even though they do not fully agree with it.

Harvard M.D. to give speech on climate

By Ashik Saji
Collegian Staff

Dr. Paul Epstein, Associate Director for the Center for Health and the Global Environment at the Harvard Medical School will speak on "Health Impacts of Global Climate Change" today at the University of Massachusetts campus.

Epstein will discuss the consequences for biological and social systems due to the rate of climate change that has been underestimated. He will also review the spread of infectious diseases like West Nile Virus.

Over the hot, dry summer of 2002, West Nile Virus reached California and five Canadian provinces infecting 250 species of animals and 37 species of birds. If warming continues to occur, say experts, West Nile Virus will potentially move into Alaska with dire consequences.

Climatic changes are also producing dramatic changes in terrestrial and marine food webs. The drought of 1998-2004 – the worst in 500 years – weakened trees by drying resin that normally drowns beetles as they bore through bark, allowing beetles to move into higher latitudes and altitudes outside of their normal habitat. The habitat of the Alaskan forests is therefore threatened by numerous infestations, including spruce bark

Suspects arrested

The second suspect was arraigned Friday afternoon at the Hampshire County Juvenile Court on similar charges.

"We're convinced there was a lot of foot traffic," Young said. "If people saw what happened... we'd love to hear from them."

Anyone with information regarding the case is urged to call Amherst police at 413-256-4015.

In the meantime, police refused comment Friday regarding a recent development in the case. A man, who police named as a stabbing victim, UMass student Sean Fitzgibbons of North Attleboro, has now claimed that he was not stabbed.

Fitzgibbon phoned the Daily Collegian last week to say he was at the crime scene, but had not actually been stabbed. He explained that he happened to be walking by the area when the fight broke out and he somehow cut his arm. He said a police officer who was taking his witness statement observed the laceration and advised him to seek medical attention.

Police still listed Fitzgibbon as a stabbing victim as of press time.

A total of six men, five of whom are UMass students, were reported stabbed outside the Pi Delta Psi fraternity Oct. 2.

Christopher Canton, 21, of 374 N. Pleasant St., which is the house of the Zeta Beta Tau fraternity, was found stabbed in the head.

Joseph Gratton, also of 374 N. Pleasant St. was found stabbed in the left bicep.

At 1:12 a.m., police were called back to the scene on a report of another fight. Three men were found stabbed.

Stephen Fiore, 20, of Somerville was found stabbed several times in the back.

Alp Aliner, 18, of Woodcliff, N.J. received a stab wound to the side.

Police said Fitzgibbon was found stabbed in the arm.

At 2:25 a.m., police were called to 17 Southpoint Drive on a report of a man who had been stabbed.

Thi Le, 25, of 266 E. Hadley Rd. was found stabbed in the hand. Police believed he was involved in the fights on Frat Row.

The case is still under investigation.

High schoolers look to future degrees

By Caroline Freeman
Cavalier Daily

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — Students are creating high expectations for themselves, as 34 percent of high school seniors expect to receive a four-year degree and an additional 33 percent plan to go on to obtain a graduate or professional degree, according to a recent report by the National Center for Education Statistics.

The report was based on statistics gathered from the students in the class of 2004, who were surveyed both during their sophomore and senior years of high school. The survey observed each student's plans for higher education as well as their preparedness for college.

Lee Davis, vocational planner with Charlottesville City Schools, said she thinks the importance students are now placing on higher education directly relates to the economic competition the United States is engaged in with countries such as China and India, which are experiencing rapid growth in the number of students pursuing higher education.

"That [competition] really has a big impact on the United States because we have the best educated 55- to 64-year-olds in the world, but among the 25- to 34-year-olds, we rank eighth," Davis said. "So when you're looking at that, in other words, we are in a crunch right now."

Davis said the education force must change in order to better prepare its students so they are able to meet the higher expectations of employers who now require their workers to have strong reading, communication, analytical and statistical skills in addition to knowledge of their particular career field.

A plan has been developed to help high schools achieve this by focusing on having higher expectations, using more experiential learning to engage students and supporting students in different ways to make them feel empowered and motivated, Davis said.

Kantisha Eaton, 18, reacts as her friend, Darius Cabrellis, 18, gives her a hug after recieving diplomas at the Armijo High School graduation. Studies show that more of these graduates plan to attend college.

Override gives hope signed last August by both union members and the Board of Trustees at UMass. Although they have given the new contract to the governor, he has refused to file it.

Boudreau could not explain why Romney has not approved the new contract and expressed that some members are anxious.

"Everyone was caught by surprise," Boudreau said. "We are working with President Wilson to get it to the legislatures."

Despite these next two hurdles, Rosenberg is optimistic about the future of public higher education in Massachusetts.

"It clearly helps the moral on campus," Rosenberg said of the override. "It helps when we get everybody to say this is a moral obligation and our public higher ed system needs this."

However, Rosenberg also said this override should be kept in a somewhat different category because it is not part of the over plan for new funding at UMass. Still, he said "the tide is changing."

"We have senate leadership and to some extent in the house," he said, "some newly expressed support for public higher education and particularly for UMass, and particularly UMass Amherst. And so, I think this is just another indication of that growing support and the fact that the tide has turned and we believe heading into a very good period for public higher ed."

Clawson echoed excitement, also pointing to Chancellor Lombardi's program for not only adding 250 new professors over the next five years, but also promising of $150 million a year for UMass Amherst and $100 million for updating the campus's buildings.

Epstein and the Center for Health and the Global Environment have been working on the "Climate Change Futures Project: Health, Ecological, and Economic Dimensions" over the past three years. Epstein has worked with the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), the National Academy of Sciences, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) to assess the health impacts of climate change and develop health applications of climate forecasting and remote sensing.

The Environmental Lecture Series has been organized by The Environmental Institute at UMass Amherst and co-sponsored by the Vice Provost for Research and the Colleges of Natural Resources and the Environment, Engineering, Natural Sciences and Mathematics, Social and Behavioral Sciences and Public Health and Nursing.

The talk will take place at 3:30 p.m. in the Bernie Dallas room of Goodell Hall and is free and open to the public.

New work spaces to be offered

"The Campaign for Amherst' offers us the opportunity to join the ranks of America's top public research universities, all of which use their private fundraising to invest in the high qualities that determines national competitiveness. We seek not only investments in permanent endowment, but also investments in capital for laboratories, renovations, enhanced classrooms, recreational spaces, and other critical facilities for students and faculty."

One of the main attractions with the Commons is the enclosed and unbounded work-areas. Separate, glass-enforced rooms are equipped with acoustical panels to minimize floor-noise, allowing students to focus on their studies. These rooms have the capability of housing up to six students at once. In these fully-furnished mini-offices, there are movable-desks and cabinet space available.

"The glass in these rooms are part white-board, allowing students to write notes down for the projects they are working on," said Emily Silverman, Director of Development and Communication.

"You're in an atmosphere with people, yet you get the feel you're in the community," said Warner. "This place is intended to provide comfort. It's not that turf or this, it's common ground."

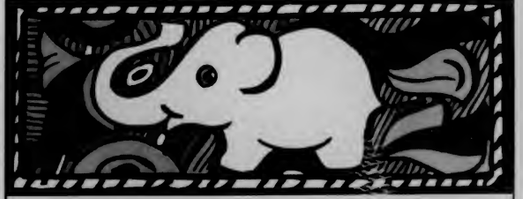
165 computers are available on the main floor, some of which include oversized monitors, as well as moveable furniture, and meeting desks. A total of 58 workstations are located near the two sets of stairs ascending to the lobby level, enhanced with multiple outlets. Library officials also spoke of the accessibility the neighboring-community will have to the Commons.

"One-third of the place is open to the public. Being a Land-Grant institution, part of our mission is to serve the community, our primary is the students," Silverman said.

Warner and Silverman touched upon the brainstorming which went into the Commons' conception. Warner and other DuBois officials traveled to the University of Arizona and the University of Indiana-Bloomington to look at the colleges' learning commons in an attempt to get some ideas.

"The University of Indiana-Bloomington has a successful learning commons there. We saw what worked and what didn't," Warner said.

Conceptual design for the Commons began in June with the Commons' "soft-opening" during the last week of September. Library administration was impressed with the students' instant-embrace of the area. Warner and Silverman watched students lifting the caution tape off of workstation, hooking up their computers and going online.



"It's quite a change," said Henry Merriman, UMass Project Manager. "I'm surprised with the students, it's quite a hub and great place to be."

Within the new Learning Commons, a wide variety of student services are offered. An Information and Community Support area offers assistance to all students with questions. Workers called "rovers" walk around, assisting students with problems.

"We're bringing together many campus services in the library," Silverman said. "It's really an efficient place for students. [It's] one-stop shopping concerning services."

With the opening of the Commons comes a 24-hour place for students to study. According to Silverman and Warner, this change at the DuBois Library should happen in early-November. They are currently hiring staff to work the third shifts.

City on the hill

Matthew Giancola

In America today, heroes still exist. In today's times, they may be few and far between, but if you look in the right places you see them doing the extraordinary, the necessary work of holding up our democratic and civic values that define us as a people. One of these heroes is Captain Ian Fishback, a captain in the 82nd Airborne Division of the U.S. Army. He served in combat tours in both Afghanistan and Iraq. He witnessed the torture of many prisoners in U.S. custody. What's more is that he had the courage to stand up to his superiors who threatened him to not go public with the abuse.

At the time detainees were tortured his superiors told him that the Geneva Conventions were not applicable to prisoners. The Geneva Conventions are a set of guidelines by which all countries must follow when interrogating prisoners of war. When Secretary Rumsfeld testified before Congress, however, he told a very different story. He stated that the Geneva Conventions did in fact apply in Iraq and the "spirit" of the Conventions in Afghanistan.

The President has declared that by abiding by certain standards of interrogation, the military is limited in its ability to fight the war, but by offering no standards our troops are left in the compromising position of following what their direct superiors order them to do. Major General Geoffrey Miller told the Muslim chaplain at the Guantanamo base, James Yee that the "fight is on," meaning that any infractions would be overlooked because "those Muslims" [his words] killed so many Americans.

Miller considers himself to be a devout Christian "considers" being the operative word in this case. When soldiers had a bad day, or were frustrated in Iraq they took it out on the detainees. One soldier broke another man's leg with a baseball bat. Another soldier, this one at Guantanamo, beat a man unconscious with a radio. The soldier had to be handcuffed in order to restrain him.

Wanting to know what the official policy of how to treat detainees was Fishback began questioning his superiors, JAG officials, and even his former West Point professors. Unfortunately, the Pentagon did not want to get involved with a scandal so they put the questions and allegations on their back-burner. They decided not to pursue legal recourse to punish these torturers.

Demoralized, Captain Fishback submitted a report to the Human Rights Watch and he wrote a letter to Sen. John McCain. In that letter he clearly articulated the reasons why the United States should not partake in these inhumane methods of interrogation: "Do we sacrifice our ideals in order to preserve security? Terrorism inspires fear and suppresses ideals like freedom and individual rights. Overcoming the fear posed by terrorist threats is a tremendous test of our courage. Will we confront danger and adversity in order to preserve our ideals, or will our courage and commitment to individual rights wither at the prospect of sacrifice?"

Sen. McCain and 89 other members of the Senate understood this argument and passed an amendment to the military spending bill forbidding torture and setting strict guidelines of what is considered humane interrogation techniques. It still must pass the House, and President Bush has vowed to veto the bill, for the most illogical reasons. He does not want anyone but his administration dictating military policy. He says he is being hampered from winning the war by Congress, but has he thought of how he is hampering America's success?

When soldiers had a bad day, or were frustated in Iraq they took it out on the detainees. One soldier broke another man's leg with a baseball bat. Another soldier, this one at Guantanamo, beat a man unconscious with a radio. The soldier had to be handcuffed in order to restrain him.

Thankfully, we still have heroes here in America who have the courage to stand up to these inhumane and costly policies. What must the young Iraqi boy think of the United States when he sees pictures of soldiers beating suspects? Captain Fishback is fighting to keep future generations from turning to terrorism; and to make America the nation that it could be. "If we abandon our ideals in the face of adversity and aggression, then those ideals were never really in our possession. I would rather die fighting than give up even the smallest part of the idea that is 'America.'"

That is not the only real reason we need to stop torturing other human beings. We are not Al-Qaeda. We are not our enemy. As Americans, no, as human beings, we must always strive to become better than those who wish harm to other people. Ronald Reagan declared that America was a "city on the hill," a country whose beginnings were forged in the desire to create a more perfect union; a republic to promote liberty and justice. We are still struggling up that hill, but the peak is within our sights, and all we must do is walk a little further.

'Get out of jail free' card

Debbie Friedman

As we grow older, we have to leave certain behaviors behind. Things that as a child were once endearing and amusing quickly turn inappropriate and sad as you progress into your teenage years. For example, there is a certain age when dressing up in a costume and going trick-or-treating isn't cute and is actually kind of pathetic. There is a point when your relatives don't feel the need to humor you anymore as you attempt to sing Annie's "tomorrow" for them on Thanksgiving for the fifth year in a row.

One day, sooner or later, there will be a day when our collegiate habits will become inappropriate as well. In college we have four (sometimes five to seven) years to live a life of complete and utter chaos, but when we graduate and head out into that big crazy world, things that are now routine and normal will be looked at in a completely different way.

Take our drinking habits for example. The most important aspect of drinking in college is pre-gaming. It is an essential tool to ensure you will have fun at the random party you're going to. However, when we are out of college, pre-gaming is called something else. It's called binge drinking, and it is not cool.

Taking a couple shots before heading out for a night on the town with your co-workers probably would not fly. Then there is that guy that everyone seems to know. You know the one who takes a Nalgene full of jungle juice with him out to dinner and downs a few beers in the shower on Monday morning?

Right now he is hilarious and fun, but in reality he's an alcoholic. His homemade funnel through which he downed three beers in one minute would not be met with high fives at the office Christmas party. Instead, it would probably land him a card with the number of the local Alcoholic Anonymous chapter. On top of drinking, the recreational pot smoker in college quickly becomes a drug abuser once they are out. It seems that smoking marijuana as an adult is extremely taboo.

Another great aspect of college life is our ability to sleep at any time of the day or night. We can sleep until four in the afternoon with out having to justify that to anyone. We can take a nap at ten at night and pull all-nighters without it leaving us completely fatigued, so long as strong coffee is at hand.

The Internet also allows us to "swap" music and movies, which saves us the trouble of actually having to go into a store and steal it for real.

As an adult however, these sleeping habits would probably qualify you to receive the title of being a complete waste of life. Not to mention that with age, the ability to sleep like this is pretty much impossible without the help of some pretty strong pharmaceutical drugs.

Lastly, the most important aspect of being a college student is our use of the Internet. It is the Internet that allows us to away-message, stalk and procrastinate for hours on facebook.com. The Internet also allows us to "swap" music and movies, which saves us the trouble of actually having to go into a store and steal it for real. Instant messaging in particular is such a way of life that it is hard to imagine it fading out of our daily routines completely.

When we graduate these habits will have to end, because, could you imagine having a real job, your own place and still signing online to start out every morning? Picture a married couple, the wife is going into labor but before leaving for the hospital she scrambles to the computer to write an away message "giving birth, be back later." Or what if there was a corporate facebook.com in which you could stalk members of your company or poke random people? It sounds so absurd to picture adults using the Internet in the same ways we do, but what makes it appropriate now and not later?

Basically, all of our crazy behaviors are justified because when you are a student it seems you cannot be labeled as anything else. Yet, as an adult your behavior directly affects how other people view you. Being a college student is like a "get out of jail free" card in the game of life.

My point here is that we really have to take advantage of this opportunity to be crazy and spontaneous while it is still socially justified. Enjoy it all, because when you're sipping on your glass of wine at your friends' dull house warming party 10 years from now, thinking back to the ridiculous college life you once had will never fail to make you smile.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DON'T FRET

In her Thursday column, Bonnie Solomon runs on for a quarter-page about how she grew up sheltered and how she is oh-so-bothered by the loud partying, among other things that occur on campus. She doesn't "mean to preach" but she still manages to do a fair bit of it.

Friday and Saturday nights are different for you? That's great, congratulations; you're special, better than the rest of us, even. I have nothing against a sober lifestyle (as long as I don't have to live one), nothing against keeping your Sabbath, and certainly nothing against your idea of a good time consisting of "hanging out with friends and watching a movie." All of that is cool, chillin' like Dylan even, but most of your piece sounds like the hand-wringing of my O.C.D.-afflicted mother.

"Rather than looking forward to the weekends, I start fretting about how noisy my hall is going to get." In my 22 years I have brooded, worried, considered, and been bothered, but I have never once "fretted." I leave the fretting to my grandmother.

I'm sorry that other students are making the most of their newfound freedom, and to think that it might become noisy. Jeez, this is an unexpected turn of events, at least for someone who has been living under a rock for the duration of her existence. Noise, alcohol, backwards hats, these are the things you are going to encounter every day for as long as you go to school here.

Which brings me to my next topic, you're "kind of glad" that the Red Sox aren't going to the World Series because it's going to make you a little less afraid? Shame on you and I will now be revoking your UMass College I.D. As far as the "riots" go, if you're not outside involving yourself, then the only thing that should get to you is the noise.

For good or for bad, alcohol is a part of the culture, not just of college life, but of our entire society. If being around alcohol makes you uncomfortable you're going to have a tough time living in our society, as going to sporting events, concerts, office parties, weddings, etc., all involve drinking. Granted, drinking may not be the finest aspect of our culture, but it is deeply ingrained, and it is not going anywhere, so learn to cope.

Do I remember DARE? Yeah, I remember taking DARE about a year or two before I started drinking. I also remember DARE being dismantled in the very same California school districts where it began because it was found to be ineffective . . . great point.

As far as the party-school ranking and all of that other nonsense is concerned, who cares? It's nothing to me if people think this is a hard-partying school, it is. What's wrong with telling it like it is? After all, in addition to being a hard-partying school UMass produces graduates every year who have something valuable to offer in the marketplace. So in answer to your questions Bonnie, yes, I will cherish every drunken moment, and I will do so after earning my degree with more than my fair share of A's and B's, thank you very much. As far as our schools reputation is concerned, it's not something that I "fret" about.

WE'RE ALL JUST GETTIN' LUCKY

Women are great. Being one, I know this is the honest truth. We are caring, incredibly smart and 90 percent of the time better looking than our male-counterparts (the 10 percent is saved for the men who have found bleach and wax). Having said this, I must unfortunately get to my point. I say "unfortunately" because it is hard to be a female nowadays having to face discriminatory disadvantages such as lower pay and immense body consciousness. This article, however, is not in regards to those things. This is in regards to self-respect.

There has been a long lasting double-standard concerning the easy sexual access of women as compared to men. You know what I'm talking about, the age old "wisdom" that women who sleep around are whores or sluts, and men who sleep around are lucky, fortunate, or "pimps." Having said this, and possibly brought to your mind high school and college arguments between girls and guys regarding the subject, the truth must come out.

To put it bluntly, ladies, if you sleep around, you're a whore. There I said it. Any woman on the face of this planet could lie down naked in the middle of the street and get laid. If a man was to do the same, he would be arrested, maimed, or worse. In order for a guy to get ass, he must have strategy, moves, and tactic. To put it shortly, he must have "game."

Now this may be hard news to hear. I myself used to put up the argument of sexual activity being equal for both men and women. I would say, if a man and a woman have slept with five people each, they should be thought of in the same light. Allowing double-standards does nothing but bring people down and ultimately make it more difficult for any real advancement in women's rights to take place.

Alas, a realization has come to me, as I hope it will to you, that "spreading them" at anytime and having something positive come from the experience, is a thousand times easier for a girl than a guy. All the guys I see on a daily basis congratulating one another on getting laid actually have some validity for their excitement. They have accomplished something. They have made a wonderful, smart, attractive female think they are amazing too, and therefore reap the often unattainable rewards.

The girls, as you may know from personal experience, are far less likely to give one another high fives when the guy they got with walks by, and now you know the reason. Girls do not get incredibly excited about getting ass because they know they could have it at any time.

Do not be so quick to assume that I will leave this article without some glimmer of hope that sexual equality can be achieved. It is very possible that we will all benefit from a newer approach on sex and the sexes. Do not make it about girls versus guys. It is common knowledge that we are all driven by the same natural needs and urges.

So here is my proposal; we are to eliminate the terms "whore," "slut" and "skank" from our vocabulary, and use in their stead's what sex is really meant to be. As age old terminology puts it so eloquently, "gettin' lucky."

Our ailing society

Jeff Napolitano

"What is the use of a house if you haven't got a tolerable planet to put it on?" — Henry David Thoreau

There is a great sickness in our country. It's been around for a long time, probably since the first native was slain by America's first foreign occupier (note to Iraqis: And you thought our occupation of Iraq has gone on too long!), but it seems to be getting somewhat worse lately. Perhaps it's just because my eyes are a little more open than they were a decade ago, or perhaps having this particularly inept and corrupt president simply does a better job of highlighting the disparities in this country. We are a society that is sick, and there's no one term to describe all our symptoms.

Last Thursday, I read the Human Rights Watch's new report on the 2,225 children who are in jail, for the rest of their lives, without parole — in the United States. In this country, we put away children, as young as 13, for life sentences. It is hard to imagine the combination of cruelty and indifference our society possesses in order to treat children (many of whom are years away from even being able to vote) worse than grown rapists. How ironic is it that 60-year-old members of the Catholic clergy who have molested children for decades escape the statute of limitations while children of the same age as those molested are put behind bars for life?

How ironic is it that 60-year-old members of the Catholic clergy who have molested children for decades escape the statute of limitations while children of the same ages as those molested are put behind bars for life?

Does it even surprise anyone that in some cases black and Latino children are between 1,000 and 2,250 times more likely to be given lifelong sentences than their white counterparts who are accused of the same crime? Does it surprise anyone that out of the entire population of children serving life sentences in the world, 99.5 percent of them are doing so within the United States? Does it shame us that even Saudi Arabia, Iran, and China — all with unquestionably dubious records on human rights and guilty of other atrocities — don't even engage in such a horrible practice?

It should probably be mentioned that there is an international law that forbids life sentences for children, but this country doesn't give a damn about international law. So let's not lay such disregard solely at the feet of this current administration (although they've elevated ignoring the rule of law to an art form), because Clinton, Reagan, Carter, Kennedy, and pretty much every past president of the United States has ignored the laws of the world since they were established. We allow our leaders to get away with committing war crimes, ranging from armed aggression to overwhelming support of dictatorships, and we wonder why everyone in the world hates our government and its policies.

Latest atrocity aside, we are at a unique point in the history of humankind. We are seeing an unchecked and unconstested proliferation of nuclear weapons and power, which both increase the probability of destroying most, if not all, living things on the planet. We are contributing to an unprecedented change in the climate of the world, a change that is already threatening our ability to subsist on this planet. Our economic world is owned and being run, not by the people who should own the wealth of their societies, but by despotic and pathological corporations. In short, the great majority of people of the world have no control over what happens to them or it. What is happening, on so many levels, is dismal, as is the specter of the future.

I do hope that the people who have suffered and continue to suffer, particularly those in so-called "third world" countries, fight back for control of their lives, because many such movements have been successful. However, what is more important is that we, from the most privileged sectors of the most privileged country in the world, take up the fight. Our generation — you and I — simply cannot lie dormant, ignoring the many injustices in this country and the world, without taking action.

The narrow-minded refer to such people engaged in addressing environmental, political, and economic injustices as "activists." To an extent, such terminology is appropriate; if you aren't an activist you are somewhat of a collaborator. If you aren't working to make the world a better place, then it will only become worse. Whether ordinary people, like you and me, answer a call to action may not only be the defining question of our time, but it also might be the last question.

'GREATEST GAME' NOT WORTH ITS CONVENIENCE

"The Greatest Game Ever Played"

Directed by Bill Paxton

Starring Shia LaBeouf Stephen Dillane

Buena Vista Pictures

Rated PG

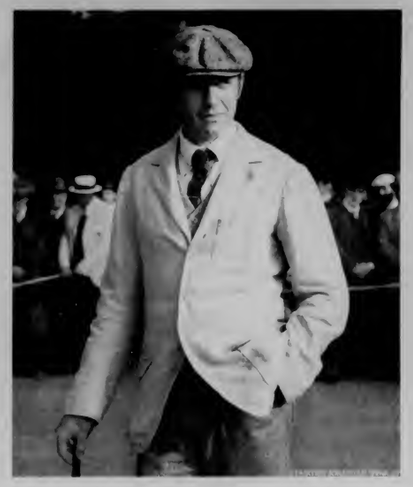
120 mins.

Grade C

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Correspondent

A plebeian boy is taunted by a group of pompous aristocrats, and proves himself to be worth more than they could ever have conceived. Another young man of common stock rises to stardom, to the bemusement of a second group of haughty plutocrats. This second group is reprimanded by the most sensitive of them, who says the true measure of a man lies not in his wallet but in his heart. The second young man has a falling out with his blue-collar father, who gruffly insists that stardom is his son's lot in life.

The young man is guided by the first working-class boy, now a middle-aged champion, to become a champion himself. He snags a girl, too, despite the protests of her own father. Oh, yes, and there's also a young, freckled, chubby tyke who dispenses sage advice to young man number two whilst delivering observations about "dames" being unable to live with. Frankly, I was surprised there was no idealistic schoolteacher who inspired his ragtag group of students to excel and believe in themselves.



Bill Paxton's "The Greatest Game Ever Played" is yet another entry in the ever-popular "movie that can't technically be called unbelievably schmaltzy because it's based on a true story" genre. Given the subject matter that Hollywood focuses on when selecting real-life stories to adapt, it seems as if there must be a Homer Hickham or a Seabiscuit on every corner in the United States.

The story concerns the aforementioned young men who grow up to be golf champions of the highest order. They go through the motions of overcoming obstacles, learning from their mistakes, placing trust in their friends, etc. The film piles on gratuitous computer-aided special effects during the tournaments in an effort to make golf exciting. The plot hardly ever deviates from the stock outline of a Horatio Alger film, and seems too lazy to do so.

"Greatest Game" is logistically top-rate, with a screenplay by Mark Frost (co-creator of "Hill Street Blues" and "Twin Peaks") and sharp acting. The digital effects, however overdone, are expertly crafted. Sadly, the same technology used to predict weather patterns could have determined that the film would end with the underdog winning the tournament, reconciling with his father and walking off into the sunset with his significant other. (I feel no compunction in revealing the ending because anyone familiar with cliché narrative convention could have predicted this movie's outcome. It's akin to writing "it sinks" in a review of "Titanic.")

Going to a movie theater and seeing "The Greatest Game Ever Played" is like visiting a foreign country and opting to eat at a United States-based fast food restaurant instead of the local fare. You don't patronize it to broaden your horizons and go on an adventure; in fact, you go there precisely because you know there will be no surprises. You're too tired to embark into unknown territory, so you stick to a place where you know exactly what's expected of you.

It is disappointing that Frost, who has a reputation for helping to create strikingly original programming in a notoriously unoriginal medium, has been the driving force behind this film. Perhaps someone who has not yet been exposed to superior feel-good, based-on-true-story films such as "October Sky" will gain some warmth from this entry in the genre. But for more seasoned moviegoers, "Greatest Game" is simply not worth its convenience.

Dukes fall to UM

who suffered a concussion in the third quarter, the Minutemen needed to rally behind the arm of Tim Day and the legs of Steve Baylark to pull off the upset.

"This was a big football game for us, and our guys just refused to come off the field without a win," Brown said.

With the ball spotted on the Dukes' one-yard line, Baylark used the first play of the final quarter to tie the score, as he took the handoff from Day up the middle, before diving over the line into the endzone.

"I already planned [leaping] out," Baylark said. "I had to do whatever it took to get it over, and the first thing that came to mind was to jump."

The UMass defense needed to come up big once again a few minutes later after a bad snap during a punt attempt gave the Dukes good field position at the UM 28-yard line. After James Madson moved the ball down to the 13-yard line, halfback Alvin Banks ran right for five yards, but Jason Hatchell stripped the ball, and Shannon James picked it up at the eight-yard line.

"We needed a turnover to be made, and obviously, for some reason, [James] is always around when a play needs to be made," Brown said.

The scoring started in the first quarter with the Minutemen facing a third-and-10 at the JMU 34-yard line. Coen threw an interception directly to linebacker Akeem Jordan, who returned the pick 70 yards down the left sideline to the endzone.

JOHN SOTOS/DAILY COLLEGIAN

John Hatchell powers past into the backfield during the Minuteman win against the Dukes. Hatchell recorded three tackles and one tackle for a loss.

UMass' game-winning, eight-play, 14-yard drive began at the JMU 38-yard line with 2:05 remaining on the clock.

On fourth-and-seven at the 35-yard line, Day was scrambling to find an open receiver, moved forward and hit Dominique Stewart with a seven-yard pass on the right side to move the chains for a Massachusetts first down.

Three plays later, Day completed a screen pass to halfback R.J. Cobbs on the left side, and Cobbs scampered ahead for six yards to the 24-yard line.

That set Cuko up close to the left hash, his preferred side, where he and Day teamed up and performed some field maintenance in the muddy area to set up for the biggest kick of the freshman's young career.

NOTES: Shannon James' fumble recovery in the fourth quarter extended UMass' streak of not allowing an offensive touchdown to 21 quarters. That streak stretches to 71 drives, and the defense hasn't allowed a single point in 25 drives ... UMass has held its opponents to under 100 passing yards in five straight games ... This is UMass' first victory over a defending national champion in school history.

Mixed results for UMass hockey team

HOCKEY from page 8

The win keeps UMass undefeated in their all-time series against the Golden Knights.

The Minutemen jumped on the Golden Knights early, netting their first score of the night just four and a half minutes into the game.

Just after a UMass five-on-three expired, Werner sent a pass from behind to net to Anderson out front. The captain took the pass and rocketed a shot over the shoulder of Clarkson goalie Kyle McNulty. Fenton was also credited an assist on the play.

Playing in his first games since injuring his leg last December, the power play goal was Anderson's first score of any kind since Nov. 5, 2004.

"It's pretty clear that when Matt is in the lineup we're a much better team," Cahoon said. "He's a productive player and he has a good balanced game where he's effective in all three zones. It's nice to have him back and our team has a much better chance with him."

At 16:52 of the first period freshman Alex Berry was called for boarding, a major penalty and a game misconduct. Berry will be available however, for the Minutemen's home-opener Friday against Holy Cross.

"That's a common call now," Cahoon said of the boarding penalty. "It was not a case of a gross intent to injure infraction."

Then in the second period senior captain Marvin Degon netted two power play goals to increase the UMass advantage to 3-0.

For his first score, Degon took a pass from fellow captain Anderson and shot the puck past McNulty for the 2-0 lead. Once again Fenton was also awarded an assist on the goal.

Degon then scored his second goal from between the blue line and face off circle. The Minutemen were on an extended power play because Golden Knight Jamie McKinven was called for hitting junior Mark Matheson from behind and was given a game misconduct.

The goal, which came at the 13:00 mark, was assisted by Anderson and Werner.

For UMass' final goal, Anderson scored his second of the game at the 2:57 mark of the third stanza. The goal, which was the Minutemen's only even strength goal of the night, was assisted by Matheson and sophomore Matt Burns.

"Saturday after showing them some clips and having an opportunity to talk with them and settle them down a little bit we played much more effective," Cahoon said. "We made an adjustment in terms of alignment from Friday to Saturday night that I believe helped.

But more than anything else we played with more poise, handled the puck a lot more effectively on Saturday than we did on Friday and that was probably the biggest factor."

Clarkson broke up freshman Jon Quick's bid for a shutout with ten minutes remaining in the game. At 9:58 Philippe Paquet beat Quick to cut the deficit to 4-1.

Then with six skaters, Clarkson beat Quick again when Nick Dodge scored with just 10 seconds remaining in the game.

Struggles don't faze freshman swarming around him to congratulate the placekicker. The fans, although soaked from the afternoon's rainfall, erupted with bliss. After celebrating with relief, Cuko took the field again with four seconds left for the kick-off. An incomplete last-gasp pass by the Dukes made the victory official.

The game-winner not only finished off the then 4th ranked team in the nation, but paved the way for Cuko to receive conference honors as he was named the Atlantic 10 Co-Special Teams Player of the Week yesterday.

"That was as big of a kick that we've had at UMass in a long time," Brown said.

Cuko, who also converted an extra point earlier in the game, attributes the leadership of some of the upperclassmen as the ones who helped him along during his difficult start.

For Cuko, who lived in Beverley, Mass. prior to attending UMass, the weather in New England is not something new and took full advantage of the Dukes spending a timeout.

"I was waiting for a time-out," Cuko said. "I said, 'Alright, that's great.' It gave us more time to clear up the field."

trio of junior Gary Forbes, junior James Life and junior Art Bowers easily defeated three members of the women's team (Katie Nelson, Ashley Sharpton and Stefanie Gerardot). Bowers and junior college transfer Life both looked especially impressive as both canned 12 treys in 60 seconds.

The dunk contest featured some returning players, as well as some of the new faces Ford has added. Junior transfer Etienne Brower took the title, defeating Viggiano in the finals, although Viggiano had the best dunk of the contest, as he jumped over a team manager on his way to throwing a dunk down.

Brower sealed the contest with the only dunk that received a perfect score from the judges, as he lobbed the ball up in the air, took off his shirt while it bounced and then grabbed the ball and slammed it home.

The night ended with a 15-minute scrimmage that gave fans their first glimpse of how the team will look on the court this season. The scrimmage proved to be a bit of a tease for the future, though, as two of the most impressive players, Forbes and Brower, will not be eligible until next season.

Now that the Midnight Madness festivities are in the past, the team will spend the next month preparing for the season opener on Nov. 18 and will begin to spend more practice time on learning Ford's system than on conditioning, something that is fine with Freeman.

"The first thing we had to do was conditioning, and it felt like we were on the track team," Freeman said laughing. "I'm ready to pick up a basketball and get it going."

Minutemen get shut out twice

By Jon Pelland

The Massachusetts' men's soccer team is happy to be home after their toughest road trip of the year. On Friday the Minutemen lost to No. 16 Duquesne 1-0, in Pittsburgh, Penn., then were blanked by St. Louis (7-4-1 4-0 A-10) 5-0 in St. Louis.

Duquesne	1
UMass	0

St. Louis	5
UMass	0

The two losses drop UMass' record to 4-9 overall and 0-3 in the A-10. The Minutemen are also currently in the depths of a three game losing streak that dates back to Oct. 9 when they lost to Rhode Island.

Duquesne scored the lone goal of the contest Friday night at the 18:56 mark of the first half. Travis MacKenzie headed the ball just inside the left post past UMass freshman goalkeeper Zach Simmons. The assist was awarded to on a free kick. It would prove to be all the Dukes would need.

UMass hung right with Duquesne, the last team in the A-10, for the rest of the game. The Minutemen had scoring chances when sophomore Matty Lemire hit the crossbar and freshman Mike DeSantis' missed, barely clearing the crossbar.

"We played very well on Friday," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "The game could have easily gone the other way but it didn't and we just got to keep our heads up and keep working hard."

Sunday was an entirely different story. The Minutemen were dominated by St. Louis. The Billikens are the most storied soccer program in the nation. They have won 10 of the last 15 national championships.

Scoring goals for St. Louis were Ryan Wileman (two), Dudol Hamzagic, John DiRaimondo and Patrick Garcia. In the game, the Billikens outshot the Minutemen by a count of 11-7. UMass only managed to get two shots on Pat Disbennett in the second half.

UMass' standout freshman goalkeeper Zach Simmons had a tough day allowing four of St. Louis' goals while managing four saves. He was pulled in favor of junior Nick Billman who allowed the Billikens' fifth and final goal.

The Champs get kicked out

Cuko caps off UM comeback

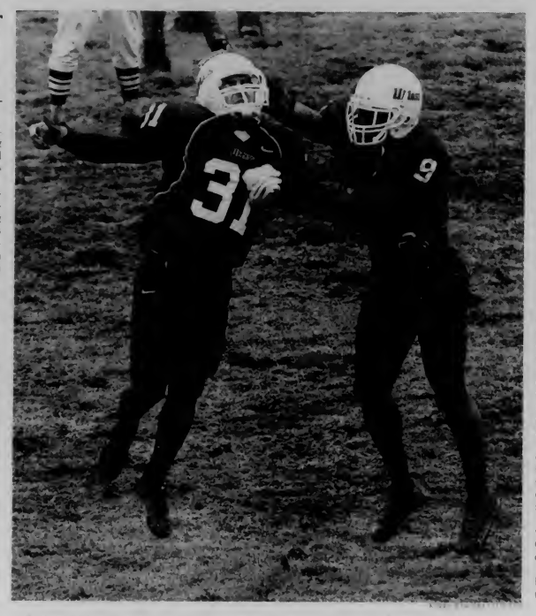
By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Armando Cukos struggles came to a grinding halt on Saturday, and he can attribute his newfound stardom to another kicker already immortalized as a New England football legend.

Sporting his new Reebok shoe for just the second game, Cuko knocked home a 41-yard game-winning field goal with just eight seconds showing on the game clock to help the No. 13 Massachusetts football team (3-1, 4-0 Atlantic 10) topple defending champion and No. 4 James Madison 10-7 in front of 4,47[illegible] people at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

And the shoe was formerly worn on the right foot of New England Patriots kicker Adam Vinatieri before it was given to UMass kicking coach Matt Goldstein, who handed it down to Cuko.

Whether it was because of his newest weapon or not, Cuko, who had missed his last four field goal attempts, knew if he got a shot to win the game, the ball was never going anywhere other than straight down the middle.



UMass	10
JMU	7

"This young man's career has not gotten off to a stellar start," UMass coach Don Brown said. "We haven't lost confidence in him. He's just continued to work hard. He told me before we kicked the ball, 'Coach, I'm going to make this field goal.'"

James Madison (4-2, 2-1 A-10) coach Mickey Matthews didn't have as much confidence at UMass' game-winning bid as Brown, however.

"That was a really gutsy kick by that kid," Matthews said. "He's had a really bad year. We talked before the game. He's the worst I've seen this year. I give him credit. He has really struggled this year."

Trailing 7-0 entering the fourth quarter minus the services of starting quarterback Liam Coen, just brutally ironic, it would have also isolated the members of the student body who don't have the transportation to get to Springfield.

Confidence not lost after early kicking troubles

They were holding onto a 4-1 record, had outscored their opponents by a margin of 114-29 and had the top ranked defense in 1-AA football. Despite the list of accolades the Massachusetts football team earned prior to taking the field against James Madison on Saturday, there still was something uncertain. Armando Cuko, the team's freshman kicker, had been having a bumpy start.

During the Minutemen's 17-14 loss to Colgate on Sept. 10, with 13:37 remaining in the contest, Cuko missed a 21-yard field goal, which proved to be one of the deciding factors for the Minutemen that afternoon after quarterback Liam Coen threw two touchdown passes late in the game.

Heading into Saturday afternoon's battle against the defending national champion Dukes, UMass was faced with a similar situation. Tied 7-7, with eight seconds remaining in the game, Armando Cuko trotted onto the sopping-wet, sludge-filled field of Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium to attempt a 41-yard field goal.

Although Cuko had not made a field goal of that distance during his young collegiate career, had only sent 33-percent of his kicks through the uprights this season and the ball was on one of the muddiest parts of the field, UMass coach Don Brown opted to take a shot.

Following a James Madison timeout and a chat with senior quarterback/wide receiver/holder Tim Day, Cuko lined up, planted his foot firmly in the muck and drilled the ball through the uprights.

"I didn't even look up. [Day] told me I made it, and I felt good," Cuko said. "I didn't even look back. I just ran to the other side of the field.

As Cuko ran, the sidelines exploded with excitement, with his teammates running on the field and

Weather is a fact of life

The Atlantic 10 saved itself from a huge embarrassment and public relations nightmare last week when it determined the playing conditions at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium were suitable enough for Saturday's game between UMass and James Madison.

Early last week, JMU coach Mickey Matthews asked the A-10 and commissioner Linda Bruno to look into moving the game's location from Amherst a few cuts down I-91 to Springfield College.

Obviously, from Matthews' stance, it makes sense.

The Dukes play on artificial turf at their house, which is conveniently located a short drive from the sunny beaches of Virginia.

And Benedum Field, home of the SC Pride, is also fully carpeted from sideline to sideline which would be much more appealing to the Dukes, who aren't used to playing on substandard surfaces like Middy McGuirk.

Scott's [illegible] to see Matthews show a little old-fashioned gamesmanship with friend and UMass coach Don Brown.

The Minutemen entered the game on fire, winners of three in a row, all at home. They had been running the ball well and playing phenomenal defense; the two things a team needs to do to be successful on a wet surface.

Matthews needed to do something to throw UMass off its game and slightly alter its current swagger.

But for the Atlantic 10 to take this request seriously? Well, that's just ridiculous.

This is New England football.

These are the conditions athletes in this area expect to play in, the same way teams play in the heat in Texas and the altitude in Denver.

This is the same way Colgate welcomed UMass to Hamilton, where the two teams fought for their lives during a playoff game in the middle of a horrific blizzard.

UMass has already been dealt an unfavorable hand by the schedule makers by only playing five of its 11 games at home, so losing another one, especially before playing four of its next five out of town, could have served as a crippling blow to a team on a championship mission.

Plus, this was UMass' Homecoming weekend, and moving a team's Homecoming game isn't

The field conditions during Saturday's game did not stop UMass receiver Brandon London from making this key catch from quarterback Tim Day at the 1-yard line.

Minutemen split season-openers

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts' hockey team completed its road trip through upstate New York by splitting their games against St. Lawrence University on Friday night and against Clarkson on Saturday night.

The Minutemen (1-1) dropped their season opener 2-1 Friday against the Saints (2-1) in Canton, N.Y., then traveled to Potsdam where they prevailed 4-2 over the Golden Knights of Clarkson (2-2).

St. Lawrence	2
UMass	1

"After we settled down, we can say overall, the weekend was a positive weekend," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We played hard both nights and competed."

UMass	4
Clarkson	2

On Friday night the Saints jumped on UMass early with a power play goal at 15:57. With redshirt junior captain Matt Anderson and sophomore P.J. Fenton both in the penalty box for diving and interference, respectively, Saints defenseman Mike Madill slipped a shot by Minutemen senior goalie Gabe Winer.

Madill's shot, which was assisted by T.J. Trevelyan, hit Winer and slid past the line as he went down.

Freshman Chris Davis evened the score at 1-1 when he took a pass from senior captain Stephen Werner at the blue line and skated in on Saints' goalie Justin Pesony. Davis beat Pesony five-hole at the 5:54 mark of the second period.

St. L. took the lead again for the final time at 6:59 of the third period. Charlie Griffin took a pass from Jaime Parker and beat Winer stick side for the deciding goal.

UMass pulled Winer towards the end of the third but, despite having six skaters the Minutemen could not force overtime.

"We played like the young team that we are without a lot of poise and therefore we didn't create much offense," Cahoon said. "We gave up second and third chances that created the shot differential."

That shot differential was 42-23 in favor of the Saints. That included outshooting the Maroon and White 16-6 in the second and 17-11 in the third.

Winer's 40 saves on the night were good for the most in a game for him since he faced Boston College on Nov. 12, 2004.

The entire game saw a flurry of penalties for each team. UMass had six in the first period alone and 22 in the entire game.

"I think college hockey in general is called that way," Cahoon said of the game's number of penalties.

Saturday night the Minutemen capped off their North Country trip with a 4-2 win over Clarkson.

New players shine at Madness

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The strobe lights were flashing, the music was blaring and the students had clearly done some "pregaming" for this preseason event. All of this could mean only one thing – the return of Midnight Madness for the Massachusetts men's basketball team after a two-year hiatus.

Not even driving rain could keep students and fans from packing into the Curry Hicks Cage on Friday night to get their first look at the 2005-06 edition of the Minutemen.

It was a night filled with anticipation – for the fans the anticipation was clearly only based on seeing the team, as some of the opening acts and contests were not received well – while for the team, the night was filled with excitement to have fans showing interest in the program again.

"I was a little concerned about the weather all week, but the true spirit of UMass basketball rang true tonight," coach Travis Ford said. "This is a great way to kick off a new season and a great way to kick off a new era. The kids deserved this for how hard they've been working for the last seven weeks."

For every player on the roster, except for senior Jeff Viggiano, this was the first Midnight Madness any of them had participated in at UMass, and they were excited to see the fans come out to show their support.

"I can see [the increased fan support] already," junior Rashaun Freeman said. "It's something I've never experienced before. I feel we have the team that deserves this and now we're getting it."

For Chris Lowe, the only true freshman on the roster, the night served as his first real taste of a college basketball atmosphere.

"I've been waiting for this night for a long time," Lowe said. "Ever since I was a little kid I've always dreamed of playing college basketball. The new coaching staff has brought a lot of intensity to the game, and it'll be fun watching the team play again."

Just before the team came out, a tape of former UMass star Julius Erving appeared on a giant video board, with Dr. J urging fans to support the team and talking about bringing the program back to the glory days.

The team came out a few minutes before midnight, and the entire roster was introduced, with Ford getting the loudest ovation of the night. After a quick speech by Ford thanking the fans for coming out, the night's contests got underway.

In the three-point contest, the Iraq election workers set to audit unexpected results

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Election workers will audit results showing unexpected ratios of "yes" to "no" votes from some parts of Iraq in the country's landmark referendum on the draft constitution, officials said Monday.

The U.S. military said, meanwhile, that its warplanes and helicopters bombed two western villages Sunday, killing an estimated 70 militants near a site where five American soldiers died in a roadside blast. Residents said at least 39 of the dead were civilians.

Word of the unexpected results came as Sunni Arab lawmaker Mesham al-Jubouri claimed fraud had occurred in Saturday's election repeating earlier comments made by other Sunni officials over the weekend.

Iraq's Electoral Commission said numbers from most provinces "were unusually high according to the international standards" and so would "require us to recheck, compare and audit them." The commission said it would take random samples from some ballot boxes to check the results.

An official with knowledge of the election process said that in some areas the ratio of "yes" to "no" votes seemed far higher or lower than would be expected. The official cautioned that it was too early to say whether the figures were incorrect or what caused the unusual results.

The commission and the official did not say what regions had the curious returns.

Voting was believed to have been highly polarized between Sunni Arabs, who largely oppose the charter, and Shiites and Kurds, who supported it. The main electoral battlegrounds were provinces with mixed populations, two of which went strongly "yes."

The province of Diyala, for example, is believed to have a slight Sunni Arab majority. But reports from electoral officials there on Sunday reported a 70 percent "yes" vote and a 20 percent "no."

Iraq has not had a census for more than 15 years, so judgments of the exact sectarian balance are difficult.

President Bush said Monday that he was pleased that Sunni Arabs cast so many ballots.

Asked whether the Sunni vote would damage the political process or increase the likelihood of violence, Bush said the increased turnout was an indication that Iraqis want to settle disputes peacefully. "I was pleased to see that the Sunnis have participated in the process," Bush said from the Oval Office. "The idea of deciding to go into a ballot box is a positive development."

Further delaying the count and the posting of final results, a sandstorm swept over Baghdad on Monday, grounding air travel. Vote tallies still have to be flown in from the provinces, and workers at the central counting center were still examining results only from the capital and its outskirts.

Figures reported by elections officials in the provinces to The Associated Press indicated the constitution appeared to have passed, with the Sunni Arab attempt to veto it falling short.

The acceptance of the constitution would be a major step in setting up a democratic government that could lead to the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned Sunday that violence will continue, even if the constitution is adopted. She said support for the insurgency would eventually wane as the country moves toward democracy.

On Saturday, a roadside bomb killed five U.S. soldiers in a vehicle in the Al-Bu Ubaid village on the eastern outskirts of the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi. On Sunday, a group of about two dozen Iraqis gathered around the wreckage; they were hit by U.S. airstrikes, the military and witnesses said.

The military said the crowd was setting another roadside bomb when F-15 warplanes hit them, killing about 20 people it described as "terrorists."

Several residents and one local leader said they were civilians gathering to gawk at and take pieces of the wreckage, as often occurs after an American vehicle is hit. U.S. troops had closed off the area Saturday, so Sunday morning was the first chance for people to go near it.

Tribal leader Chiad Saad said the airstrike killed 25 civilians. Several others said the same, although they refused to give their names for fear for their safety. The other deaths occurred in the nearby village of Al-Bu Faraj.

The military said gunmen opened fire on a Cobra attack helicopter that spotted their position. The Cobra returned fire, killing about 10. The men ran into a nearby house, where gunmen were seen unloading weapons before an F/A-18 warplane bombed the building, killing 40 insurgents, the military said.

Witnesses said at least 14 of the dead were civilians. After a man was wounded in an airstrike, he was brought into a nearby building that was struck by warplanes, said the witnesses, who refused to give their names out of fear for their safety.

An Iraqi journalist reporting for AP said he later saw the 14 bodies and the damaged building.

Associated Press Television News video showed the dead included two children and one woman. Witnesses said seven other children were among the dead. APTN also showed two children among the wounded.

Few voted in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, on Saturday.

A U.S. Marine was also killed by a bomb Saturday in Saqlawiyah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, the military said. Since the war began in 2003, at least 1,976 U.S. service members have died, according to an AP count.

On Monday, a drive-by shooting killed two policemen in Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, and a suicide bomber attacked a funeral for a sheik in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, killing two civilians and wounding one, police said.

The violence raised to 535 the number of people who have died in insurgent attacks across Iraq in the last three weeks.

Many Sunnis fear the new decentralized government will deprive them of their fair share of the country's vast oil wealth by creating virtually independent mini-states of Kurds in the north and Shiites in the south, while leaving Sunnis isolated in central and western Iraq.

Opponents failed to secure the necessary two-thirds "no" vote in any three of Iraq's 18 provinces, according to counts that local officials provided to the AP. In the crucial central provinces with mixed ethnic and religious populations, enough Shiites and Kurds voted to stymie the Sunni bid to reject the constitution.

The Sunni "no" campaign appeared to have made the two-thirds threshold in Anbar province, the vast western Sunni heartland where Ramadi is the capital, and in Salahaddin, where Sunnis hold a large majority, and as many as 90 percent of voters cast ballots. But in two other provinces where Sunni Arabs have only slim majorities – Nineveh and Diyala – the "yes" vote apparently won out.

Sunni leaders responded angrily, some saying they suspected fraud and accusing American officials and the Shiite parties that dominate the government. While a strong Sunni turnout suggested a desire among many to participate in Iraq's new political system, there were fears that anger at being ruled under a constitution they oppose could push some into supporting the Sunni-led insurgency.

If the constitution indeed passed, the first full-term parliament since Saddam Hussein's fall in 2003 will install a new government by Dec. 31 following Dec. 15 elections.

Hamafaraj Abdulhama, 85, far right, his son, Khader Abdulhama, second from right, and 5-year-old granddaughter, Tavin Tareeq, help election workers in the Kurdish city of Sulaymania on Saturday.

UMass student found dead

A 20-year-old University of Massachusetts student was found dead on the side of East Pleasant St. early Sunday morning, UMass officials confirmed yesterday.

Sharon L. Kelley, a pre-nursing major from Woburn, was found lying on the ground around 2:15 a.m. She was a resident of Coolidge Hall in the Southwest Residential Area.

Two passersby saw Kelley experiencing convulsions from apparent respiratory distress. One phoned for an ambulance, police said.

An emergency medical technician arrived moments later and performed cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) on Kelley. However, she was pronounced dead at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton a short time later.

Foul play is not suspected in Kelley's death. Last night, police said the death is still under investigation by the medical examiner.

"Clearly, we're all saddened. The loss of a student is a loss for the entire community," said UMass news director Ed Blaguszewski. "We share the grief of family and friends."

Kelley is listed as a Dean's List student. She was expected to graduate from UMass in 2007.

According to Umass Associate Vice Chancellor Jo-Anne Vanin, chaplains and other resources are available for students, faculty and staff through the Dean of Students office in the Whitmore Administration Building. Anyone seeking these resources should call 413-545-2684.

"Times like these remind us how fragile life is, and how, as a caring community, we need to reach out and support one another as we each deal with this loss in our own ways," said Vanin.

UMass police lift recent 'crime alert'

A "crime alert" that was issued by University of Massachusetts Police has been lifted after one of the three suspects turned himself into police custody.

The alert was issued after an ongoing investigation into a larceny that occurred at Patterson dorm in the Southwest Residential Area on Oct. 1.

According to Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald, three white males, all of whom are UMass students, broke a fire safety crash bar off an emergency exit door. One suspect, who police refused to identify, turned himself in to police after the crime alert was issued.

"The hope is all three persons will be identified soon," Archbald said.

Police say a surveillance video shows the three suspects forcibly breaking the crash bar off the door around 4:30 a.m.

Archbald said that because the value of the damage was placed at over $250, the crime is considered a felony.

Archbald credits the use of video surveillance cameras to help aid in the investigation.

"In this particular case, the cameras were of significance to us," he said. "The suspects were clearly visible in the lobby."

Police say this case was of particular importance because of the value of damage done to University property.

"These people entered into the dorm and proceeded to violently move a crash bar from a fire safety door," Archbald said.

Police believe the two other suspects will be identified soon.

Crews begin to repair damage after flooding

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

LAWRENCE, Mass. — Emergency and utility crews across the Northeast worked Sunday to repair the damage caused by several days of rain and floods, but strong winds continued to cause problems. In a signal to storm-weary residents that the worst was over, Gov. Mitt Romney lifted a state of emergency declaration. New Jersey's emergency declaration was lifted Saturday night.

"The all clear will be sounded on a local basis," Romney said. Parts of the Northeast had received more than a foot of rain since Oct. 7, according to the National Weather Service. The storm system killed at least 12 people from Pennsylvania to Maine. The latest death was discovered Sunday in Connecticut, where authorities said 54-year-old Elizabeth Cunningham fell into the rapids of the Natchaug River.

Only scattered showers were reported in the region Sunday, but wind gusts topping 40 mph brought down trees and knocked out power. Most electricity was restored before midnight, but the wind was blamed for at least 11,500 power outages during the day in Connecticut, 10,000 in Massachusetts, 7,300 Rhode Island and 6,500 in New Jersey.

A golf green at Hickroy Ridge Country Club was flooded in the rains on Saturday. Normally, this green is completely dry. Only the hills are visible above the flood waters.

Flood advisories also remained in effect for many areas, as officials in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire continued to monitor swollen rivers and streams.

A woman walking with family members at a recreational area in New Jersey's Morris County was killed Sunday when a tree limb weighing more than 100 pounds broke loose and struck her in the head. While it wasn't immediately clear what caused the branch to break off, authorities believe it was likely weakened by the heavy rains that soaked the state.

Hundreds of people in the region were evacuated during the heavy rain, but many had returned home Sunday morning. The Red Cross said others had found shelter with friends or family. Emergency shelters in New Hampshire, where 1,300 residents in Keene spent part of the previous weekend because of flooding, were closed Sunday.

Experts give bird flu facts to worried nation

By Mike Stobbe
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Americans fearful of bird flu are peppering health officials with all sorts of questions: Is it safe to have a bird feeder in my yard? If I see a dead bird, should I report it? Is it still OK to have turkey at Thanksgiving?

The answers are yes, no, and yes.

Officials at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention have been handling an avalanche of phone calls from the public and the media.

"It's been insane," said Dave Daigle, a spokesman for the CDC, which has been getting an average of 447,000 hits a day on its avian flu information Web page.

That's more than the CDC got from people wanting to know about the flu shot shortage last October or the West Nile virus outbreaks in 2003.

And bird flu isn't even here. It is just now infecting poultry in eastern Europe. So far, it almost never spreads between humans and in two years has infected 117 people, all in Asia. More than 60 have died.

But in the past couple weeks there has been tremendous attention on the virus and U.S. government plans to cope with a possible global outbreak. Health experts believe the bird virus may one day mutate to a form that is not only deadly, but easily spread

Bush commission rejects national sales tax

By Mary Dalrymple
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush's tax commission has rejected the idea of a national sales tax and has voiced strong misgivings over European-style consumption taxes, drawing complaints of timidity from critics who wanted the panel to scrap the income tax.

"Apparently they have dismissed out of hand the prospect of fundamental reform," said Leo Linbeck, chairman and chief executive officer of Americans for Fair Taxation, a group advocating a federal retail sales tax. "That's disappointing to me, as you might expect."

The President's Advisory Panel on Federal Tax Reform meets Tuesday to start wrapping up its work on recommendations for making the federal tax system fairer, simpler and better for economic growth. Its final report is due Nov. 1.

Last week, the panel's nine members opposed replacing income taxes with a national retail sales tax, voicing concerns about high tax rates and rampant tax evasion.

When it meets again Tuesday, the members will revisit the possibility of recommending a value added tax.

A levy used widely in Europe that imposes a tax on increased value of a product at each stage of production and passed on to consumers.

But the tax advisers last week brought up numerous problems and complications with the idea, from the possibility of creating a government "money machine" with quickly increasing tax rates to administrative difficulties for the Internal Revenue Service.

"I think it's going to be very difficult to get a consensus," said Connie Mack, the commission's chairman and a former senator.

The changes they have recommended, which leave the income tax system in place, have prompted some reform advocates to believe the panel won't embrace fundamental change.

Facebook could harm users' interpersonal skills

By Kate Strickler
Iowa State Daily (Iowa State U.)

AMES, Iowa — The growing popularity of Facebook has raised some concern about the growing impact of technology on social interaction.

According to the Web site, Facebook is "an online directory that connects people through social networks at schools."

Michael Bugeja, author of "Interpersonal Divide: The Search for Community in a Technological Age," said Facebook encourages members to participate in simulated interaction rather than interpersonal interaction.

"Facebook is not an online community but a mere simulation of the real thing," said Bugeja, director of the Greenlee School of Journalism and Communication.

He said Facebook is replacing rather than supplementing interaction among college students.

There are 19,495 ISU members on Facebook, said Chris Hughes, spokesperson for Facebook, who disagreed with Bugeja's assessment of the Web site's impact.

"Facebook does not replace face-to-face reaction, but instead complements it. People log on and learn a great deal more information about their friends and peers through the site, which can then make face-to-face interaction all the more valuable," he said.

One of Bugeja's concerns was members of the Facebook willingly divided themselves into marketing groups. Several Facebook groups very closely resemble mailing lists that marketers use to reach their target audience. For example, a Facebook group called "Kick-Ass Conservatives" was similar to the mailing list called "Red-Hot Conservatives," he said.

"Marketers used to put people into boxes. Now, they say 'Here's the box!' and everyone jumps in for themselves," said Jay Newell, assistant professor in the Greenlee School.

The advertisements on Facebook also raised some concerns.

"Facebook could hurt publications like Ethos or the Daily, because advertising on Facebook is so much cheaper and far-reaching," Newell said. "People who don't have cats have to sit through litter commercials, people who don't have children have to sit through diaper commercials. This is an interesting vehicle to fine tune messages to show you the ones you need."

Future generations will be affected by programs such as the Facebook, Bugeja and Newell agreed.

Rather than exposing children to critical thinking, they are exposed to multitasking, Bugeja said.

"How do you teach a generation of multi-taskers?" he said.

"You're putting all this information out about yourself in a time when you're still defining who you are," he said, adding that allowing public access to this type of information at any time can be dangerous.

"What if George Bush had a Facebook profile when he was in college? That could be very damaging during election years," he said.

Fixing the problem would be a difficult task, Bugeja said.

"I'm not hopeful," he said. "Universities have invested considerable amounts of money into technology to the point that we now have fewer tenured professors in the classroom."

Technology's purpose is to keep people informed, but people are using them for 'ego-casting' purposes, Bugeja said. 'Ego-casting' is using a device or program to further a person's ego and interests, it needs to be controlled.

Both Bugeja and Newell have Facebook accounts, but neither are active.

"I joined because I was curious, but I haven't done anything to my profile or looked at anyone else's. I don't think the students posted their information knowing that professors could read it, and it's none of my business," Newell said.

Financial aid ban keeps drug offenders out of college

By Chris Yonker
The Post (Ohio U.)

ATHENS, Ohio — The Students for Sensible Drug Policy has recently called into question a provision of the Higher Education Act that bans potential college students with drug convictions from receiving government financial aid.

That financial aid ban hurts the drug offender in the long term as well as the short term, said campaign Director Tom Angell, because college students are less likely to use drugs than high school students. The ban keeps many qualified people out of college who otherwise would have graduated and contributed to society afterwards, he said.

A report recently released by the Government Accountability Office supports Angell's argument.

Since the financial aid ban went into effect in 1998, 175,000 applicants who filled out the Federal Application For Student Aid form were denied at least one year of federal loans because of their drug convictions. That figure does not take into account the number of people who started to fill out the form and noticed that they could not receive financial aid if they had a drug conviction and did not send the FAFSA form in because of it, Angell said.

"This ban greatly hurts our nation's economy," he said.

However, a relatively small percentage of applicants are affected, said Laurie Ekstrand, director of homeland security and justice at GAO. The ban is not a lifetime ban for those with one or two drug convictions, Ekstrand said – it lasts one year for one drug conviction and two years for two convictions. After that, the ban turns into a lifetime ban.

Although the report and its information is solid, Ekstrand said, the report was not comprehensive.

"We carefully pieced pieces to put our report together," Ekstrand said.

The group could not look at how many drug offenders reapplied for federal aid after a one- or two-year ban or of which type of drug offense applicants were convicted, Ekstrand said. The information to correlate these and denial of financial aid was simply not there, she said.

Financial aid for college is not the only federal benefit that is denied by the law because of drug convictions. Offenders also are denied Temporary Assistance for Needy Families money, food stamps and federally assisted house grants, according to the report.

However, Ohio and several other states chose to opt-out of some bans including TANF, food stamps and house grants, leaving only the financial aid ban intact.

Congress is in the process of reauthorizing the Higher Education Act, Angell said. The reauthorization has passed committee and might be dealt with by the end of the month.

Study shows faith benefits

By Kelly Ann McColm
Oklahoma Daily (U. Oklahoma)

NORMAN, Okla. — Lauren Sisson said she has been a Christian for what seems like her whole life and grew up in a Christian home in Edmond, before coming to the University of Oklahoma.

Shadden Abboushi is a chemical engineering graduate student from Pune, India, who said she has been practicing Hinduism all her life.

Dru Abedin, philosophy and studio art sophomore, was raised Buddhist and continues to practice when he goes home to Houston.

Although these students may seem different, they may have one similar quality – good health.

Religiously active people are more likely to live longer, healthier lives, according to several studies released by Duke University Medical Center and the University of California-Los Angeles.

Harold Koenig, assistant professor of medicine and psychiatry at Duke University, has released studies showing that religion may improve a person's immune system and blood pressure, help in recovering from depression and possibly lengthen life, according to the Duke University Medical Center's Web site, www.dukemednews.org.

"They smoke less, they drink less. They're more likely to wear their seat belts. They don't abuse substances. They tend not to engage in risky sexual practices," Koenig said in a press release.

Koenig, who has researched the relationship between religious activities and health for years, said religious people tend to be healthier in general, according to a statement he released in February 2002.

Thomas J. Burns, a sociology professor specializing in religious and cultural studies, said that although he has seen several studies about the relationship between religior and health, he thinks it is too strong of a statement to say that religious people are healthier in general.

"When one's religious views lead to peace of mind, that's certainly good for one's health. If it leads to a pathological degree of guilt and morbidness, it can be negative for one's health," he said. "I think you can be psychologically at peace and not be a religious person."

Austin DeJarnette, international business and energy management junior, said he believes in doing the greater good but doesn't believe in a fixed religion.

"Even though I don't attend church, I still feel as healthy as anyone else," he said. "I don't understand how praying more can increase your physical health."

DeJarnette said even though people's views on religion are different, everyone should have some type of higher being that they can look up to.

Several students at OU said they have noticed a positive correlation between religious activity and good health.

"I pray in the mornings, and that keeps me fresh throughout the day," said Abboushi. "In our religion we can't drink or anything, so of course that would be healthier."

Sisson said she agrees that religion can have an effect on a person's health. "The Bible says that your body is a temple, and that means that we should keep ourselves as healthy as we can to honor God," she said.

Sisson said religion is the center for her life and is a constant on which she can always rely.

"If you honor him, the Lord will give you the strength to get anything done," she said.

Students deal with body images

By Erica Acret
Daily Illini (U. Illinois)

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — Some college students are bombarded on a daily basis by the pressure not only to do great, but to look great. When combined, these pressures can lead to eating disorders.

Ninety-one percent of women recently surveyed on a college campus had attempted to control their weight through dieting. Twenty-two percent dieted "often" or "always," and 35 percent of "normal dieters" progress to pathological dieting. Of those, 20 to 25 percent progress to partial- or full-syndrome eating disorders, according to the National Eating Disorders Association.

Eating disorders such as anorexia, bulimia and binge eating disorder include extreme emotions, attitudes and behaviors surrounding weight and food issues. They are serious emotional and physical problems that can have life-threatening consequences for females and males, according to the National Eating Disorders Association.

"College is a very stressful time, full of new responsibilities, new friends and a completely new environment," Justine Karduck, nutrition education coordinator at McKinley Health Center said. "It can be very frightening, lonely and confusing, and there is a lot of pressure to fit in socially."

Peer pressure, the media and academics are factors that may cause students to be susceptible to low self-esteem and stress.

"You see a lot more people here than you do at home," said Emily Berkowitz, freshman in LAS. "If you see a girl with a great body and all the attention she gets, you want to look like her."

When pressures build up, some people turn to food as a way to block out other stressors, Karduck said. Others may turn to compulsive eating to deal with the pressures and emotions they are facing, she added.

Although these pressures may cause eating disorders, a student's state of mind is another important factor.

"College is potentially a high-risk time for anyone," said Connie Langellier, clinical counselor at the Counseling Center. "It depends on how solid your core sense of self is before you get here. There are many factors that go into eating disorders."

A broader issue that affects students' views on body image is the media, Langellier said. Media here at the University can give students expectations of being thin and beautiful. Campus advertisements such as the Abercrombie and Fitch billboard on Green Street raise questions about the messages that the media is sending to students, she added.

"It's hard to escape that push," Langellier said.

Some students may be unaware of the resources available on campus for people struggling with eating disorders.

"I haven't really heard anyone say anything about resources for dealing with eating disorders," said Lizzy Blaine, freshman in Engineering.

But the resources are there.

Medical assistance, nutrition education and counseling are available at McKinley Health Center, while assessments, therapy and self-help brochures are available at the Counseling Center.

"At appointments the patient will be provided with educational materials and therapy deemed appropriate by the provider," Karduck said. "Books are also available in McKinley's library on this topic."

At the Counseling Center, the process starts with an initial mental health assessment and, if deemed necessary, is followed up with an eating assessment. Group or individual therapy may be suggested after assessments.

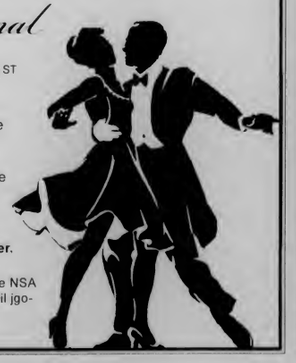
"These resources can help a student cope with their problem," Langellier said.

Community referral is also an option.

"We are connected to a number of resources in the Urbana-Champaign community who specialize in eating disorders," Langellier said.

Friends of students with eating disorders also have options. The Counseling Center offers a self-help brochure called "Maybe I Have a Friend With an Eating Disorder." The brochures include checklists and suggestions on how to approach peers.

The first step is deciding whether their relationship is strong enough for the sensitive topic to be discussed, according to the brochure. The self-help brochure offers three topics in analyzing the relationship with a peer, including trust, intimacy and boundaries.



"There is often guilt and shame related to the behavior," Langellier said. "A strong relationship really helps [when dealing with a peer]."

The brochure also offers advice on how to approach a peer. These steps include creating an action plan, approaching with compassion, remaining patient, and emphasizing specific behaviors.

Without the help of professional, students with low body confidence can prevent themselves from falling prey to the pressures of attaining a perfect body image. The Counseling Center also offers a brochure on body size diversity and acceptance. It informs students how to accept their bodies.

LuAnn Pierce opened Grand Goddess Body Image Studio in West Columbia, SC, on July 11, 2005. This studio promotes positive body image among college students.

Study shows smoking can lower I.Q.

By Carissa Miller
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — Many smokers say one of the main benefits of their habit is a feeling of alertness and an increased ability to focus after lighting up. But smoking to improve mental proficiency may only be a quick fix. According to a new study led by University of Michigan researchers, long-term tobacco use in men is associated with a weakened thinking ability and lowered IQ.

The study did not find a causal relationship between smoking and lowered brain function, said Jennifer Glass, an assistant professor of psychiatry and lead author of the findings. But the correlation — an unexpected finding from a study originally intended to examine the effects of long-term alcoholism on the brain — calls attention to the need for further research on the connection between smoking and brain function, Glass said.

Glass said that in previous studies on alcoholism, cigarette smoking has been frequently overlooked as a factor leading to decreased mental capacity. This is problematic, she said, because people with alcohol problems tend to smoke more than the general public.

"In looking at cognitive function and how it relates to drinking, I wondered how other variables, such as additional drug use, might have an influence," Glass said. "That is when it was found that smoking had a correlation."

In addition to validating previous findings that alcoholism affects IQ and thinking ability, the researchers discovered that long-term smoking diminished the neurocognitive function and IQ of men, regardless of whether the men had alcohol problems. This impact was evident in many areas, such as short-term memory, verbal and mathematical reasoning and visual spatial processing.

The findings have provoked mixed reactions from some students, especially those who smoke, such as LSA junior Dave Jones.

Jones, who characterizes himself as a "social smoker" smokes once or twice a week and said although there are issues with the sample and procedure of the study, findings like these further deter him from smoking.

"I'm not worried about becoming a long-term smoker, and maybe there would be more of an impact if I was," Jones said, "but, if well-supported, [this finding] is another reason to stop."

Other students disagreed, arguing that since the findings of this study don't overshadow the other known risks of smoking, there is less of an impact.

"I think that death and other potential effects have a bigger bearing on whether or not I quit," said one student, an LSA sophomore who preferred to remain anonymous. "Maybe if I weren't a smoker it would be more motivation, but the [procedures of the study] make me think it wasn't in-depth enough and that findings aren't well supported."

Glass added that this finding is especially interesting because it sampled from functioning alcoholics. In the past, studies have frequently used subjects from alcohol treatment centers, comprised of individuals with severe alcoholism.

Bird flu worries causes medicine stockpiling among people.

The U.S. government has started stockpiling Tamiflu and other medicines that scientists believe might be effective against a pandemic virus.

Some people wonder if they should do the same thing. The manufacturer of Tamiflu, which was created to treat ordinary human flu, advises the drug be taken within 48 hours after flu symptoms begin. So some health officials agree it might be wise to have a supply at the ready, especially if a shortage develops.

But people should suppress the urge to pester their doctors for Tamiflu prescriptions, said Dr. Charles Woernle of the Alabama Department of Public Health.

Those who hoard Tamiflu will reduce supplies for the elderly and others at risk of serious illness and death from conventional flu, he said.

"You'd be denying some folks who have definite, immediate needs," said Woernle. Alabama's assistant state health officer for disease control and prevention.

Debbie Crane, a spokeswoman for the North Carolina Department of Health and Human Services, said if people really want to take precautions, they should eat right, wash their hands and take commonsense steps to bolster their health and immune systems.

She also suggested getting a flu shot. The vaccine for the upcoming flu season doesn't confer protection against bird flu. But protecting people against conventional flu could make them stronger against a new illness, health experts say.

One more thing: Quit smoking, Crane advised.

In North Carolina, officials estimate that 5,600 state residents could die in a bird flu pandemic. Meanwhile, about 10,000 residents of that state die annually because of tobacco use, Crane noted.

Here are answers from CDC and global health officials to some of the questions worried Americans have been asking:

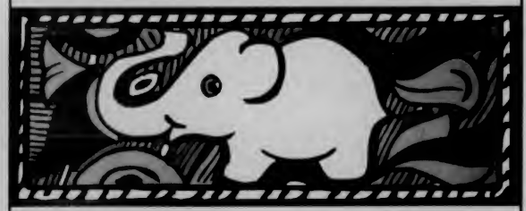
Q: Is it safe to keep a bird feeder in the yard?

A: Yes.

Q: If I see a dead bird, should I report it?

A: No. While there has been avian flu in the United States, it has not been the H5N1 strain that has spread through poultry farms in southeast Asia and into eastern Europe.

Q: We keep a small flock of chickens. Should we get rid of them?



A: No.

Q: If I feel flush, should I ask my doctor to perform a particular test to check for the bird flu virus?

A: You may ask your doctor to conduct either a rapid diagnostic flu test or a lab test for influenza. If you have a recent travel history to an area where bird flu is endemic, inform your physician.

Q: Should I buy Tamiflu for my home?

A: Tamiflu is effective at treating ordinary flu and scientists believe it may help combat human infections caused by the H5N1 virus. However, the effectiveness of any antiviral medicines such as Tamiflu could change depending on how the virus changes.

Collegian's hidden agenda

Nick Belanger

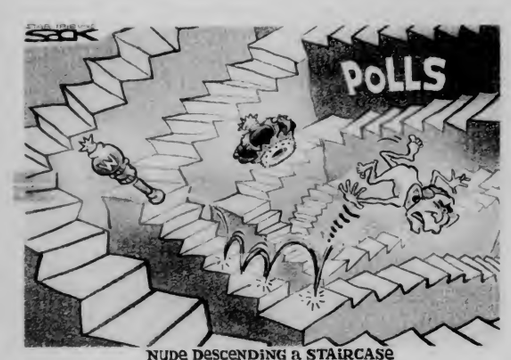
I was browsing Facebook the other day and I decided to take a quick break from poking and check out some groups. After joining half a dozen or so groups, I came across the Daily Collegian Sucks group. Normally, I wouldn't let something like this bother me, but as the production manager of this newspaper I spend countless hours here and take a tremendous amount of pride in the Daily Collegian.

I'll be the first to admit that the Collegian is not without flaws, but then again, what newspaper is flawless? Distinguished publications such as the New York Times even have to run a correction box daily to admit to their errors, and they have a full-time staff of the best in the business.

The Collegian has a staff made up of 95 percent college undergraduates, many of whom are not paid. The few of us who receive a salary get minimum wage, and personally I am paid for less than half the hours I actually do work. So please excuse me if there is a grammatical error on the front page, but sometimes at 1 a.m. a bunch of underpaid overworked college students overlook a detail. But have no fear, I know first thing in the morning some over-pretentious intellectual Rao's coffee-drinking perfectionist will let me know what's wrong with the newspaper.

Spare me ... I can't think of anything more pathetic than someone sitting around with a pen circling errors in this paper. I tell you what, future high school English teachers of America, if reading the Collegian drives you to the point of insane obsessive copy editing, you might need a hobby. Or better yet, come get a job here. I guarantee this paper will drive you to levels of insanity you have yet to know.

The Daily Collegian is New England's largest college newspaper, and has been a daily since 1967. We have never missed a day of publication. On top of that, the paper is independent from the university. The Daily Collegian is a major operation, with multiple departments, a major publisher and distributors. That is why I feel the need to defend the integrity of the Daily Collegian. I am proud for what we accomplish each day, and despite nothing but negative feedback, we suck it up and make the best paper we can.



I would also like to address another common misconception the critics have about the Collegian: we are not at all biased, and we do not have a secret hidden agenda. Assuming content is appropriate for publication, the Editorial/Opinion page gladly prints anything and everything that meets the standards of this newspaper. This page is a forum for students to express themselves, in the only major form of free student print press on campus.

I can't think of anything more pathetic than someone sitting around with a pen circling errors in this paper. I tell you what, future high school English teachers of America, if reading the Collegian drives you to the point of insane obsessive copy editing, you might need a hobby.

However, if you're a poor writer whose work lacks substance and attributable facts, we do not owe you publication. Being a writer for the Collegian is a privilege. Also, unsigned letters to the editor will never be published. If you wish to critique content, by all means do so; but have the courtesy to sign your name to your letters. Any gutless intellectual with a computer can go online and rip into the Collegian for missing a fact or spreading our "liberal agenda."

This column is dedicated to the hardest-working, yet most under-appreciated staff of individuals on campus. Despite constant criticism we keep our heads up and do our jobs to the absolute best of out abilities. Thank you to all of my co-workers ... now you can go back to doing the crossword.

Who ya gonna call?

Paige Cram

I have never been a person who is afraid to admit her fears and at this time of year, there are two that are most prominent: horror movies and ghosts.

It's easy for some people to get caught up in all the romance of fall in New England: pumpkin picking, apple cider and of course the colorful foliage. Call me morbid, but for some reason, I can never manage to forget what autumn is really about: death. People lose their summer glow and begin to look more and more like the skeletons that decorate front porches, the days become shorter and darker and nature begins to hibernate for the coming winter.

The Celts believed that the new year began on Nov. 1. When the fields were harvested and the trees were bare, they began to prepare for the upcoming year. Part of this preparation included what we now know as Halloween.

On the last night of October, they believed that the barrier between worlds would blur and the souls of the dead from the previous year could walk the earth one last time. In order to protect themselves from these wandering spirits, they wore costumes of animal skins and performed certain rituals to calm their fears. I can't say I blame them.

I have never been a Halloween fanatic and maybe that's because the very principle of the holiday terrifies me. Sure, costumes and candy are great, but the idea that we are surrounded by ghosts with bones to pick is enough to keep me awake for the whole month of October.

Anyone who's ever seen "Ghost Busters" knows that ghosts can come in many forms, and as a child I feared them all. But by the time I was old enough to realize that the Stay Puff Marshmallow Man would never actually come waltzing down my street, I was becoming aware of other types of ghosts that haunt us all.

I have always believed that the past is the past for a reason. It happened, and the sooner we move on, the better: skeletons belong in a closet. But what if we lived in a society like the Celts, one that believed the past is actually a part of our present? What if, once a year, we were forced to clean out our closet and think about all we had been through and all we had lost?

Sure, costumes and candy are great, but the idea that we are surrounded by ghosts with bones to pick is enough to keep me awake for the whole month of October.

Most of us would choose to do what the Celts did: turn out the lights and disguise ourselves until it was safe. Who wants to face those things that we've tried so hard to forget? However, I've recently encountered a few ghosts of my own, and I've come to realize that there are some things from which you just can't hide.

The concept of a ghost is all about unfinished business. Until the business is resolved, it will continue to haunt those involved. It's a nice idea the Celts had – that if they could just make it until midnight, to the new year, then the ghosts would return to the other world and they could start fresh on Nov. 1. Maybe that theory worked well for literal ghosts like the Marshmallow Man, but for those of us dealing with the more figurative haunts of our past, that's just not enough.

We can never truly make a new start until we've cleaned up all the mess of the past. You can try to stuff your skeletons into the closet, but then you have to live in fear, and the truth is, you are only as haunted as you allow yourself to be. In order to really grow and change as people, we have to face the things that scare us most. Only then can we live without jumping each time we hear a strange noise, afraid of what it might mean.

This October, I won't be afraid. I won't let the idea of my past ruin the hayrides or the candy or the chance to win best costume. I will use this fall as it's supposed to be used: to say good-bye to those things which would hold me back from moving on. The past will always have a presence, but it doesn't have to affect your future. Each year can be a new beginning, another chance – to be happy, to accomplish our goals, to fall in love, to laugh, to cry, to make a new friend. This year, with the dying of the leaves, I will face my ghosts and banish them once and for all so that I will have that chance. So while the rest of you are celebrating the modern version of Halloween, I'll be celebrating Celtic style. Happy New Year, UMass.

'Take back ZooMass'

David Lawrence

The reputation of our university has recently taken several major hits. In this year's Princeton Review college rankings (you might remember this big book of colleges from when you were deciding where to apply), the University of Massachusetts Amherst scored in the top 15 of several negative categories. Here's how it stacked up:

#3 Long Lines and Red Tape
#3 Students Dissatisfied with Financial Aid
#9 Students Who (Almost) Never Study
#9 Party Schools
#13 Reefer Madness

Those certainly aren't characteristics a university benefits from having. We've also made news with the recent violence on frat row, another hit to a campus that only seems to get embarrassing media attention (I'm sure you remember the Red Sox riots the last two years). If the college rankings had a category for "Oops, I got date-raped or stabbed at a frat last night," UMass Amherst might have a shot at another infamous list – perhaps Princeton Review should think about making a special addition to next year's guide.

The reason UMass shows up in these negative rankings is that it belongs there. They are not the result of some statistical abnormality or biased reporting; they are the result of comparatively poor student study and party habits, a culture of substance abuse and a cash-strapped administration that is helpless to keep up. Many students here don't study as much as they should, party too much and drink too much. Any student who has been to the Whitmore Administration Building near the start of a semester can personally attest to the "Long Lines and Red Tape," a problem that exacerbates difficulties getting financial aid.

There are organizations around campus that long to "take back UMass" from the administration or the trustees, but their focus is in the wrong direction. Yes, students who want to fight for the good of this campus should be looking to "take back UMass," but from the students, not the administration. We need to "take back UMass" from the careless masses that have a stranglehold on it and its public perception. We need to "take back UMass" from the careless masses that have a stranglehold on it and its public perception. (For you SGA members, this is the 91 percent of the student body that didn't bother voting in your election.)

How can we hope to improve the education here when underpaid administrative staff and professors are incapable of force-feeding education to a mostly unwilling student body? The embarrassing antics of that student body have tainted the university's reputation so that it is difficult to raise the funds needed to overcome the culture that caused them. It is easy to ignore all that and get caught up in lofty goals of "democratizing education," but what good is an educational democracy with only 9 percent of students voting?

Yes, students who want to fight for the good of this campus should be looking to "take back UMass," but from the students, not the administration. We need to "take back UMass" from the careless masses that have a stranglehold on it and its public perception.

The fraternities (specifically the party houses on frat row) are the focal point of the ZooMass culture. Though the stabbings now a few weeks past highlighted the raucous weekend scene along North Pleasant Street, they are hardly representative of everyday life at the frats. Brothers and sisters are not violent in general, and it would be unfair to say that the stabbings characterize frat life. What the frats do provide is a geographic center for the "party school" reputation we have. The frats serve as an educator for many UMass students early in their freshman year, providing their first exposure to the way they're "supposed to act" here at UMass. Frat row may not regularly cause serious violence, but it does annually perpetuate the ZooMass lifestyle that got us unfavorably into the Princeton Review.

Those reputations and our cultural problems are not insurmountable. We have a lot of very dedicated people working in the faculty and the administration. In general, UMass students are good people and intelligent people. In particular many of the most brilliant people I've ever met have come from the ranks of students here. Their poor reputation around the state is the result of the self-perpetuating "ZooMass" culture that those students often subscribe to. That's something we can work on.

Restrictions need to be imposed on the fraternities here on campus. They needn't be shut down or lose their residences, but the parties need to shrink or disappear. With greater enforcement of underage drinking laws, the frats could be scared into keeping much quieter. Without "frat row" as a monument to "ZooMass," we'd be in a much better position.

Students themselves need to look in the mirror. When they complain about the administration or large class sizes, students should think about how "ZooMass" looks to a prospective professor or donor. Before student leaders get ready to "democratize education" they should think about developing a student body that cares to have a say in our governance.

I love UMass. I love the independent spirit of the student body, and public education is a cornerstone of our society that we need to keep working and improving. I love ZooMass too, but in limited quantities. It is important to have fun in college, but we need to be real, hard-working college students too if we want to be "having fun in college" rather than just "having fun." Our antics have been harming this school's reputation, and it is about time we shape up.

Better, richer, whiter New Orleans

Ethan Burke

It took a Category 5 hurricane to compel Americans to acknowledge the persistent problems of poverty and racial inequality in our nation.

For once, the media openly asked the question: did race play a role in the devastation and dismal response to Hurricane Katrina? Some countered this question, saying that it had more to do with economics than race. I tend to agree. However, we must understand that the race and class are inextricably linked.

New Orleans, a predominately black city, has been devastated by Hurricane Katrina. But the powerful elite in the higher altitudes and the gated communities see this not as a disaster, but as an opportunity.

The Wall Street Journal describes the sentiment of the established elite, writing, "New Orleans before the flood was burdened by a teeming underclass, substandard schools and a high crime rate. The city has few corporate headquarters.

"The new city must be something very different, Mr. Reiss says, with better services and fewer poor people. 'Those who want to see this city rebuilt want to see it done in a completely different way: demographically, geographically and politically,' he says. 'I'm not just speaking for myself here. The way we've been living is not going to happen again, or we're out.'"

If George Bush and our government cared about black communities we would see efforts to improve the endemic problems. We would see real initiatives to address the hideous public school system, the lack of employment opportunities, inadequate housing and medical care.

This illuminating passage, quoting head of New Orleans Business Council Jimmy Reiss, is now being played out in New Orleans in the most disgusting manner.

Mr. Reiss must be delighted that the government wastes $11 million per day paying hotel bills for evacuees in Florida and other parts of the country while tens of thousands of apartments lay vacant in the whiter parts of New Orleans.

With families devastated, one would think reconstruction could provide jobs and relief to the unemployed laborers from New Orleans. President Bush squashed these hopes when he suspended the Davis-Bacon Act that ensures that employees working under government contracts receive the average prevailing wage.

In addition, local labor is giving way to immigrant labor as undocumented Mexican immigrants surge into New Orleans. Oliver Thomas, president of the City Council, said, "I've got nothing against our Hispanic brothers, but we have a whole lot of skilled laborers in shelters that could be doing this work."

I'm sure Mr. Reiss was equally delighted when hearing the Secretary of Housing Urban Development, Alphonso R. Jackson, say, "It's not going to be as black as it was for a long time, if ever again."

With these policies, people from New Orleans will have little opportunity to return to New Orleans and will move to where they can find work and provide for their families. Some have come to wonder whether Jackson may be hinting at government policy.

Kanye West shocked many people when he said, "George Bush doesn't care about black people." Kanye West wasn't talking about black individuals, but the black community. And as Michael Eric Dyson said in a recent speech, "[Kanye West] wasn't talking about George Bush, the individual ... He's speaking about George Bush, the face of the government."

In this sense, Kanye West is right. If George Bush and our government cared about black communities we would see efforts to improve the endemic problems. We would see real initiatives to address the hideous public school system, the lack of employment opportunities, inadequate housing and medical care. If our government cared, it would not ignore places like Ward 9 in New Orleans or Roxbury, Massachusetts.

If our government cared, it would reverse the racist "war on drugs" and stop condoning police brutality. It would also ensure that blacks are not disenfranchised for the next presidential election, as they were in the past two.

With all of the persistent problems in black communities and in the wake of the response to Hurricane Katrina, it's no wonder that President Bush's approval rating among African-Americans is 2 percent. This statistic is not just an indictment of George Bush, but an indictment of government in general.

Shortly before his assassination, Martin Luther King Jr. increasingly spoke of the need for economic justice. He understood that economic justice was essential to attain political and social justice. He realized the poor and middle-class whites had more in common with blacks than they did with rich whites. This is even truer today, but we still remain divided by race.

Hopefully white people will realize that George Bush and the government don't care about them either, unless you happen to be part of that tiny corporate upper class that benefits from government policies.

Poor white communities suffer from similar problems of poor education, lack of medical care and crime. Problems have only been exacerbated by stagnating and declining wages and neglect for social programs affecting all poor and middle-class communities.

It's time we had a real discussion about race in America and the obscenity before us in New Orleans. Perhaps working Americans will see that the struggle for justice in New Orleans and in black communities across the country is part of the larger struggle for most Americans.

Apple proves to be an 'Extraordinary Machine'

By Carly Zigoris

Fiona Apple

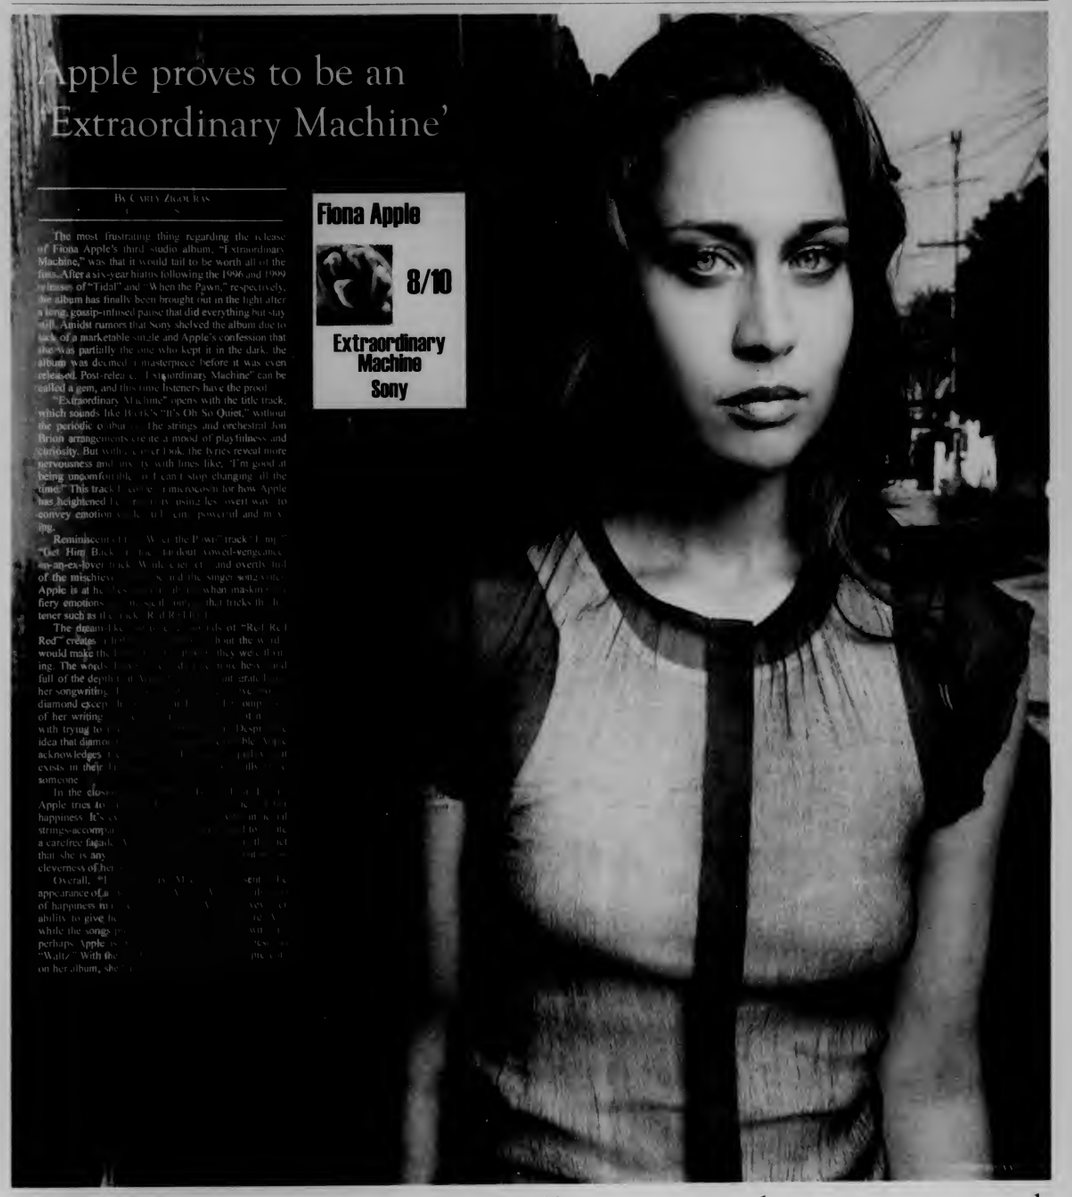
Extraordinary Machine
Sony

The most frustrating thing regarding the release of Fiona Apple's third studio album, "Extraordinary Machine," was that it would fail to be worth all of the fuss. After a six-year hiatus following the 1996 and 1999 releases of "Tidal" and "When the Pawn," respectively, the album has finally been brought out in the light after a long, gossip-infused pause that did everything but stay still. Amidst rumors that Sony shelved the album due to lack of a marketable single and Apple's confession that she was partially the one who kept it in the dark, the album was deemed a masterpiece before it was even released. Post-release, "Extraordinary Machine" can be called a gem, and this time listeners have the proof.



"Extraordinary Machine" opens with the title track, which sounds like Beck's "It's Oh So Quiet," without the periodic outbursts. The strings and orchestral Jon Brion arrangements create a mood of playfulness and curiosity. But with closer look, the lyrics reveal more nervousness and unsteadiness with lines like, "I'm good at being unconfirmable, so I can't stop changing all the time." This track is a microcosm for how Apple has heightened her artistry using less overt ways to convey emotion such as full, powerful and mysterious.

Reminiscent of "Sleep to Dream" and "Criminal" is "Get Him Back," a track about vowed vengeance on an ex-lover. With clever and overtly full of the mischievous and the singer sounds Apple is at her [illegible] when masking fiery emotions in [illegible] that tricks the listener such as the track "Red Red Red."

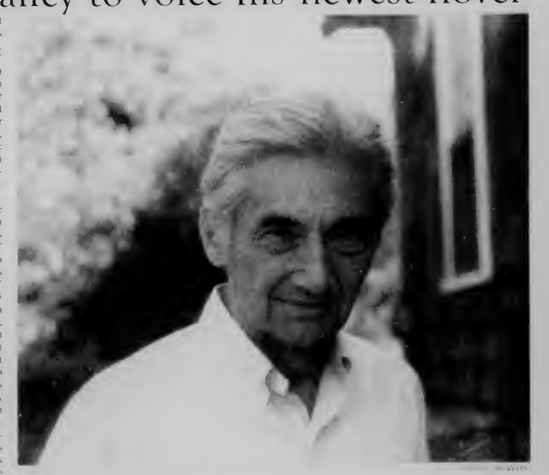
Howard Zinn comes to the Valley to voice his newest novel

By Jerome Yuan

Collegian Correspondent



"Read 'People's History of the United States', that book will f-n blow your mind," says Matt Damon's character Will Hunting in "Good Will Hunting" about Howard Zinn's most popular book. If it seems random to some why Matt Damon made such a strong recommendation of Zinn's book, it shouldn't. Zinn, along with Noam Chomsky, mentioned in the next line of the movie, is perhaps one of the most well-known left-leaning progressives in the United States, having published over 15 books, pamphlets, and plays on a diverse array of political issues. It also helps that Damon and Zinn were neighbors in West Newton, Massachusetts.) Now in his 80s, Zinn continues to be a fervent advocate of progressive causes, giving speaking engagements and continuing to publish works critical of things such as U.S. foreign policy. On Tuesday, Oct. 18, residents of the five-college area will be able to see Howard Zinn narrate scripted dramatic readings from his recent release, "Voices of a People's History of the United States" at Mount Holyoke College.

Howard Zinn
Chapin Auditorium
Mount Holyoke
Oct. 18

Zinn's political opinions and published writings are not just based on research, but were also greatly influenced by his own personal life experiences. Coming from a blue-collar Brooklyn family, Zinn worked in labor organizing at Brooklyn shipyards and served as a World War II B-17 bombardier in the European campaign. His experience in war prompted him to question the tactics of war and the decision to bomb civilian targets, tactics which he says the United States continues to use to this day, an idea which he cites in many of his writings and pamphlets.

In the '50s and early '60s, Zinn served as chairman of the department of history at Spelman College, one of the schools that make up the historically black colleges of the Atlanta University Center. During this time, Zinn participated in the growing Civil Rights movement in the United States, eventually getting fired from his position for siding with students on an issue at odds with school administration. It was during this time that Zinn was involved with one of the more known civil rights groups of the era, SNCC (Student Non-violent Coordination Committee), and it was also this time Zinn saw as some of the most "interesting, exciting, and educational years" of his life. Zinn was hired as a professor at Boston University in 1964 (where he is now Professor Emeritus) and also took part in garnering public support for the end of the Vietnam War, including making a diplomatic trip to Hanoi to meet with North Vietnamese leaders which resulted in the release of three U.S. prisoners of war.

Zinn's narrative performance on Tuesday, Oct. 18 will be from his book "Voices of a People's History of the United States," which is considered a companion piece to Zinn's popular "People's History of the United States," which is now updated for a 2005 edition. The show will feature a cast of local actors and activists, as well as New York actor Brian Jones and South African poet Dennis Brutus, and the script uses historical texts tailored to meet the Western Massachusetts locale (such as Frederick Douglass's meeting with John Brown in Springfield). The performance is free and is in support of Western Massachusetts Jobs With Justice. So students and residents of the five-college area can go and see if their minds really do get blown.

Historian, playwright and social activist, Howard Zinn has recently released his book "Voices of a People's History of the United States."

'Elizabethtown' lacks emotion and smart dialogue

By Jake Mosti
Collegian Correspondent

Maybe looks really are everything, because Orlando Bloom can't play depression. In fact, Orlando Bloom has trouble registering any emotion at all. His facial muscles don't move. The throngs of females who go crazy over his presence are enough for box-office receipts. But as a male who couldn't care less about his looks, Bloom just doesn't do it for me. In his latest film "Elizabethtown," Bloom's character tells us, after losing close to a billion dollars from a shoe company he works for, "There's a difference between a failure and a fiasco." I'll say. For Bloom, his performance is no fiasco. But it treads the line and comes dangerously close to being a failure.

'Elizabeth-town'
Directed by Cameron Crown
Paramount
Rated PG-13
123 mins.
Grade C+

Bloom was a real overnight success. He auditioned for "Lord of The Rings" while he was still in high school. Then he got a call saying he got the part of Legolas, and a star was born. So, unlike other actors, who had to work at it for years and years, Bloom never really had to gain a good track record before becoming a star. Now, he just coasts along making millions.

In "Elizabethtown," Bloom plays Drew Baylor, who has recently lost 972 million dollars for his company – a complete and utter fiasco – and is ready to kill himself. As he walks through the building on his way to see his boss, played by Alec Baldwin, for the last time,

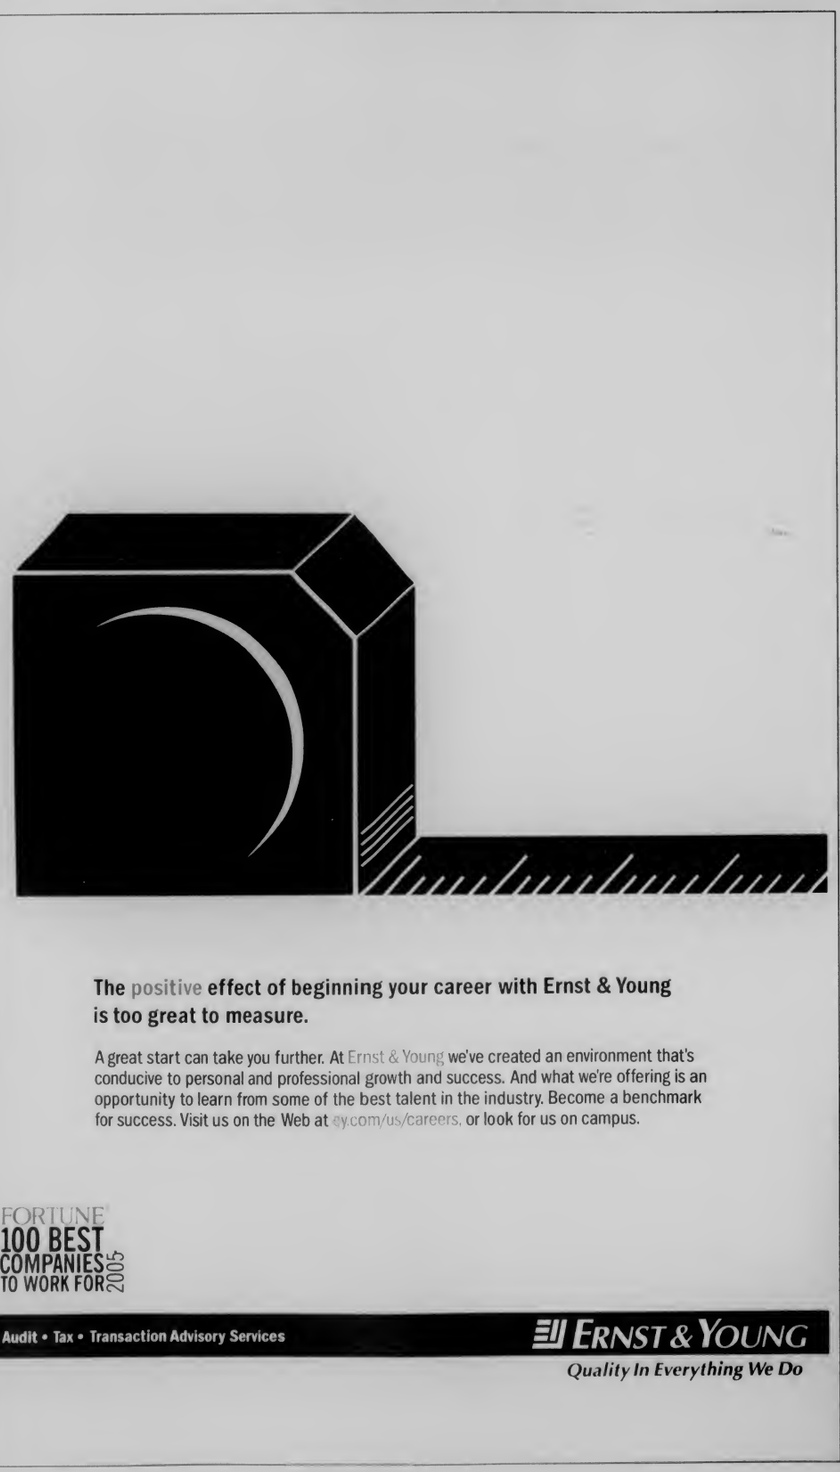
Wallace & Gromit return

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Correspondent

Vegetables have never looked as appealing as they do in plasticine. Though one may ask why a veggie-lover would find delight in the new "claymation" stop motion-picture of Nick Park and Steve Box, the collage of colorful roughage combined with the doughy characters of Wallace and Gromit's world bring a new light to the feeling of sensation through expression. The lively simulation of cobblestone streets, creaky garden gates, and wart-ridden peasants provide an eye-pleasing adventure with cheerful humor to boot.



It's true, our friends wacky Wallace the inventor and his faithful dog Gromit are back with a feature film following three already divine short films. The master and dog pair now run the Anti-Pesto pest-control company, specializing in its ability to humanely and efficiently capture pesky rabbits. The floppy little devils have been ravaging gardens days before the 517th-annual Vegetable Competition, an event with which each and every villager is obsessed. The pest control is going fine, thanks to Wallace's newest invention, the Bun-Vac, which creatively suctions the furry little demons from their stomping grounds into a giant air chamber. But, after an experiment with Wallace's new mind-manipulation machine goes wrong, the pair is faced with the biggest challenge the garden community has ever known. They must find and capture the Were-Rabbit, a gigantic veggie-munching beast who by night makes hors d'oeuvres of whole pumpkins and cabbage patches. Along the way we run into some mild suspense and a touch of trite British romance thanks to Wallace's love interest in the sweet Lady Tottington, a fellow bunny lover and veggie-connoisseur.

The voice talents of Peter Sallis and Helena Bonham create exaggerated personalities that make the characters loveable, but at the same time slightly predictable. However, simple the plot may be, it seems to serve as a basic structure around which the style and aesthetic success of the film is formed.

The humble pooch's brow dances alongside Wallace's silly inventions and mild-mannerisms; one might go as far as saying Gromit's face does a more effective job of conveying emotion than many of Hollywood's flesh-fitted actors. Although almost everything in this film is made distinct by its animator's sharp attention to detail. Even the over-sized carrots with their soil-kissed ripples display as much of a natural and realistic appearance as one you'd find lying in the produce aisle. One thing's for sure: you will go home with a craving for some fresh-grown celery and a little asparagus because this movie makes them look like so much fun.

"The Curse of the Were-Rabbit" is fantastic with discrete and clever innuendo-type wit, which is sprinkled amongst the foolish but (I have to say it) cute humor. Kudos to the writers for taking advantage of the garden-variety produce humor, i.e. who's got the biggest melons, this product may contain nuts, etc. Adults can expect to sneak a few snickers along with the kiddies.

The award-winning half-hour shorts that previously won Wallace and Gromit's recognition are "A Grand Day Out" (1989), "The Wrong Trousers" (1993) and "A Close Shave" (1995). These masterpieces were not created via the same computer graphic techniques sweeping the animation spectrum, but instead employ tedious frame-by-frame shooting, a feat which took the "Were-Rabbit" creators five years to complete.

The GO! Team

4.5/10

Thunder, Lightning, Strike
Columbia

The latest rendition of the British invasion is going strong; 42 years after the Beatles came across the pond, no less. More and more bands are being signed in America every day. Some of these bands come with more hype then one can swallow, but a very few of these bands deserve the hype.

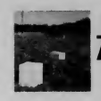
Unfortunately, The GO! Team is one of those unbearable types. Press from Pitchfork Media to the New Yorker is raving about this band, making absurd sound comparisons.

They compare the band to Belle and Sebastian and The Jackson 5, but they sound nothing like either band. In reality they sound like a halftime act for a football game down at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

With The GO! Team performing, we won't need a marching band or any cheerleaders since their songs already incorporate such things. The band's line up is a coed six piece, a nice size for a small cheerleading squad.

Throughout the album there are no rock vocals. In fact, there are no rap vocals, either. During the occasional song a cheerleading squad sample can be heard with the music.

The rest of the band's music is just like if six people came and played their instruments for different songs at the same time – it is too loud to hear whatever vocals are used when they are being used. The album is mostly instrumental.



Having established that the album is mostly instrumental, the next logical question for a listener or reviewer should be, "Can you dance to it?"

The answer should be a yes, but once again the band is a let-down and the answer is no, you cannot dance to this music. The beat is difficult to find – if there is one behind all the noise.

The only track on the entire album that is worth listening to is "Hold Yr Terror Close," and coincidentally the track is one of the shortest on the entire album.

In conclusion, The GO! Team is just a very overrated band with too much hype making Pitchfork Media happy by making a sound that's not a dime a dozen – unless it's on their site, then it is a dime a dozen.

The Caribbean

7.7/10

Plastic Exposure
Hometapes

There is a cliché in rock and roll that says that if you're rock 'n roll, you're too cool to be a businessman working for the man – or at least there used to be.

The band The Caribbean broke this cliché because they like to represent themselves as if they are a corporation. On their Web site each band member has a profile and a label ranging from CEO for Content Development to Director of Programming. With each member's corporate label are their photographs in a suit and most of the members have a funny little fake biography.

With this said, it is obvious that The Caribbean take themselves very serious as a band, but not as a rock 'n roll band.

The band is really much more of a pop-rock band in a very positive way – pop is not a four letter word if in positive context.

This is proven by listening to their latest release, "Plastic Explosives," their third release in three years. This feat that should not go unnoticed when it takes bands like Coldplay 18 months to record their third album, which coincidentally sounds very similar to their last two. Perhaps it is because The Caribbean do not have the money or the time to take 18 months in the studio, but they don't need to anyway tactually (oldplay doesn't either, but back to the topic).

Throughout "Plastic Explosives" there is subtle pop music with simple lyrics and quiet singing. There is also a good amount of variety of texture throughout the album so it takes a while for it to get stale. There is even a harmonica on some tracks, which is always a nice addition to quiet pop music.

A unique aspect of the album is the total number of tracks the album has 18 songs. However, not all 18 have lyrics, around a third of the album is instrumental songs, which creates a beautiful pause between stories in the lyrics.

Whether you work for the man or just want good music, "Plastic Explosives" by The Caribbean is definitely an album worth checking out and listening to.

Gutter Phenomenon
Ferret

Search the words die, dying, death and dead at www.interpunk.com and you will find over 25 results for bands using any of those four words in their name. With that said, our society is just as obsessed with death when it's not Halloween as Emily Dickinson was.

The band Every Time I Die has released a new album called "Gutter Phenomenon." iTunes likes to label this band as metal, but they are wrong. To anyone with iTunes, that cannot come as too much of a surprise.

However, "Gutter Phenomenon" is full of a fast hard-rock sound. Some vocals are screamed and not sung, although there are a few breakdowns with melodic singing. Ladies and gentlemen "Gutter Phenomenon" is a post-hardcore album.

"Gutter Phenomenon" is a reference to the old rock 'n roll of the '50s/'60s when it was the only alternative. Nowadays we have many alternatives and some of them are not even really alternative.

A brief music lesson: hardcore went underground when pop punk came to fame and emo (well, the real emo) died out. Since emo has become a media label and no longer a genre, hardcore is back and they are playing faster and angrier then ever.

Every Time I Die is just like all other hardcore acts out there today. Maybe their lyrics are different, but that's it. They sing, they yell, they play their instruments fast, they get political, and they bore.

Al Pacino and Matthew McConaughey not worth the money

By Rich Lombard
Collegian Correspondent

When you see a film with Al Pacino, regardless of the script, you count on a good performance and something worth watching; something worth your money and your time. Contrary to Pacino is his co-star in the new film "Two for the Money", Matthew McConaughey, whose worth is usually measured in how fast he can melt a woman's heart by taking off his shirt and smiling. Regardless, with a new movie comes a clean slate and an opportunity for both actors to sink or swim. Under the direction of D.J. Caruso (the hands behind scattered television episodes in series such as "The Shield," "Smallville" and "Dark Angel"), Pacino and McConaughey both give descent performances as men who gamble with their lives on a daily basis, making every decision into games decided by chance.

'Two for the Money'
Directed D.J. Caruso
Universal
Rated R
122 mins.

McConaughey's character Brandon Lang is an ex-college football star that runs his own phone hotline, charging gamblers for his picks in upcoming football games. Due to his passion and knowledge of the game, Brandon proves to be a natural at picking winners and is quickly discovered by one of the country's most powerful bookies, Walter Abrams (Pacino). Walter quickly realizes how he and Brandon's similar trait is their passion for winning and uses this as a tool to try and transform him from a hardworking, loyal, small town kid to a power hungry businessman, even going as far as to change his name to John Anthony. The success of the duo's business reaches its zenith after Brandon picks the winners of all 14 pro football games on a given weekend and makes the company millions in commissions. Quickly following the height of their success, the company, along with the lives of the men who run it, swirls down the inevitable toilet of gambling.

While the storyline is an obvious one to predict, the irony of the characters' gambling does make the film interesting. Although Walter and Brandon boast the fact that they do not gamble on sports and do not have a gambling problem, both of them actually base their entire lives on chance. Brandon's fame and fortune has been based solely on whether the teams he picks wins or loses, while Walter's wealth is dependent on Brandon's choices.

Pacino's performance was sub-par for his standards while McConaughey performed better then usual, but not without the many unnecessary, inevitable shots of him working out and flaunting his guns. Both characters never really change or develop, which somewhat worked as a mechanism. As Walter and Brandon's careers skyrocketed, they could not change or develop because of the inevitable loss they would quickly face, bringing them back to start. It was as if they were trying to win a race by taking one step forward then one step back, which makes the statement that you get nowhere by gambling.

McConaughey never got to the point where the money and fame really went to his head and ruined his career as most stories of this plotline go, which was interesting and new. He definitely proved to be better than the actor we saw in gems such as "The Wedding Planner" and "How to Lose a Guy in 10 Days," despite the many eye-candy shots.

Despite the average acting and somewhat predictable storyline, the movie was shot well and flowed nicely, making it at least easy to watch. The complexity of the characters' gambling problems were interesting but got out of hand towards the end of the film. This movie isn't a must see, but it does show the ups and downs of a gamblers life and how quickly things can get out of hand when you base your life solely on chance.

Poor performance for Bloom

Drew tells everyone he sees, "I'm fine," saying it close to twenty times. This part of the film feels artificial and uninspired. Bloom isn't interesting enough to watch tumble downhill and the dialogue doesn't help. Drew gets home and rigs a knife onto a piece of exercise equipment so that it will stab him as the machine propels him into the knife, but he gets a call from his sister telling him his dad has died. So Drew has to postpone suicide and travel to Elizabethtown to make funeral arrangements. On the plane ride there, Drew meets a female flight attendant played by Kirsten Dunst. She calls him and they have an all-night conversation. The rest of the film is a romantic comedy where Bloom finds a way to rise above the fiasco that will be all over the news in a few days.

Elizabethtown is a Cameron Crowe film. After directing "Jerry Maguire," he must have wondered how he could top himself. He went the route of originality, making "Vanilla Sky" and "Almost Famous." Had he made "Elizabethtown" after "Jerry Maguire" he would have turned into a caricature of himself, because "Elizabethtown" is essentially the same movie as "Jerry Maguire" – similar premise, and the exact same themes. But I suppose there has been a sufficient grace period to allow a film that reminds us of the "holding onto the bottom rung, finding your heart and triumphing over failure"-formula Cameron Crowe movie.

After that initial period of "I'm fine" from Bloom, the film gets better. What brings this film to life is the soundtrack. It's Cameron Crowe's specialty. He knows how to engage an audience through music. Orlando and Dunst can't bring this film to life on their own. The soundtrack can, however. So watching the film is essentially like listening to the radio, only there is a bunch of mildly interesting images to watch with it. For some this might be enough to make the film an enjoyable experience. It was for me. But the numerous bad dialogue lines like, "Ya know, you're pretty great Claire," are sometimes too apparent. "Elizabethtown" is mediocre. It lacks the original spark of "Jerry Maguire" and feels like a wannabe follow-up performance. Were it not for the mistaken casting of Bloom, the film might connect with the audience in the way that Tom Cruise did, making us all empathize with him and feel the depression of falling down. But Orlando Bloom's lackluster acting just isn't up to movie star par.

They are probably one of the most mature returning teams. They're the same team from last year that went to the NCAAs. Considering all those things, it wasn't too bad, but we're at the point now where we can't afford losses."

Early in the game it seemed that the Minutewomen would be able to pull off their second upset of the weekend, as they weren't giving up many scoring opportunities and had a few scoring chances of their own.

But the tides seemed to change late in the half, as two-thirds of the starting defense for UMass went down with injuries in a five-minute span. Senior co-captain Amy Maffucci and junior Stephanie Barrett both left the game, and while both returned in the second half, Rudy said they were only able to go at "half-speed."

Playing with a dinged-up backline and clearly worn-down from Friday's game, the Minutewomen couldn't stop the relentless St. Louis attack, which finally broke through with Sweeney's goal.

Senior forward Adair Blyler and UMass split two games this weekend against Atlantic 10 opponents. The Minutewomen are 6-7-1 this season.

Things were much different on Friday, as UMass played its best game of the year, completely dominating Duquesne at home.

The Dukes (9-3-1 4-2-0 A-10) weren't able to match UMass' intensity, and despite the sloppy playing conditions, the Minutewoman offensive attack was sharp, scoring early and often.

Senior Tiffany Hamill got UMass on the board just over six minutes into the game with her first career goal. Hamill couldn't have picked a much better way to get her first career goal, as she tucked a beautiful shot from 15 yards out into the top right corner of the net. Senior Adair Blyler and freshman Vanessa Patry picked up assists on the play.

Both teams went scoreless for the rest of the half, but UMass controlled the action. In the second half, UMass put the game away with a flurry of goals in a six-minute span.

The first goal of the half was scored six minutes in by sophomore Britt Canfield, who used her trademark speed to blow past three defenders and break in all alone with the keeper. The goalie came out to challenge, but Canfield dribbled past her and deposited the ball in the empty net.

Sophomore forward Vanessa Lima put the game away for UMass scoring two goals in just over three minutes. Lima's first goal was set up by Bellini on a great pass that got through the defense, and when the goalie came out, Lima beat her to the ball and slid a shot just inside the left post.

Lima's second goal came off of another nice pass, this time from Patry, as the goalie came out once again, and Lima was able to chip a shot over her and into the goal.

LaSalle 10-2, and having the advantage in penalty corners 4-0.

La Salle scored its only goal halfway through the second half when senior Emily Simone cut the UMass lead to two goals. The Minutewomen put the game out of reach with 1:30 left in regulation when sophomore Erin O'Brien scored on a penalty stroke to give UMass a 4-1 lead.

The biggest story of the game, however, was not UMass' offense. It was the new goalkeeper for the Minutewomen. Senior Heather Ryan made her second collegiate appearance, and her first collegiate start in goal. Ryan knotted four saves in the UMass win.

The senior goaltender was ready to get the start, and with a little help from her teammates up front, she wasn't feeling any pressure.

"I went right in there feeling comfortable," Ryan said. "We just kept pushing up the field, and the pressure was up the other end for most of the game. They took the nerves right out of me."

Shea knows how important it is to have experience and depth in A-10 play, and that is why she made the goaltender switch.

"When you are in conferncne play you never know what is going to happen," Shea said. "We have to have the ability to make sure everybody has game experience, and within the goalkeeper area, that is very important. We have to get them in a situation where they are prepared to go in at any time."

The Minutewomen gathered their third consecutive win on Senior Day on Sunday when they defeated West Chester 4-0 at Garber Field. UMass had a pregame ceremony to honor the seniors and then went out and recorded its first shutout of the season in the victory over the Golden Rams.

Courtesy UMass Media Relations

Freshman forward Katelyn Orlando and UMass beat LaSalle 4-1 on Friday and West Chester 4-0 on Sunday to improve its record to 6-9.

The Maroon and White once again wasted no time getting on the board, as senior Jaime Bawden scored her first goal of the season on a penalty corner 8:10 into the game. The score remained 1-0 at the half, with UMass having a slight edge in shots at 6-5.

The Minutewomen opened it up the second half with three goals in the first 10 minutes. Senior Patricia Borneo scored her third goal of the season when she made a nice tip into the net following a penalty corner. Less than three minutes later, Parker made some nice moves in the circle to dish the ball off to sophomore Kara Murphy, who gave the Minutewomen a 3-0 lead. Parker then scored a goal of her own less than seven minutes later when she received a pass from sophomore Rachael Mervine.

UMass out-shot West Chester 12-10, but both teams had six penalty corners in the contest.

The Minutewomen have been extremely successful in conference play thus far, and Shea is proud of her players for keeping their composure throughout the season.

"They have done a great job," Shea said. "They stayed focused, and they knew that when they came back to conference play, that was our real season. When you have some of the heart-breaking losses that we had, it is really easy to lose your focus, but they've continued to believe in themselves and in the program."

Bruschi to return to the field eight months after mild stroke

The linebacker made his first Pro Bowl appearance in February, but was hospitalized three days later after complaining of numbness in his left arm and left leg. In March, he underwent surgery to repair a small hole in his heart.

The 32-year-old Bruschi had said as recently as last month that he would not play this season. But he has been working out in the Patriots' weight room, attending team meetings and standing on the sideline at home games.

"It was a traumatic experience," he said. "It's a long road back. So I'm not going to jump back in unless I'm absolutely 100 percent positive I'm ready. And I am."

An emotional player with a knack for being in the right spot on the field, Bruschi is in his fourth season as a defensive captain.

The Patriots drafted Bruschi in 1996 in the third round out of Arizona and he became a full-time starter in 1999.

He was second on the team in tackles last year, when the Patriots allowed the third fewest points in the NFL and won their second straight Super Bowl.

day, which was way too late for Wie to make any remedy.

"I thought about it more and was just uncomfortable that I knew something," Bamberger said. "Integrity is at the heart of the game. I don't think she cheated. I think she was just hasty."

Being hasty, of course, is part of being a 16-year-old, which is part of the reason the LPGA Tour has a rule that you have to be 18 before you can become a full-time touring pro. Wie's caddie even warned her before she took the drop that she had to be careful not to drop the ball any closer to the hole.

But the moral arbiters of the game aren't writers who think they see something, or fans who call in after seeing what they believe are wrongs committed on TV. They're the players themselves, who are ultimately responsible for policing themselves in the one sport where players call penalties on themselves.

That's what happened in Las Vegas on Sunday when Kevin Stadler was disqualified after informing a rules official that he had an illegal club in his bag – a wedge with a damaged shaft. Stadler was tied for fifth place and looking at a big chunk of change, but like Wie, ended up going home empty-handed.

Wie made a bad drop, but you could blame that on the fact that she's 16 and probably studies fashion magazines more closely than rule books. You could also blame playing partner Grace Park, who should have been watching but was apparently too preoccupied with her own game at the time.

So Wie learned a $53,126 lesson and something probably just as valuable – don't always trust the press.

In the long term, it's a mere hiccup in a career that will likely earn her untold millions. Wie already had $10 million in the bank even before celebrating her Sweet 16th last Tuesday – thanks to lucrative sponsor deals with Nike and Sony.

Still, it would have been nice to frame that first check and put it in the trophy case. It would have been nice to buy the girls she hangs out with at Punahou School in Honolulu lunch this week and tell them it came from her first winnings playing golf.

Instead, she walked out of the press tent surrounded by her parents and the rest of her support group. She got in a golf cart with her mother and father, and likely had a good cry.

It wasn't the way the teenager with the dangling earrings dreamed the week would end.

"I'm pretty sad, but, you know, I think I'm going to get over it," Wie said.

NFL coaches face health issues

By Randy Cortez
Knight Ridder

At the start of every football season, Washington coach Joe Gibbs and his wife, Pat, share the same joke. Only it's not a laughing matter.

"She says, 'Well, you're going to prison for four months,'" Gibbs said. "It's pretty much every day, I'm locked away someplace."

Eventually, the stress of being confined to an office, film room and practice field for 18 hours a day led to health issues and forced Gibbs, a Hall of Fame coach with three Super Bowl rings, out of football and to another pressure-packed occupation: running a NASCAR team.

Gibbs ended his 11-year absence from football and rejoined Washington last year. And like many coaches around the league, he reevaluated his profession's risky lifestyle of existing on too much caffeine, nicotine, junk food and too little sleep and exercise after St. Louis Rams coach Mike Martz was hospitalized last week with a serious bacterial infection in his heart valve known as endocarditis.

Martz's illness could have happened to anyone in any profession. The bacteria could have developed during a simple teeth cleaning, hospital examination or from gristle from a steak that got embedded in a tooth.

But Martz's insistence on coaching last week, even after missing practice time while feeling ill, could have exacerbated his condition and could have been life-threatening. Now, he'll be out for at least six weeks.

"Coaches don't want to take a day off work," said Chiefs offensive coordinator Al Saunders, who's in his Arrowhead Stadium office around the clock. "They can't afford to. The other guys aren't."

Gibbs, 64, has battled through several health issues. In May he had a wire-mesh stent implanted in his heart because of a blocked artery. Gibbs is a diabetic, and in February 2004, while recruiting free-agent quarterback Mark Brunell, he ended up in the hospital because of insulin imbalance.

"There's a real risk here in coaching," Gibbs said. "We want Coach Martz back ... this guy is a big part of this league. We need to get him back healthy. He's done the right thing stepping out.

"The danger is, it's not just yourself, but so many people count on you. The coaching staff, the fans, and the front office and the owner, and you carry that burden with you, and so what happens is you push harder and harder. You add [a responsibility] this week, and two or three weeks later you add something else, and the next thing you know, you're talking about 18 to 20 days, and there's a danger in that, as we all know.

"It's hard to keep the balance. You're supposed to be winning games."

NFL coaches can take advantage of weight rooms filled with workout equipment and staffed by trainers and team doctors who can help them stay fit. Saunders is a dedicated distance runner and finds time before meetings or after practice to run the grounds around the sports complex. Head coach Dick Vermeil, 68, who coined the term "burnout" when he left the Philadelphia Eagles after the 1982 season, hops on the treadmill after practices.

"There is probably less illness and sickness among coaches," Saunders said. "I don't know of very many coaches that miss any time at all. I think they have a better resiliency and a better way of battling through things like [illness] than maybe the general public."

Sometimes, however, coaches work needlessly – and foolishly – and put their health in peril.

Seattle defensive coordinator Ray Rhodes had suffered from numbness in his hand, blurred vision in his eye and a loss of equilibrium before he determined something was seriously wrong early last month. Rhodes, 55, had suffered a stroke.

"I'm thinking I slept on my arm a little bit so I'm not making a big deal out of it," said Rhodes, a former head coach in Green Bay and Philadelphia. "I do keep a lot of things in, but after a while, it was very obvious to me that something was wrong. So I talked to my wife, and I let her know that something was going on and to take me to the hospital."

Doctors told Rhodes to work less and sleep more. And he had to give up the smokeless tobacco that he chewed for years.

Unfortunately, the calendar can be unrelenting for a coach.

"The season is tough, but you have slow down when you can," said Indianapolis coach Tony Dungy. "That's not always possible. We had a stretch, I think we had four games in 18 days last year, and there are times that you are going to be on that merry-go-round. But the times that you can, you have to make yourself get away from it as much as you can, and that's not always easy."

Even before this season, Martz, 54, has been nagged by health problems. He had neck surgery shortly after joining the Rams as offensive coordinator in 1999, and he had complicated back surgery last offseason and resumed a full workload against doctors' advice.

Martz was in visible pain during the Rams' loss at the New York Giants on Oct. 2 and was hooked up to an IV before coaching in last week's loss to Seattle. After that game, he said he probably shouldn't have been on the sidelines.

"I talked to him two weeks ago, and he was struggling, but he was coaching," said Vermeil, who hired Martz in St. Louis. "My advice to him is listen to the doctors. A lot of coaches are not real good at doing that.

"The pressure of the job has nothing to with him getting an infection. But it can slow down the healing process if he stays under the gun."

Minutewomen split weekend

By DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team played its most complete game of the season in a 4-0 trouncing of Duquesne on Friday, but was unable to duplicate the performance in Sunday's 1-0 loss to Saint Louis.

The split with two Atlantic 10 foes left UMass with a 3-2 conference record (6-7-1 overall), which is good for fifth in the league standings. The Minutewomen will look to bolster their conference record next weekend when they hit the road for a pair of games against A-10 opponents George Washington and LaSalle.

In Sunday's game at home against St. Louis (11-3 6-0 A-10), UMass played the top team in the league even for much of the contest, but fell as a result of one goal off of a corner kick.

The goal came with 20:45 remaining in the game and was scored by forward Caroline Sweeney off of a perfect corner kick by Courtney Hulcer.

UMass was unable to muster a serious scoring chance after the goal, and showed some fatigue from playing Friday's game in a driving rainstorm on a drenched Rudd Field.

On the other hand, St. Louis seemed to benefit from having its game Friday at Rhode Island postponed due to unplayable field conditions, as the more rested Billikens dominated the second half, out-shooting UMass 7-1.

Despite being at this disadvantage, senior co-captain Lindsey Bellini wasn't making any excuses for the Minutewomen's performance.

"We came out looking like we were dead and it stayed with us the whole game," Bellini said. "We just couldn't get any momentum going. It didn't look like anyone really showed up to play."

UMass coach Jim Rudy felt that fatigue may have caught up with his team, and that against an experienced team like St. Louis the Minutewomen didn't have much room for error.

"We hit a wall around halftime and we didn't have the same zip," Rudy said. "But we played 90 minutes in the rain Friday, and they were able to rest for four days.

Sophomore forward Vanessa Lima scored two goals in a 4-0 win over Duquesne on Friday, bringing her team-leading total to four. Lima and UMass were blanked in a 1-0 loss Sunday to Saint Louis.

UMass wins two pivotal contests

The Massachusetts field hockey team won a pair of games over the weekend, improving its conference record to 3-1. The Minutewomen dominated two of their Atlantic 10 rivals in a pivotal weekend at Garber Field.

The Minutewomen will be back in action at 5 p.m. tomorrow, as they face-off against Dartmouth in a non-conference game at home.

UMass (6-9 3-1 A-10) defeated La Salle (3-12 1-2 A-10) by a score of 4-1 on Friday afternoon in terrible weather conditions. The rain was coming down hard and the play was physical, but that did not stop the Minutewomen from an offensive outburst. UMass scored three goals in the first half and added another in the second, giving the Maroon and White its second conference win of the season.

Freshman forward Erin Parker made a nice pass to freshman forward Katelyn Orlando, who scored on a one-timer 4:52 into the game. The freshman scored her team-leading fifth goal of the season to put UMass on the board right away. The Minutewomen did not stop there, as they scored two more before the half, getting goals from juniors Gina Sanders and Kwylan Jaggassar.

Coach Patty Shea knew that getting on the board early was a big key to coming out on top this weekend, and her team did not disappoint.

"It was huge," Shea said. "We've been digging out of a hole in many of our games. We need to turn that around, and we need to make other teams come from behind. Those early goals gave them the confidence to do what they needed to do. And after we scored, we continued to play to win, and that was really important."

UM swim teams start strong

The Massachusetts men's and women's swim teams got their feet wet in a preseason meet this weekend as they competed in UConn Invitational.

The men's squad is coming off of an undefeated season where they capped off their fifth straight Atlantic 10 Championship. The women's team is coming off a third place finish at the A-10 Championships.

The incoming class for the men's team got their first chance to show off their skills in collegiate competition, and they were quite impressive. Freshman Brad Sloan led the Maroon and White, winning the 500-yard freestyle and placing fourth in the 400-yard individual medley.

The Minutemen will open their season in two weeks when they host Stony Brook on Oct. 29 at the Joseph Rogers pool located in Boyden Gym at 1:00 p.m.

"We basically did what we wanted to do – get them into competition," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "We weren't that fast, but that wasn't the objective."

Placing second in the 200-yard butterfly and fourth in the 100-yard butterfly for the Minutemen was freshman Tristan Partridge. Another impressive freshman performance was Nate Bromage who finished third in the 200-yard fly, second in the 100-yard fly and ninth in the 50-yard free.

To round out the Minutemen's top performers was tri-captain Greg Chartier who placed third in the 200-yard free, fourth in the 500-yard free and sixth in the 50-yard free.

"We'll take a little different approach in two weeks, and we'll be ready for them [Stony Brook]," Yarworth said. "We've got heavy weeks of training ahead."

Leading the Minutewomen was freshman Christa Narus, who won the 200-yard individual medley.

"She had a good meet; a real good first collegiate meet," UMass coach Bob Newcomb. "Another freshman, Taryn Prout, had a real good first collegiate swim as well. I learned a lot about the freshman this meet, and am very pleased with the freshman class so far."

Prout finished third in both the 200-yard free and the 1,000-yard free to lead the Maroon and White in those events. Another notable performance in this preseason meet was from junior Nicole LeBarge who placed second in the 50-yard free, third in the 100-yard free and fifth in the 200-yard free.

The Minutewomen will also open their season on Oct. 29 when they host Stony Brook at the Joseph Rogers pool at 1:00 p.m.

"It worked out the way we hoped," Newcomb said. "They swam really well for this early in the season. We have a promising season up ahead, but we still have a lot of work to do."

Last year's UMass Rookie of the Year, sophomore Sam Demity, rounded out the Minutewomen's top performers as she earned a fourth-place finish in the 100-yard fly and a sixth-place spot in the 200-yard fly.

"I think one of the big things to see after this first meet is how we react after the meet by supporting each other, and patting each other on back after swims," Newcomb said. "I'm really impressed with the group as a whole, they've got a great attitude, and that makes me have a good feeling towards season."

O'Brien proud of performance

By DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts men's cross-country team finished 27th out of 37 teams at the Penn State Invitational on Saturday. The order of finishes for UMass was: sophomore Nils Fischer (121st), senior Sean Corbett (124th), senior Ryan Corbett (146th), freshman Jesse Regnier (160th), junior Michael Dulong (176th), senior Jonathan Korhonen (202nd) and senior Andy McCarron (219th).

The race, which featured a total of 306 runners, consisted of 19 teams that were ranked in the top five of their districts by the NCAA. UMass coach Ken O'Brien, now in his 36th season with the team, was proud of the runners' performances.

"We stayed very close as a group," O'Brien said. "We maintained good position with the other runners, but we just needed one or two of our kids to break out of the pack. So, I suppose you could say that we met one goal, but fell short on another."

O'Brien added that he felt Junior Michael Dulong had an outstanding race due to his tough, gritty effort to come in the team's fifth spot. The race was made up of two 18-hole golf courses adjacent to each other, and O'Brien commented that the heavy rainfall the past week and the course's gradual uphill and downhill terrain made it "very difficult" for all of the runners, but gave the event "true invitational style." Martin Fagan, a senior at Providence, finished in first place with a time of 24:56, the second fastest time ever run on the course.

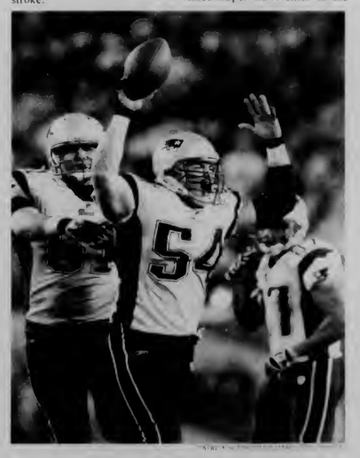
O'Brien expects the team to finish up the season strong.

"We have a great degree of strength," O'Brien said. "We've made small amounts of progress."

One week beyond the mid-point of the season, O'Brien says that he hopes to continue to make steady progress for the season's remaining five weeks. He feels that his athletes are able to handle the pressure and the workload and that each race provides them with an increase in maturity and experience.

The team is now preparing for the Atlantic 10 Championship in Philadelphia on Oct. 29. The race with fourteen A-10 teams will prove to be a tough competition. O'Brien hopes to finish "as high as possible," but with powerhouses such as La Salle, Duquesne, and UNC-Charlotte being seemingly "untouchable," the Minutemen are aiming for fourth place.

O'Brien's strategy for the race will be to "maintain strength, maintain good performance with our third-seventh spot runners and to try to squeeze one or two runners out of the pack."



"Our depth is our strength," O'Brien said. "We basically have eight or nine runners of equal ability, [plus Fischer who has finished first for the team in every race this season]."

However, O'Brien is still looking for one more front-runner to step up and take charge.

Bruschi to return to practice

By HOWARD ULMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. – New England Patriots linebacker Tedy Bruschi plans to return to practice on Wednesday, eight months after having a mild stroke.

New England Patriots linebacker Tedy Bruschi plans to return to practice tomorrow. Bruschi suffered a minor stroke eight months ago.

Bruschi was cleared Sunday by his doctors to begin practicing this week, but the Patriots left it up to Bruschi and his family to determine when he would return.

Bruschi was one of the defensive stars on a team that has won three Super Bowl titles in the last four seasons. The Patriots are 3-3 so far this season and have allowed 27.3 points per game, most in the AFC.

"I want to help this team any way I can," he said Monday at a news conference at Gillette Stadium. "They tell me I can play, I know I can play, so, shoot, let's just play."

Bruschi didn't say when he planned to play in a game. The Patriots have a bye this week and return to action Oct. 30 at home against Buffalo.

"I'm going to let Bill decide that," Bruschi said. "I'm another player on this team and will get evaluated by coach Belichick. ... When they see me and they evaluate me on how I look in practice, I'm sure that decision will be made."

Bruschi has been on the physically unable to perform list all season, meaning he can practice with the Patriots after the sixth week of the regular season, which ends Monday night.

NFL rules give him three more weeks to start practicing, and then the team would have three weeks to decide whether to place him on the active roster. Had he been placed on injured reserve, he would not have been able to return this season.

"Physically, Tedy is completely back to normal, and is completely healthy," Dr. David Greer, a specialist from Massachusetts General Hospital who has monitored Bruschi since his stroke, said in a statement Sunday.

Wie disqualified in pro debut

By TIM DAHLBERG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

It's not always easy being 16 and famous, no matter how easy everyone tries to make it for you.

Michelle Wie was surrounded all week by a protective cocoon that included her parents, her agents, her caddie and her Nike people for her eagerly awaited pro debut. All were in the California desert to make sure things went smoothly for the future star.

None of them, though, could help her as she sat alone in the press tent Sunday night, fighting back tears and trying to explain what went wrong.

She should have been $53,126 richer, her first tournament check in her purse. She should have been eager to wing her way back to Hawaii and tell her friends at school about how they pay you to play a game you love.

Instead, she looked as if she had just been called into the principal's office for punishment.

If her name was Jeong Jang, Marisa Baena or any of the other anonymous players in the Samsung World Championship, she would have escaped without anyone saying a word. But this was Michelle Wie, who might as well replace the swoosh on her shirt and hat with big targets instead.

Her crime? You might stretch it and say she cheated, dropping her ball closer to the hole in Saturday's third round so she could salvage a par after hitting it into a bush.

Those more charitable would say she was simply a careless teenager who made a mistake.

Another group – which includes

Michelle Wie was disqualified from her first professional tournament at the Samsung World Championship this weekend for taking an illegal drop.

Wie and her entourage – would argue she did nothing wrong at all.

"I don't feel like I cheated," Wie said.

Don't ask Michael Bamberger which group he stands in. He said he was simply trying to protect the integrity of the game when he walked up to a rules official late Sunday afternoon to say he had concerns about how Wie handled the drop from a day before.

Bamberger is a writer for Sports Illustrated, a job that gives him up-close access to the play of field in golf. He and some other writers were following Wie around the course when she declared an unplayable lie in a Gold Lantana bush, then took a drop onto some nearby grass that to Bamberger seemed was closer to the hole – a no-no in golf.

The problem wasn't just that Bamberger made a case about it, though most journalists would argue that their job is to report the news, not make it. But he didn't have his fit of conscience until late the next

Volunteers fan out in search of Mass. woman

SOUTH PORTLAND, Maine—About 100 volunteers joined local authorities in searching Tuesday for a Massachusetts woman who has been missing since spending a night in Portland's Old Port a week ago.

The search shifted to South Portland after a woman called police to say she saw Lynne Moran late on Oct. 10, the night she disappeared.

Moran, 24, of Shrewsbury, Mass., was seen walking alongside a road in South Portland not long after she had been seen in Portland, police said.

On Tuesday, volunteers joined game wardens, police officers and the Coast Guard in the search. Wardens used a plane to search South Portland while people on foot combed the woods and along the waterfront.

Family members are fearful because Moran has never stayed out of contact for so long. She also failed to report to work as the assistant director of two homes for foster children, a job to which she is extremely dedicated, said her brother, John Moran. He said the family doesn't know where she might have been going in South Portland.

"We're not aware of anyone she would have been visiting in that area," he said.

Moran, who grew up in Portland, went to lunch with friends on the afternoon of Oct. 10, and then visited a bar in the Old Port. Later, she visited an acquaintance in an apartment on Market Street, where she left her purse and cell phone. She was intoxicated when she was later seen wearing a man's plaid shirt and no shoes, police said.

John Moran said it is difficult to maintain hope and still prepare for the possibility that something terrible has happened.

"It's just incredibly hard, because on the one hand you want to prepare yourself for the worst – you feel you have to prepare for the worst. But you do still hope. You just can't accept that something has happened."

Amherst Fire Department not up to standards

By KRISTINA TEDESCHI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amherst citizens are not as protected from fire or medical emergencies as they should be. In response, the Fire Station Study Committee has developed a proposal calling for a new station in South Amherst and the renovation of the existing Central Station, built in 1929, on North Pleasant Street. North Station, located on East Pleasant Street, will be left as is.

Members of the committee say South Amherst is too far from Central Station to provide adequate protection in the case of an emergency. According to the Amherst Town website (www.amherstma.gov), national standards require that any area of town can be reached by emergency vehicles within six minutes. Most of South Amherst, home to Hampshire College and several big apartment complexes, cannot be reached within that time. For Committee Chair Lynn Griesemer, the danger is apparent.

"Most of South Amherst is way outside the six minute drive time," Griesemer said. "If you live on Bay Road, if you're lucky, they will get to you in twelve minutes. And if that's an emergency medical situation such as heart attack or anaphylactic shock, you likely won't live."

According to Amherst Town Manager Barry L. Del Castilho, this is not a new problem. The necessity for a new fire station in Amherst has existed for years. Previous studies were conducted in 1965, 1966, and 1983 that addressed the unsatisfactory coverage. Lack of funds has always been a factor in the decision not to build.

"It has long been desired to have a fire station that would be closer to areas in South Amherst," Del Castilho said. "The town is going to have to decide whether it's ready to embark in this direction, which will cost quite a bit of money in the next few years and permanently."

The FSSC members say the total cost for their proposed project is about 7.2 million dollars in capital costs for both the new station and the renovation of Central Station, a price some think could break an already tight budget. However, operating and staffing costs for the new station are not included in this price. According to the town website, the proposal includes hiring 12 to 16 additional firefighters to staff the new and existing stations, an additional cost of approximately $600,000 to $800,000 annually.

Inadequate emergency coverage does not only affect South Amherst, but the entire town.

"The moment something happens in central and South Amherst, North Amherst is actually unprotected," said Griesemer. "Once Central goes south, [firefighters] come from the North [Station] to cover Central ... now that leaves UMass vulnerable as well as all of North Amherst, and depending on how many [firefighters] are needed, it even leaves Amherst College and downtown Amherst vulnerable."

The lack of firefighters is also an issue. According to Amherst Fire Chief Keith Hoyle, the Amherst Fire Department is the lowest-staffed department in Massachusetts by half. However, committee members say the force is as efficient as possible because every firefighter is also a licensed Emergency Medical Technician (EMT). Still, much is needed to provide satisfactory conditions for both Amherst firefighters and residents.

"The money needed to get up to national standard would be astronomical," Hoyle said.

The site for the new station has yet to be found. The FSSC is not authorized to choose the location. The Committee has drafted an article for possible presentation at the November Town Meeting calling for "site selection and preliminary design" of the new station.

The Committee presented their proposal last week to the Finance Committee, which decided to put off a recommendation. They will again present their proposal to the Finance Committee tomorrow at the Town Hall at 7 p.m. According to Finance Committee Chair Alice Carlozzi, a recommendation is expected at that time

Engineers struggle to ease pressure of Mass. dam

By RAY HENRY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TAUNTON—Engineers struggled to ease pressure on a battered 173-year-old wooden dam Tuesday and prevent a collapse that could send a wall of water crashing through this town of 50,000.

Crews opened floodgates on the Whittenton Pond Dam, and also adjusted the flow on a second dam upstream on the rain-swollen Mill River.

The river fell by several inches, but an evacuation order remained in effect, and schools and highways were closed amid fears a dam break could send 6 feet of water surging through downtown Taunton, a working-class community about 40 miles from Boston.

"As the water level decreases, it will be taking a load off the structure and that's what everyone is looking for," engineer Matthew Bellisle said.

Mayor Robert Nunes said officials were worried about excessive vibration coming from a rotted wooden beam at the base of the dam. He said nothing was being done to reinforce the structure for fear that intervening could just cause it to fail.

With the dam buckling under heavy rains, the mayor on Monday ordered about 2,000 residents who live near the river to evacuate. The situation worsened after some of dam's timbers washed away, and dive teams stood by in case rescues proved necessary.

But as the water level dropped in Lake Sabbatia, the body of water behind the dam, authorities were hopeful disaster could be avoided.

"I've got my fingers crossed that this thing is able to hold," said Gov. Mitt Romney, who visited the dam.

Mary Alves, 70, of Taunton, sits in a makeshift shelter for evacees on Monday. Nearly 2,000 Taunton residents were forced to leave there homes after officials determined that a nearby dam was no longer safe.

Romney ordered emergency inspections of dams across the state.

Whittenton Pond Dam is one of about 3,000 private dams in the state. It was inspected two years ago and was considered in fair condition at that time, Romney said.

The 12-foot-high dam dates to 1832 and is near homes and businesses about a half-mile upstream from downtown Taunton. It was built to power a textile mill but no longer has any industrial purpose.

Taunton has received 11 1/2 inches of rain this month, including more than 7 inches from Friday through Sunday. The city last flooded in 1968, when the same dam broke.

Miers pledged support for anti-abortion action

By DAVID ESPO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers pledged unflagging opposition to abortion as a candidate for the Dallas City council in 1989, according to documents released Tuesday. She backed a constitutional amendment to ban the procedure in most cases and promised to appear at "pro-life rallies and special events."

Asked in a Texans United For Life questionnaire whether she would support legislation restricting abortions if the Supreme Court allowed it, Miers indicated she would. Her reply was the same when asked, "Will you oppose the use of city funds or facilities" to promote abortions?

Sporters of Miers' nomination said they hoped the single sheet of paper – delivered to the Senate Judiciary Committee as part of a shipment of 12 boxes of documents – would help reassure rebellious conservatives that she would not disappoint them if she took a seat on the high court.

President Bush knew of the views she had held before he picked her for the court, spokesman Scott McClellan said at the White House. But he said the president "did not discuss with her or anyone else whether or not those were still her views."

One Democratic supporter of abortion rights responded warily. "This raises very serious concerns about her ability to fairly apply the law without bias in this regard. It will be my intention to question her very carefully about these issues," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California.

Miers also returned a lengthy questionnaire to the Judiciary Committee during the day in which she wrote that the "role of the judiciary in our system of government is limited. ... And of course, parties should not be able to establish social policy through court action, having failed to persuade the legislative branch or the executive branch of the wisdom and correctness of their preferred course.

"Courts are to be arbiters of disputes, not policymakers."

Bush nominated Miers three weeks ago to succeed retiring Sandra Day O'Connor, the justice who has cast the pivotal vote in a string of 5-4 rulings in recent years that sustained abortion rights, upheld affirmative action and limited the application of the death penalty.

Many Republicans had hoped Bush would pick a prominent conservative with a long record on abortion and other issues rather than a 60-year-old White House counsel whose private law practice consisted almost entirely of representing corporate clients.

As a result, the appointment has created a political landscape unlike any other in the five years of the Bush administration – tepid support at best from conservatives unhappy over a judicial nominee, with Democrats generally content to remain outside the fray rather than interfere in a remarkable round of GOP infighting.

There were some indications during the day that Miers might be gaining ground among Senate Republicans, none of whom has yet to announce plans to oppose confirmation.

Sen. Trent Lott, who spoke dismissively of Miers shortly after her appointment, told reporters it was "more than likely at some point I'll be satisfied. But I'm not there yet." The Mississippi Republican said his concern resulted

Bush voices support for guest worker plan

By DEB RICHTMANN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON– President Bush sought support Tuesday for his guest worker plan for foreigners, hoping to win over skeptical conservatives with a pledge to clamp down on illegal immigration – one of a growing number of issues causing friction between the White House and fellow Republicans.

Bush and his advisers are caught between their business supporters, who believe the economy needs foreign workers, and conservatives whose priority is to get tough on illegal immigration. The right flank of the GOP also is upset about federal spending and Bush's nomination of Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court.

"As we improve and expand our efforts to secure our borders, we must also recognize that that enforcement cannot work unless it is part of a larger comprehensive immigration reform program," Bush said. "If an employer has a job that no American is willing to take, we need to find a way to fill that demand by matching willing employers with willing workers from foreign countries on a temporary and legal basis."

Bush made the pitch for his immigration policy at the White House just before signing the $32 billion homeland security bill, which includes large increases for patrolling borders but fewer grants for local emergency first responders and a freeze in transit security funding.

Bush said the bill includes $82 million to improve and expand Border Patrol stations and $70 million to install and improve fencing, lighting, vehicle barriers and roads. He said it provides $3.7 billion for immigration and customs enforcement so illegal immigrants can be found and returned home. It also will fund the hiring of 100 new immigration enforcement agents and 250 criminal investigators and add 2,000 new beds to detention facilities.

"This will allow us to hold more non-Mexican illegal immigrants while we process them through a program we call 'expedited removal,'" Bush said. "Putting more of these non-Mexican illegal immigrants through expedited removal is crucial to ending the problem of catch-and-release."

The "catch and release" policy has allowed tens of thousands of non-Mexican illegal aliens to disappear within the United States.

Earlier in the day, administration officials appeared on Capitol Hill to promote Bush's guest worker plan, saying action is needed beyond improving border patrols to stem the flow of illegal immigrants.

"We're going to need more than just brute enforcement," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "We're going to need a temporary worker program as well."

Bush last year introduced a plan that would allow undocumented workers to get three-year work visas. They could extend that for another three years, but would then have to return to their home countries for a year to apply for a new work permit. The president called his proposal a necessity for an economy that needs employees for jobs many Americans don't want.

GOP leaders in both the House and Senate have suggested that Congress should first take up the enforcement issue, putting off debate on the more complex issues of undocumented workers and the demand for low-skilled labor in this country.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., said the administration should be concerned about securing the borders before moving forward on a guest worker plan.

"The administration's continued kowtowing to big business defies political sense," said Tancredo, who has been at loggerheads with the White House over the proposal and whose calls for tough immigration measures have drawn the ire of Hispanic groups.

"Slowly, the president's team is coming to realize that they have a political revolt on their hands. And, it's no longer just the conservative base that's angry about illegal immigration – there's widespread discontent about our broken system from coast to coast, from left to right."

But Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said that with reports of larger numbers of illegal immigrants – often estimated around 11 million – than legal immigrants, his panel would address comprehensive change. "It's a matter of very, very substantial urgency," he said.

Several members of the committee are sponsoring legislation that, in addition to strengthening border security and workplace enforcement, would set up guest worker programs.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has a bill that would provide visas for up to six years, after which the worker must either leave the country or be in the pipeline for a green card.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the Bush's guest worker program offers no path toward legalization of immigrants and will create a permanent underclass.

"We need a plan that will allows immigrants who are already here to earn their residency through hard work and that will create legal channels for immigrant workers necessary for our economic growth to enter in the future," Reid said.

Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., have a rival bill that would require illegal aliens to return to their home country to apply for the temporary worker program.

President George W. Bush waves to the audience following a celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month in the East Room of the White House in Washington.

Rudy Giuliani hints at run in 2008 Presidential campaign

PRAGUE, Czech Republic (AP)— Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said Tuesday he was not planning to run for political office next year and would probably decide in a "couple years" whether to run for president.

"I'm not running for any political post next year," Giuliani said after meeting Prague's mayor, Pavel Bem, who praised Giuliani for his leadership following the Sept. 11 attacks and for reducing New York's crime rate.

Giuliani, New York's mayor in 1994-2001, has spent the years since leaving office as a corporate executive and public speaker, and he suggested earlier this month he could return to politics.

On a trip to Denmark, he said that next year he would contemplate a run for the White House.

But when asked Tuesday whether he was considering a run for president in 2008, Giuliani said it was too soon to decide.

"It's very far off and to make a decision like that is a couple years away," Giuliani said.

"It's not something that I'm currently thinking about."

Aides to Giuliani recently said he is too busy with private business interests to run for New York governor next year.

National polls in the United States regularly place Giuliani among the most popular Republican candidates, and he is asked about his plans at almost every public appearance. He usually deflects the question by suggesting he would not decide on a 2008 run until after the 2006 congressional elections.

Giuliani was in Prague to attend a two-day international conference on relations between the United States and the European Union and the fight against terrorism. Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft and former British Prime Minister John Major also were scheduled to participate.

State argues against nightclub dismissal

By Eric Tucker
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I.— State prosecutors urged a judge not to dismiss charges against the owners of a nightclub where 100 people died in a fire and the former tour manager for the rock band whose pyrotechnics set off the blaze.

In court papers filed Monday, prosecutors say there is no legal basis to throw out any of the manslaughter charges against Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, owners of The Station nightclub in West Warwick, and Daniel Biechele, tour manager for Great White.

The three men each face 200 counts of involuntary manslaughter stemming from the Feb. 20, 2003 fire, which also injured more than 200 people. They asked the court in August to dismiss the charges.

The Derderians argued that 100 of the 200 manslaughter counts should be thrown out because they weren't give advance notice of fire code violations cited as a reason for the involuntary manslaughter charges. They also said that fire code violations can't be used as a legal basis for a manslaughter charge.

But prosecutors said Monday that the Derderians violated the state's fire code by using flammable foam inside their club, creating a safety hazard that directly led to the deadly blaze.

Lawyers for the Derderdians said the brothers were not told during inspections of their club that the foam, which they used as soundproofing, violated the state's fire code.

The Derderians also said in August that Superior Court Judge Francis Darigan should dismiss the entire indictment because grand jurors who returned the charges were absent for portions of the proceedings. The other manslaughter charges are for criminal negligence.

Prosecutors rejected that argument, saying there was no requirement that grand jurors be present for each day of testimony and several members of the panel had an either perfect or near-perfect attendance record.

Biechele also challenged the indictment, saying among other things that the fire code only prohibited the use of fireworks but not pyrotechnics – without a permit – and that the violation could not serve as a basis for manslaughter charges.

The deadly fire began after sparks from Great White's pyrotechnics display ignited the egg crate-patterned foam that the Derderians affixed on the walls of their nightclub.

Tution cost slow, loans increase

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

(AP) — For students and parents, it's the first sliver of good news about college costs for several years: price increases slowed this year, growing at the lowest rate since 2001.

But the bad news is the 7.1 percent increase at public four-year universities remains well above the general inflation rate, and drove the "list price" of tuition and fees at those schools to an average of $5,491, according to an annual survey released Tuesday by the College Board.

Prices at two-year public colleges, which educate nearly half of American college students, rose 5.4 percent to $2,191. At four-year private, nonprofit colleges, costs rose 5.9 percent to $21,235.

Most families don't pay the full list price, thanks to grants from the government and other sources, as well as tax breaks. Typical net costs: $11,600 at private four-year schools; $2,200 at public four-year schools, and just $400 at community colleges.

Yet students at four-year public colleges are paying an estimated $750 more than just two years ago. And while total financial aid is increasing, loans accounted for more of the growth than grants for the third consecutive year, the College Board said. Students have to pay back loans, but not grants.

James Boyle, president of the group College Parents of America, said schools and policy-makers aren't working hard enough to hold down costs. "The beat goes on with increases in colleges costs, and parents are growing weary of the same old tune," he said.

Average debt for undergraduate borrowers is now $15,500 a figure experts consider manageable for most students, given that college graduates can expect to earn nearly $20,000 more per year than high school graduates. Still, increases in borrowing raise concerns that some students will be priced out of college, drop out, or graduate but stay away from low-paying public service jobs so they can repay debts.

"We have deserving students who are being kept out of college or have difficulty completing degrees because of a lack of money," said Gaston Caperton, president of the nonprofit College Board, which also owns the SAT college entrance exam.

The results come as Congress is negotiating a new version of the Higher Education Act, which would set federal financial aid policy for the coming years. A House version passed last month increases some grants, but critics say it would harm borrowers by cutting $9 billion from student loan programs.

Romney announces inspections of hazardous dams statewide

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON – Gov. Mitt Romney on Tuesday ordered the emergency inspection of all high-risk dams in the state, even as a wooden dam in Taunton threatened to collapse and flood the city.

Dams are considered high risk when, "if they were to breach, there would be a significant loss of life or property," Romney said at a Statehouse news conference.

Earlier in the day, he visited the Whittenton Pond Dam in Taunton, which state and local officials have been closely watching since Monday afternoon, when the structure began to buckle under the weight of high water resulting from the weekend's heavy rains.

Neighborhoods downstream from the dam, including downtown Taunton, were evacuated because of fears that a dam break would send a 6-foot wall of water crashing through the city.

Whittenton Pond Dam is one of about 3,000 privately owned dams in the state. It was built in 1832 to power Taunton's textile mills, but no longer serves any industrial use. The dam has been owned for the past two years by Jefferson Development of Leominster. Executives from the company visited the site with local officials on Tuesday.

Romney said the Taunton dam was one of 146 in the state that received a "fair" assessment during its last inspection by state officials. Thirty-eight others were given a "poor" grade, while two — both in Chicopee — were deemed "unsafe." One of the two was considered so decrepit that the pond it held back had to be drained, Romney said.

police log

Thirty people involved in melee at JQA building

Sunday October 16

At 3:18 a.m., a UMass police officer on patrol outside the Franklin Dining Commons in the Central Residential Area observed a subject failing to stop at a stop sign at the intersection of Infirmary Way and Clark Hill Rd. The driver, later identified as Jennifer L. Moreau, 20, of 515 Pond Rd. in Lewiston, Maine, failed a breathalyzer on the scene; her blood alcohol level registered a .08 and .09. A .08 reading means a person is intoxicated by legal standards. Moreau was arrested and charged with operating under the influence of alcohol and failing to stop for a stop sign.

Saturday October 15

At 1:59 p.m., a UMass police officer on patrol in Lot 50 in the Southwest Residential Area observed two individuals believed to be under the age of 21 possessing alcohol. Samantha Halloran, 17, of 19 Adrian St. in Somerville was arrested and charged with underage possession of alcohol. Tarak B. Patel, 18, of 9 Chausse Dr. in Methuen was arrested and charged with underage possession of alcohol and false/misuse of a liquor identification card or license.

At 12:46 a.m., a UMass police officer observed a driver, later identified as Peter Uttero, 22, of 252 Phelps Rd. in Barre, Vt., failing to stop at a stop sign at the intersection of Lincoln Ave. and Massachusetts Ave. in the Southwest Residential Area. When the officer flashed his lights, signaling Uttero to pull over, Uttero allegedly kept driving. However, Uttero eventually pulled over moments later. The officer then discovered Uttero had his license revoked in Massachusetts for being a habitual traffic offender. Uttero was arrested and charged with driving with a suspended license and failing to stop at a stop sign.

Friday October 14

At 11:39 p.m., UMass police officers were called to the John Quincy Adams dorm in the Southwest Residential Area after several reports were made of a loud disturbance. Upon arrival, two cadets found a fight involving approximately 30 people on the second floor. One male was reported injured in the melee; he received a swollen left eye. When police arrived on the scene, several people scattered. A cadet observed a male, who he believed was part of the brawl, running away with one shoe on and one shoe in his hand. When the cadet asked him to stop, the suspect allegedly began running away. The cadet physically apprehended the suspect a short time later and arrested him. Police identified the suspect as Hunter Evers, 20, of 400 Fenway in Boston. Evers was charged with disorderly conduct.

Tuesday October 11

At 3:32 p.m., University of Massachusetts police officers arrested Marcus Hemenway, 18, of 69 Huron Circle in Dorchester and Ian Chuckran, 18, of 40 Carruth St. in Boston after a report of an odor of marijuana from a Pierpont dorm room where the subjects were located. Police said two officers were dispatched to the room after a report was made of marijuana odor. Once the officers gained entry into the room, they found Marcus in possession of a substance believed to be marijuana. Marcus was charged with possession of a class D substance and an outstanding warrant for failing to make a prior court appearance. Chuckran was charged with an outstanding warrant for failing to make a prior court appearance.

Miers abortion stance causes stir in Senate from dealings he had with Miers over the summer that led him to question her competence. He declined to elaborate.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., told reporters he thought Miers was making headway among conservatives.

"Grassroots Republicans that I talk to in Alabama feel positive about her," he told reporters. He added, "I might have liked a different type of nominee but that's the president's. He gets to pick that."

While the Texans United For Life questionnaire was unsigned and undated, senior Justice Department officials who briefed reporters said Miers herself had included it in material to be turned over to the Judiciary Committee.

The document consisted of 10 questions and asked candidates to indicate agreement or disagreement based on their views.

In each case, Miers indicated she supported the positions taken by the group. That included support of Texas' ratification of any constitutional amendment that cleared Congress banning abortions except where necessary to prevent the death of the mother, and support for legislation "if the Supreme Court returns to the states the right to restrict abortion."

Miers also said she would oppose the use of public money for abortion except where necessary to prevent the death of the mother.

The committee's chairman, Arlen Specter, R-Pa., told reporters he intended to use the public hearings to review a disagreement that developed after a private meeting he and Miers had on Monday.

Talking with reporters Monday, he said she had expressed support for a pair of court rulings that established the right of married and unmarried couples to use contraceptives. Both cases involve a right to privacy, which is viewed as the foundation for the right to abortion established in a 1973 court ruling.

Not long after Specter spoke, the White House said he was mistaken, and Miers called to tell him so. Former Sen. Dan Coats, who is shepherding her nomination, said in an interview the senator was wrong, and that Miers had told him that while she believes there is a right to privacy in the Constitution, she was "not commenting on specific cases." An aide to Specter issued a statement saying the senator "accepts Ms. Miers' statement that he misunderstood what she said."

Accepts but does not necessarily agree with it, Specter himself said on Tuesday.

"I think the fair thing to do is what I have done and that is to accept her statement," he said.

FDA examines concerns of households use of hand soaps

By John J. Lumpkin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—It seems hard to go wrong with a hand soap that "kills 99 percent of germs" it encounters. But critics of anti-bacterial soaps in the home say there's plenty to be concerned about.

A government advisory panel will take a look at that Thursday.

The popularity of soaps and other products claiming anti-bacterial properties skyrocketed in the last decade as consumers turned to them as a defense against household illnesses. But some people contend that a number of the products, particularly those that use synthetic chemicals rather than alcohol or bleach, pose the risk of creating germs that are resistant to antibacterials as well as antibiotics.

Those critics say antibacterials are no more effective than regular soap in reducing infections and illnesses. The Food and Drug Administration, in briefing documents posted on the Internet ahead of Thursday's hearing, said the agency has not found any medical studies that definitively linked specific anti-bacterial products to reduced infection rates.

Unlike anti-bacterial products, regular household soap helps separate bacteria from the skin so they wash down the drain or attach to the hand towel when hands are dried. Anti-bacterial soap kills the bacteria outright.

Manufacturers disagree with many of the critics' claims, while both sides point to studies they say support their point of view. An FDA panel of independent experts will take up these concerns in a public hearing.

The Nonprescription Drugs Advisory Committee will consider whether there is evidence that these products pose long-term hazards, as the critics contend. They can make recommendations on the sales and labeling of these products to the FDA, which ultimately has the authority to restrict availability of such soaps and related items.

The FDA briefing documents do not suggest any such ruling is imminent.

Critics like Dr. Stuart Levy, president of the Alliance for the Prudent Use of Antibiotics, say these products should be banned for use in healthy households. Instead, he says, keep them where they are needed: in hospitals and in homes with very sick people at greater risk if they get a bacterial infection.

"We run the risk of changing the kinds of bacteria we confront every day in the home," said Levy, a professor of medicine and molecular biology at Tufts University School of Medicine.

Here's how, he says: The small percentage of bacteria that survive a brush with the soap may develop resistance to it. What's more, he says, some surviving bacteria may have an improved ability to pump out all threatening substances, including antibiotics used to cure infections.

Those survivors may pass that mutation to their offspring, and the adaptation can come to dominate an entire population of bacteria, creating a resistance.

While Levy says that has happened in lab studies, there's no firm evidence it's happening in households. Brian Sansoni, spokesman for The Soap and Detergent Association, an industry group, said studies have found no link between the real-world use of anti-bacterial products and bacterial resistance.

"These products are proven to provide a preventive benefit for their users," Sansoni said.

Troubled treasurer finds home

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON – A high-ranking official in the state treasurer's office who resigned after volumes of pornography were found on his computer was recently hired by the University of Massachusetts, but the reason for his departure was concealed by a confidentiality agreement.

Jeff Stearns, who served as deputy treasurer for debt management, quit this summer after his computer crashed and repair technicians traced the problem to thousands of pornographic picture files, a former Treasury colleague with direct knowledge of the reason for his departure said Tuesday. The colleague requested anonymity because of a prohibition on speaking about the agreement.

Stearns is one of six former or prospective treasury employees to sign confidentiality and severance agreements with Treasurer Timothy Cahill since he took office in January 2003. A seventh outgoing worker is slated to sign one in the next week, according to the treasurer's office.

Cahill's aides say the agreements – which are unusual in state government – are necessary to ensure a smooth transition between employees, as well as to preserve confidential information such as security codes. However, in two cases, the agreements involved Cahill's former spokeswomen, who did not have access to secure information. They also departed before their replacements were hired.

Two top Cahill aides, Comm-unications Director Allison Mitchell and General Counsel Grace Lee, also said Monday none of the agreements was designed to conceal personnel or personality problems.

In Stearns' case, though, concerns about the pictures found on his computer prompted the treasurer to enter into the agreement with him, according to the former colleague.

Stearns has since been hired by UMass-Boston as assistant vice chancellor of administration and finance. UMass did not yet Stearns with the treasurer's office, a top treasury official said, but even if it had, standard privacy concerns would have prevented the office from revealing the reason for his departure without Stearns' express permission.

Homecoming Weekend needs more support from students

Homecoming Weekend is something of a tradition throughout the country. For many of us, it is supposed to be an exciting time of year when we join our families (whether that is going home or staying here) and make the most of what is truly hoped to be a good football season. However, when it comes to the University of Massachusetts, the excitement and hype surrounding Homecoming Weekend seems to outweigh the student interest. The apathetic feel the students have toward Homecoming Weekend is something that needs to be remedied if it is to continue its long great tradition at this university.

This past weekend, the UMass football team beat "The Champs," James Madison University – a very important game for them. Also, what better weekend to have such a victory than Homecoming Weekend? All the alumni (and wealthy potential donors) were there to see it and bask in the glory that is the University of Massachusetts and what they remembered it to be. This great achievement has not gotten the attention it has deserved and is because of the students' disregard.

The football game was probably the biggest and most important win UMass will have under their belt for a long time and the most support and appreciation they could get was from rounding up 4,000 people in attendance for the game in a stadium that holds 17,000. Granted, the weather could have been better. But, regardless, if that game was held on a different weekend, undoubtedly the turnout would have been just the same.

Last year, Homecoming Weekend was quite different from this year. People were more aware of it, behind it and excited for it. The main difference between last year and this year: Bill Cosby. Everyone loved to go and see Bill Cosby because he was a UMass alumnus and they were all told stories of him getting up on stage, telling jokes and wearing his UMass sweats. Bill Cosby was not a free event for the UMass student body. The tickets were not expensive, yet the students went anyway. For the football games, the tickets were free and still the turnout was poor.

The freshman classes have always been keener on Homecoming Weekend than the other classes. The main reason is that they don't yet know better. It is a huge disappointment for someone to think something is more important than it actually is, especially when every other school across the country celebrates their Homecoming Weekends. Homecoming should matter and it should be something that students at UMass look forward to. It shouldn't be something that students try to avoid by going home early for the weekend, which, sadly, is largely the sentiment found on this campus. The student body needs to get behind this campus community more, if only for one weekend out of the school year. For that one weekend, it's not about the politics and the administration. It's about the students being proud of UMass and taking the time to let that fact be known.

More to UMass than meets the eye

Andrew Freeman

On Saturday I went to the Homecoming comedy show, where Saturday Night Live veteran Dean Edwards performed for over an hour. At the beginning of his performance, he asked the audience what there was to do here at UMass Amherst. There was a pronounced silence. Finally, some of the more exuberant among us shouted, "Drink." Although this discussion soon passed and the comedian launched into an enjoyable routine, I was left with an uneasy feeling.

Is drinking really the only activity worth mentioning here? Are our lives so dull, dreary and dismal at UMass that barbiturates and narcotics provide our only recreation? These are rhetorical questions, of course. We all know that there is much more to do here; that there are hundreds of clubs to join and innumerable opportunities. Many of us are involved on campus. Many of us are not.

I won't pretend that I am very active at UMass, because I am not. Part of the reason I went to the comedy show, actually, was a desire to do something unusual. It is all too easy to fall into a routine: sleep, eat, work, play computer games, etc. While such predictability may be comforting, it can also rapidly become boring.

In my first semester, I went to lectures around campus, saw a musical and discovered the Red Sox as they advanced to the ALCS. I found friends and talked frequently with my roommate. And then entropy set in. I scarcely conversed with my next two roommates, and lost track of many of the people I interacted with before. As I progressed deeper into my major, I lost sight of non-academic pursuits. I am four semesters away from graduation, and yet I have not done much here.

That first semester, I remember one of my professors complaining that the university doesn't do enough to alert students of the events occurring around us. After years of missing events because I did not hear of them until after the fact, I am inclined to agree. Unless you frenetically check the Arts and Events calendar on the UMass Web site, read the Collegian every single day or read all of Gargano's emails, chances are some interesting activity has passed you by. With so much going on, it is inevitable that many things will not be heard about. However, the university does not advertise enough to help students get out. In many cases, there seems to be a tacit belief that the vast majority of undergraduates aren't interested in the cultural and academic offerings here.

> Unless you frenetically check the Arts and Events calendar on the UMass Web site, read the Collegian every single day or read all of Gargano's emails, chances are some interesting activity has passed you by.

The charge that there is nothing to do at UMass is nonsense, pure and simple. I live in Boston, one of the most culturally rich places in the world, yet I am astounded by the breadth of events here. From the performances given by comedians and musicians, to the art galleries and the sports events, to lectures and book signings, there is no shortage of activities one can engage in.

As I see it, there are four things holding people like myself back from being involved on campus. There is fear of failure in the eyes of a new group of people. There is cynicism – the belief that other people are shallow or self-interested and not worth associating with. There is complacency – being satisfied with one's present circumstances and not seeking new opportunities. Finally, there is the routinization of life – falling into habits that keep us from accomplishing anything new or exciting.

In the end, failing to take advantage of the opportunities around us is a waste of money. Many of us are paying well over $15,000 to attend this institution, and to spend such amounts and not make use of the offerings around us is foolish. There is so much more to do here than drinking and partying. The next time someone asks, "What is there to do at UMass?" my answer will be, "Everything."

Gluttony and the new face of UMass

Becky Martins

Anything in excess can be harmful to an individual. But to the average college student, alcohol is most often the abused substance of choice.

For those who believe in Christian ideology or are knowledgeable of Dante's "Divine Comedy," there are "Seven Deadly Sins" a person can commit. In essence, they cover such faults as pride, lust, envy, etc., but the second sin is considered most important to this argument. Also known as gluttony, the overindulgence of food, drink and intoxicants is looked at as damaging to a person physically, as well as spiritually. Overdoing such things, according to these beliefs, will only lead an individual down a path of self-destruction.

Generally, overindulgence can occur with anything. With food, we are often reminded of our limits when stomach upset arises. In terms of friends, sports or other interests, it is possible to overdo our dedication, leading us to lose sight of other things deemed important. But very often, the most serious case of overindulgence occurs when the consequences of it prove damaging or deadly. This is most commonly found with any type of drug abuse. However, a serious problem too often disregarded is that of alcohol.

I have felt firsthand the loss of self-control and memory retention that occurs when intoxicated. No one really enjoys waking up in the morning with a hangover and unable to remember large portions of the previous night. If bad decisions were made, we may find ourselves taken advantage of, such as in terms of theft and assault. Yet when we survive these experiences virtually unscathed, it can be hard to realize the severity of our actions. Without feeling the full consequences, it becomes too easy to repeat past mistakes and set ourselves up again to potentially be hurt or hurt others.

I have also witnessed the effect alcohol can have on others. Growing up in environments in which the substance was abused heavily, nothing can be more frightening than watching loved ones morph from humans to monsters. Their actions become unpredictable and violent. It becomes harder to care for these people sober when their intoxicated personas do nothing but inflict pain. I began to wonder how I, or anyone for that matter, could drink alcohol in excess knowing the horrors it brings. But then again, not everyone relates to my experiences. We all try to live life through our own choices, myself included. I guess we too often believe we are invincible to self-inflicted damages and continue to make perilous decisions.

> Very often, the most serious case of overindulgence occurs when the consequences of it prove damaging or deadly. This is most commonly found with any type of drug abuse. However, a serious problem too often disregarded is that of alcohol.

At UMass Amherst, it is clear we have an alcohol problem, among other things. In August 2005, we regained our title of a top 10 party school, ranking ninth in the nation, according to the Princeton Review. And while this is a celebrated figure by many, it should also raise concerns.

Would the Oct. 2 stabbings on Frat Row have occurred if excessive levels of alcohol were not involved, or would it be solved if onlookers had been sober enough to identify suspects? Would a girl have been sexually assaulted walking to her dorm a few weeks ago if the perpetrator had not been heavily intoxicated? Would we not have to bury classmates, friends or loved ones so young if they weren't involved in alcohol-related accidents? Surely, ranking as a top 10 party school and holding true to that title is not worth such things.

Cutting back on excessive alcohol use should not be seen solely as the UMass administration and police infringing on our student rights. I am a huge supporter of individual freedom and would never wish to feel controlled by a large state institution. However, according to a 2003 survey issued by UMass' Student Assessment, Research and Evaluation office, 46.6 percent of students believed alcohol use was a problem and needed to be addressed. Thus, I know I am not alone in saying I agree.

It would be unrealistic to say alcohol should be eliminated completely. In no way can a police force, no matter the size, control the actions of nearly 25,000 students. What should be addressed is the idea of moderation. If a person makes the decision to drink, do it responsibly. Blacking out should not be the ultimate goal of an evening. Instead, if choosing to use alcohol, let it heighten the night's experiences, not ruin it and that of others. Remember that excessive drinking during your college years may not just be a stage. Bad habits develop and get harder to break over time. So surely, that gloomy beer gut and weakened liver will not retract once a bachelor's degree is acquired. And remember, while our choices are our own, no one is immune to reality. Once damage is done, it is irreversible.

Dining Commons etiquette 101

Duncan Devlin

I, just like many people, enjoy eating. Here at UMass, this is most easily accomplished by going to the Dining Commons, swiping my card, getting some food, sitting down, munching away, then returning my tray and leaving. Unfortunately, the rather disruptive behavior of a large contingent of the UMass community hinders this concept. Now, I am not referring to lessons about which fork goes where, or keeping one's elbows off the table. I am referring to basic concepts of courtesy for other people. Let me give you an idea of my average trip to dinner.

First, I arrive at the Worcester Dining Commons. I pass through the haze of smoke, and gleam at the, "No smoking 20 feet from building," sign. After this, there is the lobby full of students waiting patiently for a friend to arrive. This is quite OK. The table asking me for money, to vote or to sign up for a credit card is OK too. Some things are less OK, like one student who rides his bicycle into the lobby, and bouncing along at 2 feet per minute, expressing his discontent for the slowness of those in front of him, and completely forgetting such amazing lessons as, "don't ride your bike in the house." I have encountered swordfights, games of basketball and the occasional tug-of-war over a backpack in a place that we should consider more like a kitchen than a playground.

> I think that instead of hiding the tray return where no one can find it, there should be a big sign that reads, "Tray return." We could even go so far as to put it near the main exit.

After getting through this mess, there is the line for the card-reader. Now, I understand if there are a lot of people, and the host can only slide them so fast. This is a rather acceptable delay. What bothers me is that this whole line was started because one person decided that talking with his or her friends for the duration of the wait was more important than having the card ready. In addition, this person will usually stand right there and make sure their card is tucked safely away, taking no heed of the ever-growing line behind him or her.

After the line from hell, there is the food-hunting fold of people going every-which-way, backing up without looking, spilling drinks and never once venturing a sorry. Dodging them like a defensive line, I go on a hunt for a table. This is where the game of, "Which way did he go, George?" begins. Just about everywhere that could be a potential sitting-spot, there is a tray full of half-eaten food, ripped to shambles, in a self-fulfilling declaration of, "I hate this food. I'm leaving." Still, we cannot be sure if they have, in fact, departed, or if they are simply in search of ice cream. Moreover, who wants to return someone else's tray? I think that instead of hiding the tray return where no one can find it, there should be a big sign that reads, "Tray return." We could even go so far as to put it near the main exit.

Once I find a nice little spot (having passed three abandoned trays, and four people managing to occupy nine seats), I sit down and prepare to dig into my food. Having been raised on, well, whatever I learned to cook myself by age 8, I am quite happy with just about anything the DC can send my way. The word "disgusting" never crosses my lips, and I do not feel the need to demonstrate my place in society by talking about how much better it is to order Wings than eat at UMass. I particularly feel no need to scream it.

Have you ever had that experience? You are sitting at dinner and suddenly someone screams, "Oh my God," so loud it echoes off the walls. Now, I understand the occasional outburst due to a funny joke, but the tone is all different. In yet another holdover from high-school, these students feel that the only way they can be noticed is to call out over the entire DC, making their inane chatter heard throughout and totally disregarding the concept anyone may have of a peaceful dinner. Try calling out stuff at a more useful time, like when your professor asks you question.

So, after all this, I finish eating, toss my neighbor a dirty look, return my tray, face off against the oh-so-wearisome one-minute wait in line and head out. What should block my way, but a gathering of 10 or 15 mindless wanderers, discussing alcohol, sex or "Oh my God," and never making a mention of such amazing ideas as, "Maybe we should get out of a high-traffic area."

So, next time you go to the DC, have some respect for those around you who want to eat in peace. Have your card ready, eat quietly (normal conversation tones are OK), return your tray, get out of the way and for the love of God, keep your bike outside.

Unheard voices working together

Asif Khan

I attended a talk this weekend in Northampton at the Media Education Foundation. It featured two people belonging to two different groups that one rarely ever hears from in the Palestinian-Israeli debate. The first was Khulood Badawi, an Arab-Israeli Palestinian woman. She is a graduate of Haifa University and the former President of the Association of Arab Students in Israeli universities. The second was Yuval Adam, a Jewish-Israeli born in the United States and leader of the Student Coalition at Tel-Aviv University. This talk was organized by the Faculty for Israeli-Palestinian Peace (FIPP), an organization working with Israeli and Palestinian students and faculty to promote peace and understanding in the region.

The two former students gave a very personal and provocative talk to a small group of people, which included Israelis, Americans and Arabs. Badawi related her experience growing up in Nazareth, not greatly affected by direct Israeli control or oppression. But after moving to Haifa to attend college she was directly affected as a woman, an Arab and as a student studying at an Israeli university. She had fewer rights than Jewish-Israeli students, could not say a lot of things in class and was only allowed to take part in protests that were not political or critical of the government in any way. She always felt like an outsider in a country that she was born in, where Arabs constitute 20 percent of the population and that claims to be a democracy for all its citizens, Arabs and Jews alike.

When attacks against Israelis by Palestinians occurred, she was automatically blamed. Her identity was switched from Israeli-Arab to Palestinian, and thus "the enemy." She now identifies more strongly as a Palestinian because most of Israel never saw her as Israeli. And that is the case with most Arabs living in Israel and the territories occupied by it. Israeli-Arabs also pay taxes and contribute to the country's economy and a large portion of that money goes towards the destruction of Palestinian homes, increased force and oppression in the occupied territories like the building of the security wall on Palestinian land and the numerous checkpoints making life miserable for Palestinains. This is an enormous identity and personal crisis for a lot of people, including Badawi.

> [Badawi] now identifies more strongly as a Palestinian because most of Israel never saw her as Israeli. And that is the case with most Arabs living in Israel and the territories occupied by it.

These people, however, do not include only Arabs in Israel but also a growing number of Jews. Adam being one of them. His talk was very interesting because he not only agreed with Badawi but added to what she said and gave examples from his own life and college career in Israel. Whenever he voiced concern against the inhumane treatment of Palestinians, he was told to shut up and stop being a traitor to his country and people. This was seconded by other Israelis in the audience (most of them UMass students) who in their own way have tried to voice opposition against Israeli policies against Palestinians but have been met with a constant barrage of harassment and self-loathing tactics from people who are "for the Israeli cause."

He said that until two years ago he was an average college student who did not read newspapers or care much about Israeli politics or state control. Then one day during a demonstration, a Jewish-Israeli student from his university was shot and killed while protesting against the Israeli government. That is when it hit him that he is not safe from the government just because he is Jewish. That incident happened to "one of them" and it could happen to him as well. I asked him what he felt about Birthright Israel and if he thought that foreign students see everything in Israel or just selected snippets. He snickered and said that they see what the government wants them to see, so that they can come live there one day and add to Israel's Jewish population (as the Arabs have much higher population growth rates currently).

Seeing Israelis and Palestinians come together for a united cause with such solidarity and friendliness was amazing. I could not help but wonder how hard it must have been for them to talk to each other and leave aside their biases and the hardships they have faced, let alone explain their actions to family and friends. Of course there is frustration and many obstacles that young people must face, but they seem to be taking it all in great stride with amazing courage and strength. Along with the FFIPP they are conducting a tour of the United States, Brazil and some European countries to educate other young people about their cause and how they are in this together, not letting their differences and group histories get in the way of greater understanding and peace.

Contrary to what people might say or think, these two individuals are setting a great example for others to learn to co-exist and to voice opposition to injustice, qualities that need to be present in everyone – especially college students. Both speakers called out to the American public to question the blind support given to the Israeli government and the billions of dollars that are given to the country which ranks number one for receiving U.S. aid.

People, especially college students, need to question why this is and what happens with this money. These questions were asked not just by a biased Arab but by plenty of Jewish-Israelis as well. And no, they are not all crazy liberal Arab-lovers, but smart, intelligent, aware men and women who do not want any more houses bulldozed or blood spilled in their name. I think all of us can learn a lot from them. I know I did.

Remembering the fallen

Mike Sances

Once upon a time, a member of the UMass community called Pat Tillman, the pro football player-turned-Army Ranger, some bad names, comments made in a public forum. When I first heard of these remarks, I was unimpressed, and forgot about them until the following day, when I learned of the unprecedented outpouring of outrage and condemnation of both the said community member and the particular forum.

The whole episode has since been forgotten, perhaps out of shame, like some drunken excess. But Tillman's memory, too, has been suppressed. One is perplexed at the contrast between the furor over the derogation of Tillman by a lone, powerless actor and the utter silence emanating from the same quarters at an even greater insult, but one perpetrated by the most powerful and influential forces in the land.

I'm referring to the cover-up of the circumstances surrounding Tillman's death, first reported by the Washington Post on May 4. As the opening sentence of the article by Josh White read, "The first Army investigator who looked into the death of former NFL player Pat Tillman in Afghanistan last year found within days that he was killed by his fellow Rangers in an act of 'gross negligence,' but Army officials decided not to inform Tillman's family or the public until weeks after a nationally televised memorial service."

Though the government you know, the folks you and me vote for, unlike the man on the soapbox with no political power – initially concocted a tale involving Tillman being killed while valiantly storming an enemy position, they were well aware that he had in fact been hit by friendly fire as early as a week after his death. As Patrick Tillman, father of the younger Pat, told the San Francisco Chronicle last month, "The administration clearly was using this case for its own political reasons. This cover-up started within minutes of Pat's death, and it started at high levels. This is not something that [lower-ranking] people in the field do."

Certainly, we're faced here with a case of exploitation far greater than that which generated the outrage alluded to above, not only in scale (i.e. a televised national memorial service versus a couple crude and impotent phrases) but in deed. The first party in this tale called Tillman some bad names; the second knowingly used Tillman's memory to drum up support for a war that he himself opposed.

> Certainly, we're faced here with a case of exploitation far greater than that which generated the outrage alluded to above, not only in scale (i.e. a televised national memorial service versus a couple crude and impotent phrases) but in deed.

According to his family and friends, Tillman joined the Rangers after Sept. 11, 2001 to help bring Osama bin Laden to justice. "Pat was very critical of the whole Iraq war," his mother, Mary Tillman, told the Chronicle. Noam Chomsky was "a favorite author" of Tillman's, and a friend had even set up a meeting between Chomsky and Tillman that would have taken place if he had come home alive. (One wonders how long before Tillman's mug shot is placed beside Chomsky's on "discoverthenetwork.org.")

That Tillman was a reader of Chomsky is especially fitting, given the MIT professor and activist's own experience with free speech. Some years ago, in France, Chomsky dared to defend the right of a Holocaust-denier to express his views, however disgusting, unmolested. Merely reaffirming Voltaire, Chomsky has written, "If we don't believe in freedom of expression for people we despise, we don't believe in it at all." Here in the Pioneer Valley, no such defender materialized. The typical response seemed to be that the person in question "got what was coming to him" by being forced to flee and by having his right to speech denied.

Imagine if such rage could ever be harnessed toward something the least bit productive, like holding government accountable – as always, the one true way to honor the memories of the fallen. Because believe it or not, the insult perpetrated against Tillman by our government gets even worse. In June, the head of the CIA, Porter Goss, admitted he had an "excellent idea" where Osama bin Laden was, but was prevented from bringing him to justice by an "international obligation" toward "sovereign states." So what we have is lies, more lies, a cover-up and multiple betrayals of the very reasons Tillman joined the armed services. Last time I checked, the White House's Web site hadn't yet crashed due to negative feedback, nor had the occupants of 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. been run out of town. Why is that?

From inside the Third World

Wesley Miller

Though it's generally not politically correct to do so, I would have to call Mexico a third world country. Why I choose this term and not the more widely used "developing nation" is because I see Mexico as a country subject to the forces around it in the scope of history, politics and economics. This includes Mexico's Spanish colonial past and the current dependence on the U.S. economy. As an American citizen, the concept of the Third World is only something that I've come to understand by being in this culture, talking to its people and, most importantly, from riding the bus.

When I first arrived in Mexico, I was astounded by the level of development and modernization I saw. Other than the inordinate number of taco stands, there was really nothing I could identify visibly in tune with my concept of the "Third World." To this day, I have not seen a single dirt road, donkey or sombrero. Guadalajara, Mexico looks like any other city with national monuments, churches and office buildings. Nobody was starving to death; as a matter of fact, Mexico has one of the highest calorie intakes in the world. So what makes Mexico a third world country?

My first eye-opening experience came in the form of a bus ride to school. A Mexican bus looks more like a Diego Rivera mural than a safe means of getting from point A to point B; a true claustrophobic's nightmare. But on one particular morning, when I thought the 631A was about to burst at the seams, a funny thing happened. At one stop the entire bus emptied out, leaving my fellow students and me in a daze. I looked out the window to see where they all went. They were pouring through the gates into the "Valle Real," a closed housing community for the rich and affluent.

To explain my little narration, let me add a statistic: the top 20 percent of Mexico's income earners account for about 55 percent of the total wealth. The minimum wage in Mexico is about five dollars a day. Unfortunately, that's very high for a Latin American country. Mexico's middle class only makes up about 10 percent of the total population. The discrepancy between the rich and poor population is a very telling characteristic. Whereas for the poor, a Coca-Cola is a delicacy, the means of entertainment for the rich of Mexico or other Latin American countries is more along the lines of something like tiger ownership.

Wealth distribution is a concept left behind by the colonial past. It's important to understand that the effects of high renaissance humanism were never felt in Latin American society. Spain, at the time, was more concerned with mining Mexico's silver than it was with patronizing the arts. The colonial period solidified Latin America's place in the world economy as a group of countries dependent on exporting to support their economies.

To bring the history-economics lesson back to a more personal place, I would like to discuss the coffee situation in this country. I've been searching for a decent cup of coffee ever since I arrived in this country and have come up with only one good cafe: Starbucks. The south of Mexico is actually extremely rich in coffee all the way down through Panama into South America.

Now why can't I get a decent cup of coffee to cool my aching caffeine headaches? To put it simply, Mexico doesn't set the demand for coffee – wealthy countries like the United States do. The same is true for oil. Mexicans pay about the same for gas as we do despite them being far richer in oil wells. In total, the United States buys close to 85 percent of Mexico's exports and is Mexico's largest employer in the forms of factory work and labor inside the United States, legal and illegal.

The Mexicans I've spoken with feel increasingly frustrated with the U.S. trade situation. The 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement, which caused a near collapse of the Mexican Economy, has contributed to widespread anti-American sentiment. Even more frustrating are the problems of drug, crime and government corruption, institutions which are estimated to make up 25 percent of Mexico's GDP.

Two summers ago I had a job as a foreman for a moving crew out of Allston. The guys I worked with were all out of Peru, Mexico and Colombia. I may have claimed to understand their situation at the time, but it's not like I treated them with the kind of respect they deserved. I'm only now starting to realize what it means to come from a "third world country." It's not always some polluted war zone littered with starving children, it can be a place not dissimilar from our own. It's a place someone calls home. Dependent, developing or whatnot – that's something you have to respect.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ALWAYS ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT

I am writing in response to Nick Belanger's Oct. 18 column ("Collegian's hidden agenda"). Mr. Belanger does an excellent job defending the staff of the Collegian. All of you folks down in the basement of the Campus Center really are "the hardest-working, yet most under-appreciated staff of individuals on campus."

But I'm not going to offer only praise. Like many – and perhaps most – students on campus, I read the Collegian every day and I am regularly disappointed. I'm not disappointed every day for the same reason, but rather for a variety of regularly-recurring reasons. I think if confronted by these reasons, the newspaper staff might help boost the Collegian's image on campus.

First, the Collegian does have a problem with grammar. I think it is fair to blame most of the problems on inadequate grammar lessons in junior high and high school. Some of the articles written – and especially the opinion columns – show a fundamental lack of understanding of or concern for English grammar. We're all allowed to forget how to use a semicolon or forget to use commas between items in a list of adjectives, but never is there an excuse for printing pieces that look like rough drafts of an eighth-grade "persuasive essay."

Perhaps the best solution for that problem would be for the Collegian editors to take a firmer stance on article cleanliness. If an article is written so poorly as to be refused by a professor, that article ought not be printed, period. Personally, I would rather see fewer articles of high quality than many articles of inadequate quality.

Also, the Collegian suffers from routine errors in page layout and content. Captions under images suffer from problems, as do headlines on rare occasions. And sometimes the Collegian will advertise an SGA election a day too early, then report that the election lasted for two days when it did not. There is no quick-and-easy solution to these problems, except perhaps for the Collegian to attempt fewer layout tricks so that the editor can focus more intently on those that do appear.

Finally, the Collegian suffers from the same problem of bias found in 24-hour news programs: the bias of sensationalism. Rather than printing newsworthy articles that go into great depth and analysis of serious, campus-related issues, the Collegian will run a headline plucked from the Associated Press. But the Collegian is not the New York Times; it ought to be concerned with campus problems rather than international news, especially now that students can pick up a free copy of the Times or the Boston Globe right next to the Collegian.

Where was the front-page headline on how only 8% of students at the University bothered to turn out for the SGA election? Where was the report on the depressing state of school spirit following Homecoming week? Hell, how many students read in the Collegian that we even had a Homecoming week?

The Collegian, for such a small, under-funded, overworked daily is doing an excellent job. But that doesn't mean that there isn't room for improvement, and I'm sure the entire student body would appreciate it.

BUSH FAILED BEFORE KATRINA

I commend Ethan Burke for his article ("Better, Richer, Whiter New Orleans") on the governmental flaws of the United States. He addressed issues we all need to face. However, I don't believe Hurricane Katrina was the event that exposed Bush and his government's problems. I feel he's been making that obvious since the War on Terrorism began.

On Oct. 13, 2001, The New Orleans Times-Picayune had an entire report of how "federal officials are postponing new projects of the Southeast Louisiana Flood Control Program (SELA) fearing that federal budget constraints and the cost of the war on terrorism may create a financial pinch for the program." Instead of Army Corps of Engineers receiving the bare minimum $82 million needed for a year of construction and the establishment of new projects, the Times-Picayune reported that a mere $62 million was provided.

Here's the kicker: The New Orleans City Business newspaper reported the Corps, which works on constructing, maintaining, and building the levees, would have had a $71.2 million reduction in funding starting in October 2005, which was going to be the single biggest funding loss ever. So, we were going to be doing less work to keep New Orleans safe from a hurricane disaster before Katrina even hit.

The biggest fact everyone has to keep in mind is that the levees were not designed to withstand Katrina's force. They only could withstand a Level 3 Hurricane at best, said David Hewitt, Army Corps of Engineers spokesman. Sadly, if it wasn't for Bush, the Corps had planned on examining the possibility of a breach of the levees if there was a hurricane as strong as a Level 5. Remember, Bush told the Corps not to do any future studies.

Bush has said, "I don't think anyone anticipated breach of the levees." There was a report before Sept. 11, 2001 from the Federal Emergency Management Agency that listed the three disasters most likely to occur in the United States: a terrorist attack in New York, a strong earthquake in San Francisco and a hurricane strike in New Orleans. Funny, despite these warnings, two out of the three catastrophes occurred on Bush's watch. He did not adequately address an area vulnerable to disaster, directly after one already occurred.

When it comes to claiming Katrina is what exposed our government's problems, Washington Post columnist Richard Cohen responded best by saying, "Funny, I thought the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 did that. It was then that we learned about inadequate communications systems, among other things. It was then that our minds were focused on the incomprehensible and that people – not to mention governments – started thinking about the evacuation of whole cities. Bush makes a lousy Boy Scout. Prepared he wasn't."

Isolated cultures meet through Audioslave

By Jim Abbott
The Orlando Sentinel

ORLANDO, Fla. — Audioslave made history in May when it became the first American rock band to play a concert in Cuba, but the milestone wasn't much fun for the group's Orlando fans.

Audioslave postponed a show here at the last minute to do the gig, a performance that finally happens on Wednesday for a sold-out crowd.

"We would be very thankful for the patience of the fans in Orlando," says singer Chris Cornell. "They are also participating in a gesture that goes worldwide. They are showing that the citizens of the United States will put politics aside and reach out to a people and will have a cultural exchange with people who are 90 miles away.

"We are your ambassadors in a sense, and it was an extremely successful trip."

"Live in Cuba," a two-disc DVD of the historic concert, hit stores last week. "It's like a tour diary on video that goes a bunch of places where Americans don't get to go," says Cornell, the ex-Soundgarden singer who teamed with three members of Rage Against the Machine (guitarist Tom Morello, bassist Tim Commerford and drummer Brad Wilk) to release Audioslave's 2002 self-titled debut.

The Cuba trip was an eye-opener for Cornell, who says the band had been advised by State Department officials to be wary of surveillance and other actions by the Cuban government. None of it happened.

"When we got off the plane, they didn't look at anything. They didn't even look inside our suitcases. I remember just out of fascination looking for a place in the hotel room where they could put a camera (for spying purposes)."

What the band did see was an audience thirsty for the powerful experience of a rock concert.

"There were people dancing wildly to what we did; there were a lot of people just watching in amazement, trying to drink in what was going on and to understand it. It's impossible for me to put myself in the shoes of someone in the audience. It was like we were from another planet.

"You kind of take that away when you leave Cuba. It's 90 miles away, yet it is so completely different because the cultures are so isolated. At the end of the day, my hope is that what we did will create less isolation between the two countries or the two cultures regardless of politics."

Back in the States, Audioslave is approaching its current concert tour with a new sense of its own identity. Its sophomore album, "Out of Exile," has pushed the band beyond the perception of a short-term supergroup.

Although some critics found room for improvement in the album, Spin likened the slashing "Man or Animal" to the best stuff on "Led Zeppelin II."

As the band settles into its permanent identity, it has been dipping back into the Rage and Soundgarden archives more frequently. An acoustic version of Soundgarden's "Black Hole Sun" has become a concert staple.

Cornell, 41, says the band always felt that its future would be a long one.

"We just couldn't respond to the media about it," he says. "First, it shows desperation, and it's also kind of futile. Once you put the records out, the music would speak for itself. We knew from day one that as time goes on, it will distance us from the subject. It's just like every time Soundgarden put an album out, we got further away from people writing about the fact that geographically we were from the same place as Pearl Jam and Nirvana. Those stories kind of went away."

Also gone were the rocky times that marked the band's early days, an atmosphere fueled by Cornell's pending divorce and addiction problems. "Out of Exile" is a reference to his new state of mind: happily married, off drugs and expecting to soon become a father for the second time.

Cornell says the completion of the band's second album "was a little more efficient."

"My head was much more in it. We were able to write very quickly, all four of us in the room, and to do that, you have to be very present and very open-minded."

That feeling has extended into the band's tour, where the members are continuing to compose songs for a third album.

"We want to have the next record filled up with songs that were performed for people before they were done in studio," Cornell says.

Montreal's Stars 'set fire' to Iron Horse with sex and politics

By David Pissah
Collegian Staff

On Stars' Web site it describes those most sensible people" get by all the winter in their hometown of Montreal, Canada — they spend their time indoors, trying to combat the cold by drinking red wine, getting high and having sex. Remind anyone of the Amherst winter? This year Stars ditched the drugs and sex at home and took it on the road. Tomorrow they hit the stage at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall in support of their recent album, "Set Yourself on Fire."

"Set Yourself on Fire" is the band's third album. It is 13 songs covering the ins and outs of sex, relationships and political protest. Their Web site says they initially intended to write a jazz record and ended up writing an album about sex, death and robots. While the death and robots aspects of the album are subtle, the band's sexual focus is apparent.

The album begins with a spoken word piece which sets the mood. "I am there is nothing left to burn, you have to set yourself on fire." It is simultaneously upsetting and empowering. It is difficult to imagine these sentiments being linked until you hear the song that immediately follows.

The Stars describe this song, "Your Ex-Lover Is Dead," as being "a story of half-regret, of seeing someone you once fed at a party, knowing they never hurt you the way they could've, and feeling awkward, hateful and oddly wistful about it." The song details the story of the encounter, with dual singers Torquil Campbell (a guy — he's Canadian) and Amy Millan telling their sides. It could have been a bitter meeting, but throughout the song both express regret, apathy and closure as they sing the ending lines, "I'm not sorry I met you I'm not sorry it's over I'm not sorry There's nothing to say."

Stars' music is indie-pop at its best. A mix of Death Cab guitars, Postal Service synths and tight drumming by newcomer Pat McGee, it has an airy ambiance that is perfect for long drives, headphones and mood music. As singer Amy Millan said in a recent interview, "I think people will have sex to it, for sure."

Don't get me wrong, though. This does not mean the Stars will not be able to rock the Iron Horse. The music is airy, but it soars. "Ageless Beauty" rides a driving guitar line and strong drum beat while "The First Five Times" — a song about the first five times a couple had relations – plays to a jumpy guitar reminiscent of Andre 3000's "Hey Ya."

Stars aren't slutty, though. The songs about sex lead to love. The songs about love lead to sex. With the Stars, they are always intertwined. As with all relationships in

How to take control of a relationship and not be your partner's servant

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

In any relationship, there is a master-servant paradigm. The term is shocking, but it's true; think about any interaction with anyone. With your teachers or with your friends, if you're talking about something and you know more about the topic than the other person, you are the master, and he or she is the servant. As you read this, I'm the master, and you're the servant.

Over the course of time in any healthy relationship, the master and servant relationship changes — sometimes you're the master, sometimes you're the servant — this creates an understanding of equality. But what happens when one person is consistently in the servant position, and the other constantly has authority? Although it's more abstract than explicit, the type of relationship I'm describing is a lot more common than most people realize.

It starts out innocently enough. He pursues, is charming and wonderful, and she gracefully plays into the game. Eventually, they're a couple. Time passes, and eventually he feels he no longer needs to impress her or win her over, because in his mind he's already done the work. He's gotten comfortable in third gear, and doesn't realize there's still fourth and fifth to get to. Guys, keep doing the things you did to win her over and you'll have a much happier girlfriend.

When he doesn't do this, she gets a little frustrated; what happened to the guy she wanted to date? And he commonly has no idea anything's wrong.

Then the two fall into gender roles. He's the guy, he calls the shots. Eventually, he does or says something he knows he shouldn't. At this point, the guy is testing his boundaries: How far can he go? How much will she accept? The girl, confused at his behavior, at first gets angry.

"I was just kidding," he says,

"You know I didn't mean it. I'm sorry." But the "I'm sorry" isn't heartfelt. Not wanting to fight, the girl backs down, sometimes apologizing for getting mad at him in her effort to keep the peace.

In scenarios like that, the power exchange is completely unequal. The guy had all the power; he did or said something he shouldn't have, something that the girl didn't like. She got mad and expressed her feelings. He diffuses the situation and discredits her feelings, making her feel wrong for having those feelings. She apologizes.

Relationships that echo that imbalance of power will never be happy or fulfilling. The girl, whether she realizes it or not, is not being respected, and the guy, having learned he can get away with smaller acts that the girl didn't really like, begins to think it is okay to do those things, and will naturally continue to press the boundaries further.

Why do girls back down so easily? We're still wrestling with the idea that we need a boyfriend or man in our lives to be complete as women, and that we can't simply stand for what we want as it might rock the boat too much. Many girls let the guy call the shots far too often.

Ladies, ask yourselves: are you letting your man press his boundaries? Why? Is he that special? Anything he does, you're going to let him get away with? Have people told you they don't like the way he treats you? If so, why do you try to satisfy him when he is not satisfying you? Why are you accepting the servant role in the master-servant paradigm over and over again?

There is one way to turn the tables if you've become locked into the role of the servant. You have to be willing to "die" for the cause. This was demonstrated in the Revolutionary War and again in the Civil War. But dying does not necessarily mean loss of life; with worker strikes it means to strike against their place of employment, knowing that the risk involved is losing the job. In a relationship, it means standing up for what you believe in and knowing that you could lose the relationship, when being in a relationship is something valuable to you.

If a girl who's taken the servant role suddenly takes a stand and tells her boyfriend, "I'm not going to take this, if you do this again I'm breaking up with you," he probably won't believe her at first. She never stood up for herself before, why now? He'll probably laugh and tell her that they're not breaking up, thinking that even if she did, she'd be back. This is when you prove him wrong. Break up with him, don't call him and don't talk to him online for the first few days. Let him sweat it out a little; he'll know you mean business.

Then, if he really values you and the relationship you share, he'll keep trying, and he'll apologize for whatever he did. At this point the tables have been turned; the girl is no longer the servant, and the guy is, knowing he can no longer play around and get away with it. This switch is vital to the health of any relationship; boys will be boys, and that means they'll all press the boundaries in some way at some point. As the girl, it's your job to let him know it's not going to fly.

Security deposit law

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q: We paid a $2,000 security deposit at the beginning of our tenancy. The tenancy ended Aug. 31. In September we got a letter from our landlord, which made deductions in the amount of $730. The damage listed in the letter was $500 for a new refrigerator and $150 for cleaning the carpets. The landlord also deducted $80 for a telephone bill, which we did owe. The refrigerator was old and in need of replacement, so we don't think we should have to buy a new one. We admit that a plastic peg holding one of the refrigerator shelves up did break during the tenancy, but we did not do anything to cause the break. The carpets were worn and dirty looking when we moved in so we don't feel we should have to pay for cleaning. What can we do?

A: Your landlord is only entitled to deduct for damages caused by you, and not for normal wear and tear to the apartment. Since the refrigerator was old and in poor condition to begin with, you cannot be held responsible for the cost of a new refrigerator. At most, you could be liable for the cost of a new peg, although it most likely will be considered normal wear and tear since refrigerators are not designed to last forever, and it was time for the landlord to replace it. A tenant is only required to leave an apartment in broom clean condition.

Many local landlords do not want to spend any money cleaning an apartment to make it ready for the next tenant, so they will deduct from the previous tenant's security deposit to cover what is a necessary business expense. In Massachusetts, tenants' security deposits are legally protected, and mishandling can be costly to the landlord. The law requires that the deposit be placed in an escrow account, and that the tenant be given a receipt showing the amount of the deposit (which cannot exceed one month's rent), the account number and bank where the deposit is held. A statement of condition should be filled out at the beginning of the tenancy noting any problems or pre-existing damage.

Within 30 days of the end of the tenancy, the landlord is required to return the security deposit plus interest. If there are any deductions, the landlord must provide written evidence of the damages including receipts, invoices, bills and estimates, signed under the pains and penalties of perjury. If the landlord does not follow the requirements of the law, he can be held liable for three times the security deposit for wrongful deductions.

In your case, the landlord has run afoul of the law on several accounts. First, he deducted for reasonable wear and tear in the case of the refrigerator and pre-existing damages in the case of the carpeting. Secondly, it was wrong for the landlord to deduct the telephone bill from the deposit, even though you admit that you owe it. The law permits deductions only for rent owed and damages to the premises. Since the telephone bill is not rent, it cannot be deducted.

In cases where a landlord has deducted for pre-existing damages, it will be important for the tenant to establish the condition of the apartment at the beginning of the tenancy. This is best done by taking care to note all problems on the statement of condition and making sure to keep a copy. Particularly where the landlord has agreed to repairs, it is important that there be a written record, and that follow up letters be written to document the problems.

It is important to take photographs at the beginning and end of the tenancy, because they will be the best evidence in the case of a dispute with your landlord. It is recommended that you write a letter to the landlord questioning the deductions and giving him the opportunity to return the $730 withheld. If the landlord fails to refund your money then you can file a small claims complaint in the housing court. If you win this case, the court will award you triple damages, court costs and attorneys fees.

'Development's' future uncertain

By Tom Maurstad
The Dallas Morning News

Here's a prediction: When "Arrested Development" is canceled midway through its third season as viewers continue to stay away in droves, the production will be scooped up by some cable network, HBO or maybe FX, where it will find its audience and flourish.

And you know what will change about the show? Nothing. That's how good Fox's funniest sitcom is. (Roll over Homer Simpson and tell the "Family Guy" the news.) You could move it to the ratings-free realm of "Deadwood" and "Weeds" and you wouldn't have to change a thing. You shouldn't, in fact, because it's perfect just the way it is.

The show's actors and writers are so smart and in sync with each other, they have found a way to use the restrictions of working on network television to make the show even sharper and funnier. Language is an inevitable stumbling block for network television seeking to seem natural and authentic (not to mention, funny). "Arrested Development" is full of characters that you just know would be inclined to curse a blue streak. The show doesn't shy away from this; the characters go ahead and curse — the show just bleeps them.

The effect is far funnier than if, a la "The Sopranos," the f-bombs flew. Bleeping out the profanities not only fits but enhances the show's comic edge, all about a family driven crazy by everybody's need to hide their desperation and misery behind a happy and healthy façade (that's why the family lives in a model home that looks great but is actually falling apart). When you learn (at least I did, anyway) on one of the commentaries of the three-disc Season Two collection that the show is also prohibited from showing the actors' mouths at those moments, the scenes become even funnier as you watch the ridiculous ways they come up with for hiding their cursing mouths.

Once you know what they're doing and why, a whole new level of clever and subversive hilarity is revealed. Of course, it's no surprise that the blooper reel captures the actors tossing out strings of non-sequitur profanities when they flub lines: Everyone needs a little release now and then. Be sure to listen to audio commentaries accompanying an episode on each disc. They are the exception to the don't-bother rule of DVDs. The back-and-forth banter among cast and writers makes for irresistible eavesdropping. Everybody should have so much fun at work.

This is a television show that was made for DVD viewing. You want to watch scenes and episodes over and over, to laugh at this line again, and to marvel at this actor's expression. The writing, the performances, the depth of talent, it's all there. Here's a question to keep you blogging for a few months: Who's funnier and why, David Cross or Will Arnett? All are so consistently superior, you can't help but wonder: How did this show ever get on television?

Michael Bluth visits his white collar criminal father in prison in Fox's hilarious but unpopular comedy, "Arrested Development."

life, this doesn't mean all is always peachy. The songs about breaking up plead for "One More Night" while "Reunion" pleads for an old lover to come back and give the singer "one more chance to show me you were right for me." As Amy Milan put it, "the biggest influences on the album would be having the best sex of your life and also having the hardest time going through love."

Stars are about a "soft revolution." It's about the world according to love. It's about ending the Bush administration with sex, (these Canadians are not Bush fans). It's about chasing the demons out of town. And it's about setting yourself on fire, which Stars describe as "carrying all the relationships in your life and setting yourself and your own world on fire if things aren't working out rather than staying stagnant." Tonight at the Iron Horse, everything should work out for them, but don't expect them to be stagnant or they might set themselves on fire

Hatchell and Hatchell

...tackles in 2005, an extensive ...of doubt has suddenly altered ...defensive domination by the ...Hatchells.

"One of the reasons why ...and the defense and all of the other linebackers were ...successful is because ...players this years, ...outstanding," Jason ...says. "They're grabbing, holding guys, they're making sure ...three tackles for a loss, ...broken up pass and one ...double on the season.

...was amassed 25 tackles, ...of them for a loss and two ...with one of them resulting ...safety during the team's ...Fighting of Albany.

...the season, the success was ...overdue for both of them.

"It was a long time coming, ...both went through our rocky ...," Jason says. "I feel we ...deserve it, we both worked ...hard in the off season, it's something we both want, it can't be better."

Perhaps it was the chemistry the two had built together on their high school football team, or on their high school wrestling team together, or even at the dinner table at home, but whatever it was, the Hatchell brothers have been a force this season on defense. John and Jason's success have resulted in two shutouts, many sore tailbacks and two proud parents.

"Competitiveness always runs in our blood, we've always competed since we were little kids. [John Hatchell Sr.] has always been an athlete," Jason says. "It's in our blood, but we're the first true college athletes, so it's good to represent our family in that way also.

"It makes them real proud, it makes it a lot easier for them, going to one college football game, instead of two. They're real proud, they couldn't be happier right now, they've been coming to every game and just supporting me and my brother."

With five games remaining for the Minutemen, four of them being essential conference games, the two brothers will take the field once again. And aside for their everlasting love for the game of football, there is that one other connection between them.

Junior John Hatchell has had a breakout season in 2005, amounting a total of 25 tackles, four tackles for a loss and two sacks.

Redshirt sophomore Jason Hatchell leads the UMass defense in tackles this season with a total of 57 and has one forced fumble.

Minutewomen await Dartmouth

Saraceno if they want to come out on top tonight. Saraceno is The Big Green's leading playmaker, as well as the Ivy League assist leader with seven on the season.

UMass will also have to pay close attention to senior Lindsay Gossage at all times. Gossage leads the team in points with 11, and is tied for 10th in program history in assists.

The Maroon and White will also have to be on the lookout for Dartmouth sophomore Whitney Waugh. Waugh was the Ivy League's Field Hockey Player of the Week last week, with three goals and one assist. She is second on the team in points with 10, and is the team's leading goal-scorer with four on the season.

Tonight's showdown against Dartmouth will be the last game for UMass to prepare for its final three conference foes, and while it may not count in the A-10 standings, Shea believes this game is huge.

"This game is very important," Shea said. "It is a chance to prepare ourselves and get ourselves ready for what we are going to do in the upcoming weekend. It is also a huge regional game for us. It is a chance to get us back on top within our regional play, and against our regional opponents."

Hamlin injured outside of club

Culp released a security videotape showing Hamlin breaking free from club security guards and pursuing the suspects after the initial altercation subsided.

Hamlin was found lying in an intersection outside the club a few blocks north of Qwest Field, surrounded by a crowd of people.

Hamlin told the officers he was in a lot of pain, and when asked what happened, he said, "I don't remember."

The report said Hamlin did not appear intoxicated.

Seahawks president Tim Ruskell issued a statement Monday that said, in part: "We are working in concert with the Seattle Police Department. The fact that this is an active assault investigation prevents us from further comment at this time."

"The only difficulty I have with this is, it's such a waste," Seahawks coach Mike Holmgren said. "It seems rather pointless. It's not like you are playing a football game and all of a sudden you get hit and you get injured.

"It's one of those things that shouldn't have happened." Holmgren talked to his team about it in an afternoon meeting. The NFC West-leading Seahawks then said a team prayer for Hamlin.

Holmgren said Marquand Manuel, a fourth-year veteran from Florida, will replace Hamlin and make his first career start Sunday against Dallas.

Hamlin had five tackles in Seattle's 42-10 win over Houston.

Format could be 'Big' for Big East

By Todd Rosiak
Knight Ridder

MILWAUKEE — From the moment it was first discussed as a possibility, the new 16-team Big East has been expected to set new standards and accomplish things never before seen in men's college basketball.

It would consist of the largest number of high-profile, tradition-rich programs. It would boast the largest conglomeration of super-talented players and ultra-recognizable coaches. It would also become the first conference to send eight teams to the NCAA tournament.

That's right, eighth.

To put that heretofore magic number into perspective, consider that since the tournament field was expanded to include 64 teams in 1985, one league has qualified seven teams for the Big Dance on only five occasions. The Big Ten did it in 1990, 1997, 1999 and 2001 and the Big East did it in 1991.

Ultimately, none of those teams went on to win the national title. But then again, none got the regular-season preparation night in and night out that those in the expanded Big East are preparing for this season.

The overall star power of years past might be somewhat lacking but the quality and depth from top to bottom is there.

"They're going to get eight teams in every year," ESPN college basketball analyst Digger Phelps said. "You just want to get in the hunt. You can be a 5 seed and win it like Syracuse did a few years ago. Just get in it. Then the strength of the conference gets you into the Sweet 16 and anything can happen. You saw that happen last year with West Virginia."

Adds ESPN and CBS analyst Bill Raftery: "I would think with these 16 teams, some of them are going to be 16-14 but those 14 losses will be to teams like a Louisville, a Syracuse, a Connecticut. Quality losses."

The league has sent six teams to the NCAAs in three of the last four years, a number bettered only by the Southeastern Conference over the same span. Two — Syracuse in 2003 and Connecticut in 2004 — won the national title, and West Virginia came within an overtime period of advancing to the Final Four last season.

But by adding the likes of Louisville — the team that knocked the Cinderella Mountaineers out in an Elite Eight classic — and perennial tournament qualifier Cincinnati from Conference USA into the mix, and also taking into account a rising holdover like Georgetown, it's clear that those involved with the Big East think something special is indeed in store this year.

"I never talked about numbers with our people," Commissioner Mike Tranghese said. "I just said obviously with the kind of quality that we have there's no reason to think that we can't generate more teams qualifying for the tournament. I think this is historical. This is a path that no one's ever traveled before, this many good teams in one league. What's it going to lead to?"

Connecticut and Villanova appear to be the cream of the crop at first glance, with both boasting battle-tested starting lineups and depth.

The Huskies lost Charlie Villanueva and incoming recruit Andrew Bynum to the National Basketball Association and have major questions at point guard, where expected impact players Marcus Williams and A.J. Price have been suspended indefinitely and little-known Craig Austrie and Robert Garrison are expected to fill the breach.

Still, the cupboard is far from bare for coach Jim Calhoun. He returns super forward Rudy Gay, a pre-season favorite for player of the year in the conference, talented junior center Josh Boone and scorer Rashad Anderson while at the same time welcoming top-50 recruit Jeff Adrien.

The Wildcats, meanwhile, return their top eight players from the team that last season fell one disputed call short of upsetting eventual national champion North Carolina in the Sweet 16. Leading the way will be guards Allan Ray and Randy Foye, both of whom can penetrate just as easily as fill it up from long range.

Villanova also has two of the most talented big men in the Big East in seniors Curtis Sumpter and Jason Fraser. Both are coming off major knee injuries, but if they can return to form they'll make the Wildcats' starting lineup one of the best in the country.

Syracuse is expected to take a step back because of a lack of experience and consistency on the interior but does have All-American candidate Gerry McNamara back at guard. West Virginia has most of the key parts back from its ballyhooed NCAA team of last year, including hot-shooting big man Kevin Pittsnogle. Pittsburgh should also be in the mix with the return of senior point guard Carl Krauser.

Among the newcomers, Louisville will be forced to retool its lineup drastically but, as usual, has plenty of talent to work with. Assuming big men David Padgett (a Kansas transfer) and Juan Palacios recover quickly from off-season foot injuries, the Cardinals should be in the mix at the top of the league standings all season.

Cincinnati returns plenty of talent but how its players respond to interim coach Andy Kennedy remains to be seen. DePaul also has a new coach in Jerry Wainwright who must replace three senior starters, and South Florida continues its rebuilding project.

Marquette, coming off two consecutive National Invitation Tournament berths, has a full contingent of 13 scholarship players for the first time in two seasons. The bad news is six have yet to play in a Division I game and the Golden Eagles' inside game is unproven.

There is talent, though. Senior Steve Novak is among the country's top shooters, sophomore transfer Dan Fitzgerald can play multiple positions and freshmen Dominic James, Jerel McNeal and Wes Matthews are top-100 recruits who figure to get plenty of playing time right off the bat.

Considering there will be no "gimme games" from this point forth, MU must hope its newcomers find their stride early and its returnees display their off-season development quickly. If they don't, the Golden Eagles could be in for a long inaugural season in college basketball's premier conference.

"It's going to be an NCAA tournament feel every night," coach Tom Crean said. "You've got to have that emotion in your game and in your team to pull it out. This is very much like it is in other power conferences and especially the NBA: You've got to deal with adversity head-on, you've got to deal with it quick and you've got to move on.

"You can't be too high when you win, you can't be too low when you lose. You've got to move on to the next thing."

Strict testing for Olympics in Italy

By Andrew Dampf
Daily Collegian Reporter

ROME — Italy's drug laws are so strict that the head of the IOC and the president of the World Anti-Doping Agency are calling for a moratorium during the Turin Winter Games.

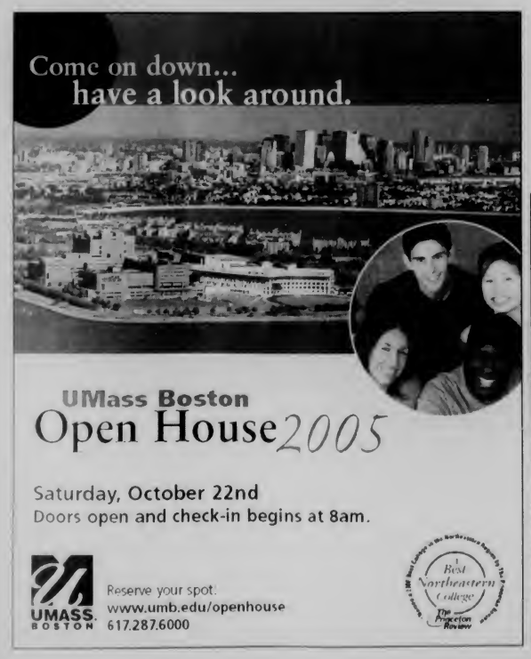
IOC president Jacques Rogge and WADA president Dick Pound are backing a proposal that the laws be suspended during the Feb. 10-26 Games.

Italy is one of the few countries that imposes criminal sanctions for doping offenses, on top of the normal sporting sanctions. Under International Olympic Committee rules, athletes face disqualification for a doping offense — but no criminal penalties.

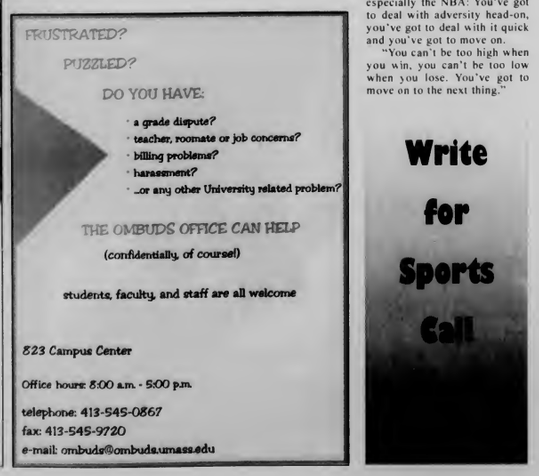
The Olympic rules and the WADA code never contemplated having doped athletes locked up," Pound told The Globe and Mail of Toronto last week. "Just get them out of sport."

IOC member Mario Pescante, the Italian government's supervisor for the Turin Games, is expected to submit a proposal to Italy's Senate on Wednesday calling for the moratorium.

"You think American professional hockey players, paid in the millions, will risk being put in handcuffs to come play in Turin? Come on, let's be realistic," Pescante said in an interview with the Turin newspaper La Stampa.



But Italian legislators are reluctant to make any change. Deputy Premier and Foreign Minister Gianfranco Fini said Tuesday he is against suspending the law.



"I believe that one of the principles of sports is fairness. An athlete who uses banned substances comes under this principle, and therefore I would not support measures to render our legislation — which is one of the most just and severe in the world — weaker for people who use (banned) substances."

Turin is home to one of Italy's top anti-doping prosecutors, Raffaele Guariniello. And Italy has been a pioneer in the fight against doping.

Back in 1991, soccer legend Diego Maradona was suspended from the country's top league for 15 months after testing positive for cocaine. In 1999, Italian bicycling star Marco Pantani was kicked out of the Giro d'Italia while wearing the leader's pink jersey after failing a random blood test.

In 2000, law number 376 was passed, calling for criminal penalties for doping.

Ties of blood on UM defense

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Last spring, the future of two defensive players on the Massachusetts football team was hazy. One of those players, a linebacker, was hampered after he tore his anterior cruciate ligament (ACL) during practices. The other, a nose tackle, had not played in a regular season game for over a year after transferring to UMass from I-AA Lehigh in 2004. Although the two were faced with unrelated situations, there was one overriding connection between these two athletes — their blood.

It was last spring that junior John Hatchell and his younger brother, Redshirt sophomore Jason Hatchell, were ready to create their own future on the Massachusetts football team.

It became more like an establishment than a brotherhood on the defense. John is the burly nose tackle that can bench-press over 500-pounds and thwarts the plans of the offensive linemen. Jason is the speedy one that cracks heads and makes the tackles.

"I think it just really has a lot to do with pushing eachother on the field," John says. "When he's out there, he feeds off me, I feed off him kind of thing."

The establishment of the Hatchell brothers' one-two punch began at Clearview Regional High School in New Jersey. That is exactly where the two began to build a chemistry that would prove to be deadly against opposing offenses in little time.

After John graduated from Clearview and went off to Lehigh, Jason, who went to UMass following his senior year, figured the next time he would meet his brother on the football field, the two would be on opposing teams.

After one year, however, John opted to transfer from Lehigh and for one reason or another ended up with the Maroon and White, and back with his brother.

"I knew some of the coaches that were here, got in contact with them," John says. "I looked here and a couple of other A-10 schools and UMass had a strong interest, I liked what they brought to the table, obviously a chance to play with my brother again."

Due to NCAA rules, John was forced to sit out one year and during the 2004 season, watched Jason, who contributed mostly to special teams, from the sidelines. After the Minutemen posted a 6-5 record, the two brothers, especially John, were ready to take the field again and participating in spring practices.

With spring training underway, the Hatchell double-duo began to fall into place, until a major injury led to what could have been a disastrous setback. During a spring practice, Jason tore his ACL — an injury that has ended the careers of athletes in the past. Jason had three years of football ahead of him and was not about to let his injury hinder him.

And so, during the summer of 2005, the Hatchell Brothers did what they do best — they worked. They trained, sweated, bled and prepared, until there was nothing else left to do. And then they worked some more. They wanted to do whatever they could do to make the 2005 season meaningful.

"When I came out, we knew that we had a lot of guys in place that were just younger last year and we knew that with another year of experience and some hard work, that we could really do some big things this year," John says. "We worked really hard this summer. We were out together on the field about once or twice a week doing some ball drills, working with a lot of defensive stuff."

Heading into the 2005 season, statistically, both brothers had a clean slate to work with — combined games started: zero, combined tackles: six, combined sacks: zero, combined tackles for a loss: zero.

Those statistics altered as the Hatchell brothers have now become an imperative component of a defense that ranks at the top of I-AA football and has let up an average of 2.5 points-per-game.

Holding a No. 8 national ranking and a 5-1 record, both brothers are more pleased with the outcome of the Minutemen's play than their own individual numbers, but with the two starting all

UMass to face The Big Green

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team will take a short break from Atlantic 10 action when they host Dartmouth College (5-7) in a non-conference game tonight at 5 p.m. at Garber Field. It will be the final home game of the season for UMass, as they will look to shut down the Big Green.

The Minutewomen (6-9, 3-1 A-10) are currently on a three-game winning streak and look to keep the momentum heading into their final three A-10 conference games.

UMass is coming off of two big conference wins against La Salle and Westchester this past weekend at Garber Field. The Minutewomen have won their last three A-10 battles, and have improved their conference record to 3-1. They are currently in second place in the A-10, one game behind the Richmond Spiders.

UMass freshman Erin Parker and senior Patricia Borneo are a big reason why the Minutewomen have been successful in conference play. The duo combined for two goals and five assists over the weekend, and they have been rewarded for their excellent play. Parker was named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week on Monday, and Borneo was selected to the WomensFieldHockey.com honor roll.

Minutewomen honored

Massachusetts field hockey freshman forward Erin Parker and senior midfielder Patricia Borneo were rewarded on Monday for their above-average performances this past weekend in conference play. Parker was named the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week, and Borneo was selected to the WomensFieldHockey.com honor roll. Parker and Borneo combined for two goals and five assists in a pair of wins against conference rivals La Salle and West Chester.

Parker had a goal and two assists over the weekend. She knotted an assist less than five minutes into the game on Friday against La Salle when she made a nice pass to freshman Katelyn Orlando, who scored on a one-timer to put the Minutewomen on top early on. UMass went on to win by a score of 4-1.

Parker did most of her damage in a 4-0 victory over West Chester on Sunday, where she had a goal and an assist. She set up the third goal of the game when sophomore Kara Murphy scored on a pass from Parker. Parker then went on to score her second goal of the season less than seven minutes later to put the game out of reach.

Borneo marked herself as the Minutewomen's co-scoring leader over the weekend as she had a goal and three assists. She assisted on two goals in the win over La Salle and got the assist on the first goal against West Chester, which ended up being the game-winner. Borneo recorded her third goal of the season less than four minutes into the second half when she made a nice tip in on the near side post.

The Minutewomen have four games left in the regular season, and their last home game will be played tonight at 5 p.m. at Garber Field. UMass will then finish their season with three conference games on the road as they look to ride their current three-game winning streak into the A-10 tournament.

The UMass field hockey team has made the best of its conference schedule so far, winning three games in a row. Erin Parker and Patricia Borneo were honored this week for their performances this past weekend.

Shea had it right all-along

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Don't look now, but the Massachusetts field hockey team is slowly making their way up the standings.

Nearly two weeks ago, the Minutewomen (6-9, 3-1 A-10) had lost their fifth straight game against No. 20 Richmond. Things did not look good for the Maroon and White, as their record dropped from a hopeful 3-4 to a dismal 3-9 and 0-1 in conference play.

Just two weeks later, what do you have?

You have a team that is in second place in the Atlantic 10 with a 3-1 conference record. You have a team on a three-game winning streak. You have a complete reversal of fortune, and a team that looks to be unstoppable down the stretch.

But we shouldn't be surprised. Coach Patty Shea has been saying it all along.

"[Conference play] is a brand new season," Shea said. "This is where it is. This is the conference. This is the bread and butter."

During their tough times before conference play began, Shea said all the right things, gave all of the clichés that any coach would give the media while they were struggling. She never panicked, and up until this past weekend, one could only wonder why.

It wasn't about the outcome of the 11 non-conference games that they have played. It wasn't about their 3-8 record going into conference play. It was about improvement in those eleven games. It was about looking into the eyes of your teammates, knowing what you did wrong, and correcting it.

If you watched the non-conference games or looked at the box score, you could tell that the Minutewomen were struggling.

So we thought.

As it turns out, they weren't struggling at all. In fact, they were just getting better. Everything Patty Shea said has gone from typical cliché, to the New Testament of winning formulas.

"Our emphasis is not necessarily the outcome as much as it is our performance," Shea said during non-conference play. "Our goal is to get better with all of these games that we play. Our emphasis is gaining confidence in our play because that is where we have to control our destiny. That is where we play our way into a championship and into the NCAA tournament."

Since the "new season" has started, the Minutewomen have gone 3-1 and recorded their first shutout of the season on Sunday with a 4-0 win over West Chester. Conference play has not only shown us UMass' outstanding defensive improvements, but it has also given us a sneak peek at what this offense is capable of doing.

The Minutewomen have outscored their opponents 11-3 during their three-game winning streak. Compare that to the 15 goals that they scored in their first 11 non-conference games, and you have a team that looks like they did not start trying until they saw their A-10 rivals on the schedule.

That is certainly not the case.

The Minutewomen bought into the system of Patty Shea. They did not lose confidence in themselves. Instead, they stayed together as a team and listened to the woman who has lead UMass to five Atlantic 10 Championships.

Not a bad idea, huh?

As the season continues, the Minutewomen will play three more conference games — all on the road. And if they continue to follow the preaching of Shea, then the Maroon and White will be dancing in the A-10, and possibly, the NCAA tournament.

Once again, we shouldn't be surprised.

Patty Shea has been saying it all along.

Hamlin's health still uncertain

By Gregg Bell
Associated Press

KIRKLAND, Wash. — The Seattle Seahawks are more concerned with Ken Hamlin's health than when — or if — he'll be able to rejoin the team.

The starting free safety was in serious, but stable condition early Tuesday with a fractured skull and other head injuries following a fight outside a downtown Seattle nightclub.

"It's pretty tough," said cornerback Marcus Trufant, whose locker is next to Hamlin's. "I'm very concerned about his health and I'm just hoping and praying that everything goes well."

Hamlin's injuries included a small blood clot and bruising of brain tissue. He was to remain in intensive care for the next day or two, team physician Stan Herring said. Herring said doctors are waking up Hamlin every hour or two to ensure he is still stable.

The fight may have also involved a homicide, according to a published report. A 31-year-old man who was killed near the city's Seward Park on Monday morning was involved in the fight with Hamlin, a man claiming to be the brother of the victim told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer for a story published Tuesday.

Tramaine Isabell saw video of the fight on Seattle TV newscasts and identified one of the men as his brother, Jerrell Milam. Isabell told the newspaper the video showed Milam punching Hamlin and knocking him to the ground, and that Milam was the man found dead by a jogger three hours later near Seward Park.

Police spokesman Rich Pruitt confirmed on his office phone voice mail early Tuesday morning that there was a homicide in south Seattle on Monday morning. He also told the newspaper that police were interested in speaking to Isabell, but added, "At this time, we have no proof there is a connection" between the death and Hamlin's assault.

According to a police report, Hamlin and his girlfriend were leaving Larry's Nightclub in the Pioneer Square section of Seattle at about 2 a.m. Monday, several hours after the Seahawks defeated the Houston Texans.

The girlfriend told officers that Hamlin placed his hand on another man's back and said, "Excuse me." The man told Hamlin to stop pushing, and the men began shoving each other.

According to the report, Hamlin then punched the man in the face; Herring said Hamlin has a fractured right hand. Another man struck Hamlin with his forearm, knocking him down, before the two men began fighting with other men nearby.

Witnesses provided the names of two men to police but there had been no arrests, Seattle police spokeswoman Debra Brown said Monday.

The club's owner, Larry Culp, said his security guards kept Hamlin separated from the two suspects outside for about 15 minutes as the bar was emptying at closing time. He said guards tried to restrain Hamlin several times and the other man started to back down, but "as the head of my security team turned his head, (Hamlin) went after him.

"He had plenty of chances to walk away from this incident," Culp said, adding Hamlin "went out of his way" to provoke a fight.

Conte gets four months in prison

By David Krawtis
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Victor Conte was sentenced to four months in prison and four months' home confinement Tuesday for his role as the mastermind in a scheme to provide pro athletes with undetectable banned drugs.

Conte, who negotiated a plea deal with federal prosecutors, started the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative. The lab, according to court records, counted dozens of prominent athletes among its clients, including baseball's Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi and Olympic track and field star Marion Jones.

Greg Anderson, Bonds' trainer and friend since childhood, was sentenced to three months behind bars and three months in home confinement after pleading guilty to money laundering and a steroid distribution charge.

James Valente, BALCO's vice president, was sentenced to probation after pleading guilty to reduced charges of steroid distribution.

Outside the courthouse, Conte read a statement saying he wanted to rid the sporting world of steroids.

"I've decided to direct my knowledge, experience and determination toward making sports more honorable for the athletes and fans," Conte said.

The case prompted pro sports to stiffen steroid policies and thirst performance-enhancing drugs into the spotlight. BALCO, a steroid uncovered in the investigation, is now banned throughout sports.

Conte pleaded guilty in July to money laundering and a steroid distribution charge; dozens of counts were dropped as part of his plea deal. Anderson and Conte, who remain free on bond, are scheduled to surrender to prison authorities Dec. 1.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in San Francisco has said the plea deals, which some anti-doping officials have criticized as too lenient, were spurred in part by weak steroid laws and by the fact that some of the chemicals were not banned at the time.

Police seek help in female assault cases

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

For the second time in less than a week, the University of Massachusetts police have issued a "crime alert" to seek assistance from the public regarding on-going criminal investigations.

The most recent alert asks for help regarding two assaults on females in the Southwest Residential Area.

Police say they received a report of a female student who "was accosted by an unknown male" when she exited her vehicle in Lot 33 early Wednesday morning.

The suspect is described as white, college-aged with a groomed beard, wearing a baseball cap, a blue hooded sweatshirt with the word "Boston" written in white letters on the front, dark pants and an eyebrow ring.

Anyone with information regarding this case should call UMass police at 413-545-2121 or contact police anonymously online at www.umass.edu/umpd/About_Us/Anonymous_Witness/.

As reported in the Daily Collegian just over one week ago, a female claims to have been sexually assaulted in the area between Lincoln Ave. and Sunset Ave. around 2:18 a.m. on Friday, Oct. 7.

The woman, who was only identified as a 21-year-old UMass student, told police a man approached her and knocked her to the ground. The man touched her breasts, but she was not raped, according to police.

The suspect in this case is described as a college-aged white male, six feet tall, wearing a white t-shirt and a Red Sox hat.

Anyone with information regarding this case should call the Amherst police at 413-256-4015.

A crime alert was lifted on Monday by UMass police regarding a case of vandalism after a suspect in the case turned himself in. The suspect has not been identified, but police confirmed that the suspect is a male UMass student.

On Tuesday, Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald told the Daily Collegian that police are still searching for two other suspects in the case.

UMass police declined comment on any of the cases as of press time.

The University is now offering safety escorts with members of the Residence Hall Security Staff. Any student can call 413-545-2123 Sunday through Wednesday from 7 p.m. to 12 a.m., Thursday from 7 p.m. to 2 a.m. and Friday and Saturday from 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. for an escort.

The crime alert can be viewed online at www.umass.edu/umpd. Personal safety tips are also available on the Web site.

SGA discusses $600K budget surplus

President of the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts, Pavel Payano, proposed new ideas pertaining to the spending of a $600,000 budget surplus at last night's Senate meeting in the Cape Cod Lounge.

The spending of the surplus, which is funded by $82 from every UMass student, is determined by a small group of senators that make up the Way and Means committee.

"The Way and Means committee has a huge responsibility this year. This year, much like the year before, we have been given a huge surplus," said Payano. "Last year we cut [Registered Student Organization] funding, this year we plan to spend differently."

Payano called for members of the Ways and Means committee to meet with each RSO group individually so that every group can grasp a better understanding of the process of RSO funding.

"Last year we had a lot of fraternities and RSOs come to us asking for funding and were denied because they didn't have enough members to qualify as a RSO, or they had made mistakes in the application process" said Payano. "We need to make sure everyone is informed of the proper procedure."

In hopes of improving student events held throughout campus, Payano proposed a 3 percent increase in funds allocated to RSOs for next year. Payano called for an increase in the funding of the annual spring event and concert.

Payano continued by instructing the remaining committees of ideas and goals that should be implemented and met this year.

Payano encouraged the Senate's Academic Policy committee to attending weekly Faculty Senate meetings.

"There has to be more cooperation between ourselves and our faculty," said Payano. "The prime goal should be to increase the student voice on campus by sitting in on these meetings."

Saddam pleads innocent, causes scene in court

By Hazma Hendawi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — A defiant Saddam Hussein pleaded innocent to charges of murder and torture as his long-awaited trial began Wednesday with the one-time dictator arguing about the legitimacy of the court and scuffling with guards.

The first session of the trial lasted about three hours, and the judge ordered an adjournment until Nov. 28.

Saddam and his seven co-defendants could face the death penalty if convicted for the 1982 massacre of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail. They are being tried in the former headquarters of Saddam's Baath Party.

After presiding judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin, a Kurd, read the defendants their rights and the charges against them he asked each for their plea. He started with the 68-year-old ousted dictator, saying, "Mr. Saddam, go ahead. Are you guilty or innocent?"

Saddam replied quietly, "I said what I said. I am not guilty," referring to his arguments earlier in the session.

Amin read out the plea, "Innocent."

The confrontation then became physical. When a break was called, Saddam stood, smiling, and asked to step out of the room. When two guards tried to grab his arms to escort him out, he angrily shook them off.

They tried to grab him again, and Saddam struggled to free himself. Saddam and the guards shoved each other and yelled for about a minute.

It ended with Saddam walking independently, with the two guards behind him, out of the room for the break.

Many Iraqis and others across the Middle East were glued to their television sets to watch the first-ever criminal trial of an Arab leader.

The proceedings were aired with about a 20-minute delay on state-run Iraqi television and on satellite stations across Iraq and the Arab world. However, technical quality was poor, with the sound cutting out frequently and the picture going blank several times.

A too-busy President Bush did not watch, even as the White House hailed the trial as a key step in Iraq's transition to a functioning democracy.

Drunk driving student gets jail

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student who hit and nearly killed another student while driving drunk last year was sentenced to jail yesterday.

In the meantime, UMass students displayed mixed reaction to the sentence last night.

Heather Winchester, 22, of Billerica, pleaded guilty in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton to charges surrounding a Sept. 24, 2004 accident which severely injured Ciara M. Friel, 19, of Dorchester.

Judge Bertha D. Josephson ordered Winchester to three months in jail after she finishes the fall semester.

Winchester was also ordered to perform 100 hours of community service either talking to high school students about the accident or volunteering in a head-trauma unit. In addition, she must pay a $500 fine, attend substance abuse counseling, pay any of Friel's medical bills not covered by health insurance, avoid drugs and alcohol and submit to random screenings.

Before sentencing Winchester, Josephson made her look at pictures of Friel and listen to Friel's emotional testimony.

Friel said in court she thanked God that her friends were with her when the accident happened.

Friel, who had to have three surgeries to reassemble her skull using metal plates, said in court she also had to have brain surgery, which caused her to lose her sense of taste and smell.

The accident occurred at 2:30 a.m. on Sept. 24, 2004 as Friel walked with a group of friends down Commonwealth Ave. near the Mullins Center. The side of the road she was walking on did not have a sidewalk.

According to UMass police, Friel was walking south in the roadway when Winchester hit her. There were no skid marks at the scene and witnesses said the driver did not slow down.

A short time later, police found a car near Emerson dorm in the Southwest Residential Area matching the description of the one that hit Friel. It had a broken windshield and was registered to Winchester.

UMass police officers stood outside Winchester's dormitory for hours while they waited for her to exit her room.

Winchester failed a breath blood-alcohol test eight hours after the accident, according to police.

Friel spent a month in Children's Hospital in Boston after the accident.

Friel had to withdraw from school for the rest of the fall semester and had to reapply for the spring semester.

Winchester reached a plea agreement with prosecutors in the case for pleading guilty to some of the charges against her. A

Parking lot slated for UMass' DuBois Library

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

Many diverse campus construction projects are in the works at the University of Massachusetts, including a new parking lot at the student library.

Since last October, construction has moved along for the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, with an expected end of its phase one concrete pouring and waterproofing this November.

The next sequence will involve putting in planters on the libraries' east side, establishing a handicap accessible parking lot on the west side and various landscape projects.

Just north of Skinner Hall, a new Integrative Science Building has been scheduled for construction from the spring of 2006 until fall 2008.

The new Llewelyn Derby Track, located near the soccer and softball fields at the north of Stadium Drive, has been completed as of Sept. 30.

"There's a ton of stuff going on," said Henry Merriman, UMass Project Manager. "A lot of work is happening actually that doesn't have a pretty face. We're trying to prepare the campus for changes in the next two years. Some of it is disruptive to campus traffic, but that's the only way we could do it."

Merriman is leading a wide variety of projects at the University, one of the main being the completion of the concrete plaza surrounding the library as well as renovations of Skinner Hall.

He explained that waterproofing was needed so the main floor below it, the new high-tech Learning Commons, could function safely.

"You don't want to have anything leaking over electrical parts," Merriman said. "We're scheduled to be complete with the deck concreting this week. From there, fences surrounding the building will be taken down, slowly opening it for public use."

This plan is being looked over by DCAM, or the Divison of Capital Asset Management, who are in the midst of examining the main floor courtyard area and figuring alternatives in overtaking it. Besides the exterior excavation, mechanical units on the main floor still need to be replaced as well as reconfiguration of the level.

"It's a work in progress," Merriman said. "At the moment, we don't have a designer to this phase."

Du Bois officials mentioned that cement dropping in the plaza was delayed last week due to inclement weather. According to them, the library's main entrance will be reopened this week. Since the beginning of the semester, the public had

Art of Living 'Walks for Youth' and hurricane victims

By Ashish Sahu
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' Art of Living Club hosted a 5K "Walk for Youth" on campus this past Sunday in front of the Student Union to raise money for Hurricane Katrina relief.

Around 100 participants, mostly Five College students, arrived at 9 a.m. to register for the walk. Walkers received t-shirts emblazoned with the 5K Walk logo in addition to snacks such as chips, PowerBars and water, courtesy of corporate sponsors.

The purpose of the walk was to raise awareness for a "Stress Free and Violence Free Society" in North America by empowering youth. More than 15 cities and university campuses across North America held this event simultaneously. Funds raised will support Art of Living Foundation's (AOLF) unique youth empowerment programs as well as trauma relief work for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The participants were welcomed by Denitza Stantcheva, a UMass senior from the English and Spanish department. Walkers started at the Student Union and made their way towards downtown Amherst before looping around Amherst Commons and returning to the Student Union. The UMass crew team and a number of other participants decided to run instead of walk. Some classes offered the walk as a community service option to the students.

After the walk, Sports Illustrated on Campus interns from UMass provided Powerade and workout bags to all participants. Thirteen participants also won raffle prizes such as gift certificates from Eastern Mountain Sports. Other sponsors included Whole Foods Market and Subway. Participants will also receive discounted rates for the next six-day Art of Living course being organized from Oct. 20 to 25. Those interested in attending can contact 781-354-3212 for registration.

Akshaye Sikand, Art of Living teacher and walk coordinator addressed the walkers and spoke about AOLF's worldwide educational and humanitarian programs that have benefited over 20 million people from all backgrounds and cultures. Next year AOLF will celebrate 25 years of service. This will be marked by the adoption of many large scale social projects around the world and a special celebration in Bangalore, India. The celebrations will be attended by 2.5 million people including premiers of many nations and around 1,000 religious and spiritual leaders from across the globe.

The Select Board of the town of Amherst sent a special proclamation recognizing the Art of Living Foundation's work in the local community and commending the 5K Walk for inspiring youth toward creating a stress-free, violence-free society.

The Art of Living Club's work at UMass was also recently commended by Chancellor Lombardi during a special meeting with the club's representatives.

Several UMass students participated in the Art of Living Club's "Walk for Youth," which raised money for hurricane relief on Sunday.

Constuction plans move on at UMass been coming in through the building's west side, which faces Gallaudet University and South College. The new parking lot will be located near these two campus buildings.

"It's really coming along outside the library," said Theresa Warner, assistant director for Administrative Services. "They're setting planters on the deck with benches and railings to provide more outdoor seating. These planters should add vertical foliage. But right now, it's too early to plant due to the winter."

A terraced garden, new lighting, ramps and accessible pathways will run along the finished center.

Emily Silverman, Du Bois director of development and communication, indicated that in the past, access from the Student Union and Machmer building was not handicapped-accessible.

"There will multiple pedestrian pathways which intersect at a circle on the north side," Silverman said. "It will be a nice transition from what it was."

The Llwelyn Derby Track, a $3.11 million project which supersedes an older facility to the west, will include a 400-meter track of nine lanes with such things as high jump areas, a pole vault, and track timing system. According to James Hunt, UMass communications manager for facilities and campus planning, this new site will outshine other universities' athletic grounds.

"This will be one of the premier, state-of-the-art tracks of the East Coast," Hunt said. "All of the construction was top drawer. All we need to do is paint stripes onto the track itself. At this point, it is the only thing left to do."

In April, work began on the construction due to bonds funded through the UMass Building Authority and it concluded Sept. 30. Located to the west of the Rudd Soccer Field and Softball Field, Hunt stated the facility will be open shortly for the men and women's track teams.

Saddam faces judge in first day of trial

"Saddam Hussein is facing Iraqi justice," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. "The trial is a symbol that the rule of law is returning to Iraq. We hope this trial will help bring some closure for the Iraqi people to their country's dark past."

The Dujail trial is the first of about a dozen cases prosecutors intend to bring against Saddam and members of his inner circle in an attempt to hold them accountable for a 23-year regime that saw tens of thousands of Iraqis killed and imprisoned.

Other cases likely will tackle his regime's Anfal Offensive that killed 180,000 Kurds, a poison gas attack on Halabja that killed 5,000 and a crackdown on rebellious Shiites and Kurds in 1991.

The five-judge panel will both hear the case and render a verdict. The identities of the judges have been a tightly held secret to ensure their safety, though Amin's name was revealed just before the trial began. The courtroom camera repeatedly focused on him, without showing the others.

At the trial's opening, Saddam stood and asked the presiding judge: "Who are you? I want to know who you are.

"I do not respond to this so-called court, with all due respect to its people, and I retain my constitutional right as the president of Iraq," he said. "Neither do I recognize the body that has designated and authorized you, nor the aggression because all that has been built on false basis is false."

Amin, a Kurd, tried to get Saddam to formally identify himself but Saddam refused and finally sat. Amin read his name for him, calling him the "former president of Iraq," bringing a protest from Saddam, who insisted he was still in the post.

Later, Amin read the defendants their rights and the charges against them, and told them they face possible execution if convicted. Saddam slumped low in his chair and near the end of the hearing asked for a yellow pad, on which he wrote some notes.

The chief prosecutor, Jaafar al-Mousawi, then outlined the case, saying Saddam was closely involved in planning retaliation after an assassination attempt against him as he drove through Dujail in July 1982. Al-Mousawi said the prosecution had videos of Saddam interrogating four Dujail residents soon after his motorcade was fired on.

portion of the drunk-driving charge that alleged negligent operation of a motor vehicle was dropped, as well as an additional charge of driving while under the influence of alcohol as part of the plea agreement.

Student reaction to Winchester's sentence was mixed.

"The sentence sounds appropriate," said Jason Herrmann, a sophomore math major. "Anyone who's spent a night in jail understands why it's appropriate."

Jimin Ha, also a sophomore math major, says hit-and-run accidents like these are rare.

"The sentence doesn't sound too unfair," Ha said.

Other students are not as forgiving.

"I don't think it's fair that she gets to finish her semester," said Jenna Carreiro, a junior theater major.

"I think the sentence is too short," said Mohammed Zafar, a Hospitality and Tourism Management graduate student. "The seriousness of the crime warrants more punitive disciplinary action."

"The victim's life was affected as she lost time at school," said Zafar. "The consequences are just too great. They're innumerable to her and her family."

Payano suggests making connections with legislatures

Payano also asked the Academic Policy committee to research the idea of an online faculty rating system so students could grade professors individually.

"If we make an effort to voice students concerns with faculty, I'm sure that professors will be open to a rating system," said Payano.

Payano also introduced a new committee that would help lower tuition costs. He believes that by senators creating a stronger bond with officials from around the state, it will ease the process of lowering tuition.

"In order to make sure the school is adequately funded, the SGA has to take a very strong interest in making connections with our legislators," said Payano. "I'm hoping that this committee, once formed, can meet with a lot of state representatives and the Board of Trustees."

In other senate action, the devastation caused by hurricanes on the Gulf Coast has motivated a wide coalition of groups led by the Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Groups (MASSPIRG), to hold a fundraiser dodge ball tournament on Oct. 22 at 2:00 p.m. at Curry Hicks Cage gymnasium.

Teams of six can register at a cost of $75. Teams that register early are given a lower price.

The tournament will use standard dodgeball rules, which require two teams of six to face off with six balls per game. Students throw balls at opposing team members. Those hit are out, and the team that remains in the game the longest wins.

According to MASSPIRG employee, Kate Gilbert, team costumes are encouraged.

MASSPIRG is continuing its fundraising efforts for Hurricane victims after the Skip-A-Meal event they organized with UMass Dining Services in September, which raised approximately $6,000 for Oxfam.

SGA President Pavel Payano addresses the Senate at last night's meeting. He suggested that Senators research the idea of a faculty rating system.

As water recedes, officials still worried about Taunton dam

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

TAUNTON — The water pressing against a battered wooden dam continued to recede Wednesday, but officials kept a wary eye on a weekend forecast calling for more heavy rain and flooding.

School was canceled for a second day, businesses stayed shuttered, and thousands of residents remained stranded from their homes because of the 173-year-old Whittenton Pond Dam, which buckled and splintered, but so far had held.

Mayor Robert G. Nunes said crews continued working to ease pressure on the dam by allowing water through it and another dam farther upstream. The water in Lake Sabbatia, above the dam, dropped by more than six inches since Tuesday but remained several feet above normal.

"The good news: dry weather until Saturday," Nunes said at a midday news conference. "The bad news: significant rain on Sunday."

Forecasters said Hurricane Wilma could cross Florida before heading north through the Atlantic toward New England. A separate system now in the Midwest could also bring rain by the weekend, National Weather Service meteorologist Matthew Belk said.

"The flooding danger this weekend is starting to shape up to be fairly significant," he said. "Our ground is pretty saturated now."

Fire Chief Joe Rose said a team of dam experts was watching the river level and making calculations to gauge the dam's structural integrity and determine how much more water it can withstand. Officials fear a dam break would send a 6-foot wall of water surging through downtown Taunton, about a half-mile downstream.

The city will remain under a state of emergency until early next week, Nunes said, but he could not say when residents and business owners would be allowed back.

"This is a minute-by-minute situation," Nunes said. "Until we can really get some assurances that things will be OK, it's really a wait-and-see situation."

Sen. John Kerry, who visited the dam site Wednesday with other lawmakers, urged people to be patient.

"We're really left in a position where we have to pray and hope that the situation will not worsen," he said.

The water at the Whittenton Pond Dam in Taunton receded yesterday, but officials are still concerned the dam will give way and flood the downtown if heavy rains visit the area.

As Taunton saw more than seven inches of rain last weekend, bringing the monthly total to more than 11 inches and pushing the Mill River to near-flood levels, The Whittenton Pond Dam buckled and Nunes ordered the evacuation of neighborhoods downstream. The situation worsened Tuesday after some of the dam's timbers washed away and residents and business owners were told to stay away.

Anthony and Dianne Lentini's downtown deli and convenience store remained closed, but they were there Tuesday to do some cleaning. "We can't just sit at home and do nothing," Dianne said.

Anthony Lentini said the couple was losing $1,000 a day in lost business and spoiled food because of the evacuation.

"We can't go on like this," he said. "What is the breaking point? I don't know. At some point I'm not going to be able to keep the doors open. I have rent coming up soon."

Kerry and Sen. Edward Kennedy said they'll push for a quick federal assistance for residents and business owners displaced by the crisis. But Anthony Lentini was skeptical.

"How long is that going to take?" he said. "We're not the only ones. Everyone around us is losing money every day."

Clara Brosnan, 54, has been living at a Red Cross shelter at the high school with her daughter and granddaughter since evacuating their riverside home on Monday.

"I'm tired of it," she said. "But you have to go with the flow. I'm hoping we don't have to stay much longer, but if we have to we have to."

Taunton, a working-class city of 50,000 about 40 miles south of Boston, last flooded in 1968, when the same dam was breached. It was once a hub for the textile and silversmithing industries, and the 12-foot Whittenton Pond Dam was built in 1832 to power nearby mills. It no longer serves any industrial use and was bought two years ago by Jefferson Development of Leominster.

It is one of about 3,000 privately owned dams in the state and was inspected two years ago and found to be in fair condition. One of the owners, Steve Poelaert, said work to restore the dam was to have begun last Friday, but was delayed because of the heavy rain.

Gov. Mitt Romney has ordered the emergency inspection of all dams in the state that pose a risk of deaths or destroyed property if they were to breach.

Nations bracing for most intense hurricane ever in Atlantic

By Freddy Cuevas
Associated Press

SAN PEDRO SULA, Honduras — The fringes of Hurricane Wilma lashed Caribbean nations on Wednesday, forcing schools to close and thousands to evacuate as it churned toward Mexico's Cancun resort and Florida after killing at least 12 people and becoming the most intense storm ever to form in the Atlantic.

The National Hurricane Center in Miami warned that Wilma would be a "significant threat" to Florida by the weekend in a season that has already seen devastation from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Officials ordered tourists out of the Florida Keys.

"We had well over 1,000 lives lost in Katrina. If Wilma, you know, comes into the U.S., to the Florida coast as a Category 3 or 4 hurricane, the potential for large loss of life is with us," said hurricane center director Max Mayfield.

The White House, stung by criticism that it had not responded quickly enough to Katrina, promised to stay on top of the situation. "We are closely monitoring what is an extremely dangerous storm," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan. "People should take this hurricane very seriously."

Tourists packed Cancun's airport in hopes of catching flights out and MTV postponed its Video Music Awards Latin America ceremony, originally scheduled for Thursday, at a seaside park south of the resort town.

Floridians braced for the storm by boarding up windows and stocking up on supplies, although forecasters at the hurricane center said the forward motion of the Category 5 storm appeared to be slowing, which could cause it to eventually weaken.

Mayfield said Wilma may not reach the Florida Keys until Saturday, possibly toward the evening. It had earlier been expected to reach the Florida mainland Saturday. It was still a Category 5 storm with 160 mph winds, down from 175 mph earlier in the day.

Heavy rain from Wilma's outer bands also forced evacuations in Honduras, Cuba, Jamaica and Haiti — even as much of Central America and southern Mexico was still recovering from Hurricane Stan, which left more than 1,500 people dead or missing.

Wilma was on a curving course that would carry it through the narrow channel between Cuba and Mexico on Friday, possibly within a few miles of Cancun and Cozumel. At 5 p.m. EDT, Wilma was centered about 285 miles southeast of Mexico's Cozumel island and about 465 miles south-southwest of Key West. It was moving west-northwest near 7 mph.

Cobb, a meteorologist at the hurricane center.

Jim Cox boards up windows at his home in Islamorada, Fla. in the Florida Keys. Visitors to the islands were ordered to evacuate yesterday as Hurricane Wilma moves up the east coast.

The bad calls we must live with

Jon Brandt

For the past week those who follow sports have had a lot of things to talk about; UMass won their Homecoming game in dramatic fashion with a game winning field goal, USC beat Notre Dame in a game that will go down as one of the best of the season and of course, the American League and National League Championship Series have kept baseball fans on the edge of their seats. Unless you were hiding in a hole for the last few days, you would have heard about the blown call in the second game of the American League Championship Series, which has had everyone from Chris Berman to Brian Williams debating the issue. For those of you who do not know what I am talking about, allow me to bring you up to speed.

It's Game 2, bottom of the ninth, two outs and the game is tied. Kelvim Escobar is pitching to A.J. Pierzynski. Escobar throws a low pitch, which Pierzynski misses. The umpire, Doug Eddings, rules that third-string catcher, Josh Paul, did not catch the ball directly from Escobar, so the third and final out of the inning had not been recorded. However, after Paul catches the pitch, he flips the ball back to the mound just as Eddings is making the "out" signal with his fist. Because of this, the entire Angels infield begins to run back to the dugout.

> ...We have a bunch of angry fans arguing that baseball should have instant replay, just like the instant replay they have in football. This is a horrible idea which would ruin the game.

As the ball rolls back to the middle of the diamond, Pierzynski makes his way safely to first base. This ultimately leads to the next batter hitting a game winning double, tying the series at 1-1, rather than the Angels potentially going up 2-0. Upon looking over the replay it appeared as though the catcher did in fact make the catch, which would have ended the inning. Now we have a bunch of angry fans arguing that baseball should have instant replay, just like the instant replay they have in football. This is a horrible idea which would ruin the game.

The game of baseball is set up to put all of the trust in the umpire. He has the final say and no matter how much the manager wants to argue and yell there is nothing that can be done to change his decision. Everything in baseball is about judgment, from how fast to run to catch a fly ball to where the strike zone is. If you take away the right of the umpire to make the call then you undermine his authority in the game.

Strike zones are always an issue in baseball. It depends on the umpire and his interpretation of what a strike or a ball is. No manager has ever agreed with a call that went against his team, and if they institute an instant replay then every time there is a close call the manager is going to throw his little red flag and stop the game play for 10 minutes while the umpires have a meeting. Is this really what we want to do?

There have always been bad calls in baseball games that caused uproars. Seasons have been ended because of bad calls, so if instant replays were instituted, would we have to go back and review all of those calls as well? The first thing that comes to my mind is in the 1999 ALCS between the Red Sox and Yankees. The "phantom tag" that Chuck Knoblauch put on Jose Offerman caused an inning ending double play instead of a man on second with one out and Nomar Garciaparra at bat. This botched call by umpire Tim Tschida not only took the momentum out of the game for the Sox, but the entire series. Oh yeah, the Yankees went on to win the World Series that year. Should we take away their rings and make them take down their banner because we now have the power of hindsight?

Once the smoke has cleared and everyone has gotten their heads back, the issue will most likely be dropped just like it always is, but there is a valuable lesson to be learned from this. Just because one umpire made a bad call there is no reason to run and put all the blame on him and fault the game itself. The man was doing his job to the best of his ability, and while we all have our own opinions and think we can do it better, he has an enormous weight of pressure on him that we could never understand. Bad calls always happen, but that is a part of the game that you need to deal with and if you can't then you shouldn't be watching.

New dorms may raise class issue

Gilad Skolnick

Recent rumors around campus have circulated saying the new dormitories that are under construction, dubbed the "North Residential Area," will cost students more money to live in than the other dorms. The first new dorms to be built by the University in over 30 years, these dorms look like they're going to be wonderful, sporting suites of four single bedrooms with two full bathrooms, two full kitchens, air conditioning and a lot of common areas.

I hope that the rumors about the North Residential Area costing more stay rumors. If the University of Massachusetts Amherst starts separating students in the dorms by economic class, it will be a great shame. I strongly hope that UMass does not descend down this awful path that so many other fine universities have fallen down.

One might ask, why shouldn't they pay more, they're getting more? After all, many schools have recently created more luxurious dormitories on their campuses and charged more for students to live there.

This is a terrible move though, as it starts to segregate students by economic class and creates an unhealthy environment. The dormitories are the one place in our society where we have all been more or less equal, and now there is talk about destroying that. Living in the dorms on campus is the one time in our lives where poor and rich can live next to each other; a priceless experience that should not be taken away. Where else can we meet and mingle and learn from people from all different economic backgrounds, thus experiencing different lives and perspectives?

Imagine if all of the wealthy students lived in one residential area and all the poorer students in another. Thus wealthy students could befriend wealthy students, poorer students could befriend their neighbors and we could separate the students by class, destroying our brief few years of utopia in this semi-classless society.

I am aware that there is a lot of separation by class already here, but when you start governing where people live, that's when it's opening Pandora's Box. Already those that can afford it live off campus in their junior and senior years, have cars, etc., but the one island of equality in this sea of capitalism has been the University campus. Let us preserve it, not butcher it.

> I am aware that there is a lot of separation by class already here, but when you start governing where people live, that's when it's opening Pandora's Box.

Imagine if we did go down this slippery slope, and then perhaps we could have more expensive Dining Commons for these students too, with more luxurious food and the more affluent students can only eat with one another as well. UMass might as well charge people more money for more expensive majors. For example, majors where professors got paid more or those with smaller classes could cost more and cheaper majors would cost less. That way less affluent students can stick with each other.

Most people who I have talked to are under the impression that only juniors and seniors will be able to live in these dorms. That's fine, but as long as it is on campus it should be more or less equal to the cost of a dormitory in any other building. I am also aware that there are slight price differences between some dorms, but these prices aren't significant enough to prevent economically disadvantaged students from living there.

There is also talk about UMass' need to remain competitive with other schools, but if that is the case UMass should concentrate on increasing the number of professors and lecturers so that students have a higher selection of courses. Or alternately, so students don't have to wait to get into a certain popular class.

Perhaps these new dorms can select people on the basis of merit; those with certain GPAs, a certain involvement in activities or some other scale can decide who is worthy of these new dormitories.

Ideally, I don't think we should have to pay a cent for higher education. It should be a right, just like high school is, but as long as we do have to pay for it, UMass should put in an effort to make it as egalitarian as possible. This is still a state school, not a private school, and it should continue to act like one by promoting equality in all forms on campus.

Health care system stands strong

David Shenkenberg

"There ain't no such thing as a free lunch," is not just a colloquialism but a truth. The Democratic platform has begun to include "free health care for everyone," and that reminded me of the previous quote. How is that possible? Are doctors, nurses and pharmaceutical companies going to start offering free services?

I think that the old and poor need our help. Let's face it; it would be unkind to our fellow man if we neglect our grandfathers and our friends' grandfathers. Thankfully, we already have Medicare and Medicaid. These are not perfect systems, and we need to be proactive and fix the government systems that are in place. I'm not advocating complacency, but "free health care for everyone" is going to lead to future problems and is itself a lie.

Across the board, the government pays its employees less than private companies. Thus, doctors and others in the health care industry will be paid less. This will result in dumb doctors. If we as a nation have punishing, weed-out organic chemistry courses and MCATs without a corresponding pay increase, who will want to run that gauntlet? I don't know about you, but becoming an accountant is looking very good right now. Let's face it; less people will want to go to medical school if there are unbelievably tough requirements and low pay. So, requirements will be lowered and those below-average and average people that thought about becoming a doctor will succeed, and we will have dumb doctors.

> Besides hurting those that work hard to get where they are, this universal health care will never come into effect if we punish people that already don't benefit from universal health care by hiking their taxes.

Secondly, drug companies will not make new drugs. Drug discovery is not an exact science, and the inevitable multimillion dollar lawsuits come because our basic understanding of biology simply is not as advanced as our understanding of basic physics, for example. People work in the pharmaceutical industry because the multi-million dollar lawsuits and hours of grueling research are countered by billion dollar drugs. Why will people continue to work in this most challenging of industries if the payoff is not there?

Government health care will not deliver the best health care. Your doctor cares about your health, and the healthiest option is often the latest drug, made possible by the pharmaceutical companies' grueling hours of research. Insurance lawyers and government workers don't give a damn about you. They force doctors to choose the cheapest option. This is already happening with HMOs, Medicare and Medicaid. My father, a physician, once got into an argument with an insurance company over a prescribed drug. He wanted to prescribe the right drug for the patient, and the company wanted the cheapest drug. He finally threatened to file criminal charges of practicing without a license after he asked the company's hired "doctor," who had a British license, if he had a right to determine the patient's proper care. Proponents of government health care, this is your future.

Government health care means a tax hike. For the Democrats, this usually means taxing "the rich," which people have no problem with when it means the filthy rich like Bill Gates, except it realistically means a tax hike for those making $200,000 and above. There is a surprisingly high 35 percent tax for (once again) doctors and those others who are not as rich as Bill Gates. Besides hurting those that work hard to get where they are, this universal health care will never come into effect if we punish people that already don't benefit from universal health care by hiking their taxes.

Are we all sick? My graduate program, for one, offers mandatory health care for everyone. Does this benefit a healthy 24-year-old? I rarely even have colds. Surely, the mandatory health care is a reason for administrators to give us less pay.

Speaking of Great Britain, they supposedly have a great government health care system, which causes many patients to die waiting in line for the government to get to their case. Canada also has a system which doesn't apply to older patients. (Sorry, Gramps.) "Good enough for government work," is a truism, like "there ain't no such thing as a free lunch."

Truly, people who want "free" government health care also want the best health care. I'm sure that these people want free gasoline and free clothing as well. So do I. However, this is illogical. In life, nothing is free and it is unrealistic to believe that it will be. The best system is the one we have. Those that have the money can afford the best health care, but those that are less fortunate can already be taken care of by government programs.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

ADEQUACY EXPECTED, NOT PERFECTION

I think it's poor form when a newspaper staff member writes a diatribe against his paper's readers. I'm one of the people Nick Belanger "can't think of anything more pathetic than," according to his Oct 18 tirade, "Collegian's hidden agenda." I'll often spend my break between morning classes reading the Daily Collegian with red pen in hand, marking any errors I find, and this is exactly what Belanger's invective was directed against.

It's not that I don't appreciate the Daily Collegian — quite the contrary. I read it and like having it around. Frequent and glaring errors degrade it, though, and it's sad that instead of working to address these blatant issues, staff complain about their readers. (I personally mark mistakes as much for practice as anything else. I've done editing work in the past, although it's far from my primary interests.)

I find it hard to take the Daily Collegian seriously when it contains so many errors, from constant spelling and grammar mistakes to having the leading headline confuse the killer and the victim.

Nobody is expecting perfection from a daily student newspaper, but these are not rare overlooked details. There have been articles so bad I simply cannot imagine they were even proofread, which is inexcusable. While there may be underlying issues causing these problems, they need to be addressed if the staff intends for the Daily Collegian to be a credible publication.

While unrelated to his initial rant, Belanger also notes that the Daily Collegian will not publish unsigned letters to the editor. I find this interesting, since unsigned editorials that represent the majority opinion of the newspaper staff are frequently seen. Why are they unwilling to publish anonymous opinions from others when they often hide behind the shield of an unsigned majority themselves?

Anonymous speech is a critical aspect of the free press. Having the ability to say something without fear of personal repercussions is important, and without it many opinions are going to be voluntarily suppressed. While it's certainly the prerogative of the newspaper staff to refuse to publish anonymous content, it's unfortunate that they have made that choice.

Belanger invites critics to join the newspaper staff, but existing quality issues and attitudes like his actively discourage this.

Interested in dance, funk, rap, hip-hop and soul? "BREAK! The Urban Funk Spectacular Special 30th Anniversary Event" on Friday at 7:30 p.m. features a day-long cast of dance groups/artists who have performed with such groups/artists as 50 Cent, P.Diddy, Usher, Jackson, Rage, Stars and many others. Tickets are available to students from the Fine Arts Center for $7-$15. As a kick off to upcoming Breakdance Competition and Hip Hop Peace Summit at 7444 in the Student Union Ballroom, the artists will perform with the "BREAK" show.

We thought this would be of great interest to students," said Steven Farley, Director, marketing assistant at the Fine Arts Center. "It's young and current, and the group will be giving [out] a whole variety of movements in the show. [Over Time has] been around for 30 years of hip-hop dancing, with its [roots] in inner-city [areas]. "Break" is made up of [five] [fea]tures: dance, MC, graffiti, and fashion. [You'll] see a medley of [the] old [that's] [mixed] with the new. [It's] an assortment of [styles] presented, such as breaking, [and] popping, and [locking]. [Some] [dancers] are [trained] [through] [dance] [schools]. [They] [are] [choreographed] [for] each [dance] [style].

This event is sponsored [by] [Associ]ation [for] [Multi]cultural [Affa]irs (AMA), [Pro]gram [Board], [Cam]pus Life, Fine [Arts] Center, [Stu]dent Union [Ballroom] and [Student] Activities and Campus Life. According to Farley, this program is the first of its collaboration, the next being "911 PEACE Mix." This is able by Global Music Festival. The Grammy-nominated group will be performing Tuesday's theatrical "Mix" [event].

"[It] also includes many artists [who] have been on MTV and [most] [of] them are [from] the [Boston] [area]. "[BREAK] is [for] [just] one [of] the [best performers] with [ethnic] [spices] [from] the MTV Music Awards and alongside Usher in Atlanta. Formed [in] '05 of the [American] [group] (Chet Stanwick) is the [creator] of [using] [music] on the turntables and [involved] widely in hip-hop [appearing] [with] [Missy] [Elliot] on [stage] [at] Alicia Keys' [concert]. SHAKE has [been] [featured] [in] the Miami [Herald] [and] [has] [performed] [at] [the] [Miami] [Arena] [with] [Jay-Z], [Method] Man, [Redman], [Ludacris], [Mystikal], [and] [more]. [She] [was] [also] [featured] [on] [Jennifer] [Lopez's] [album] [with] [Sean] [Combs] [and] [Will] [Smith].

"The group is incredibly energetic," [Farley] [said]. "They will be [very] [interactive] [with] [the] [audience]. [This] [is] [their] [first] [visit] [to] [the] [area] [with] [a] [full] [hour] [with] [this] [group] [of] [12] [performers]. [They] [have] [a] [wide] [range] [of] [style]."

Farley added that 12 students have already signed up for the Breakdance [Competition], which begins at the Fine Arts Center [at] [7] [p.m.] [on] [Tuesday] [in] [the] [Student] [Union] [Ballroom]. [Farley] [said] [the] [first] [12] [students] [to] [sign] [up] [for] [the] [Breakdance] [Competition] [will] [perform] [at] "BREAK" [on] [Friday].

"We only have like 300 tickets left, we're almost sold out," Farley said. "I hope that everyone enjoys it. We're just hoping this is the start of events [that] [like] [this] [and] [celebrate] [cultural] [diversity] [for] [students] [that] [really] [interest] [them] [and] [involve] [them] [in] [the] [UMass] [community]."

Farley was speaking of the partnership shared between her organization and Student Activities and Campus Life. Foo Fighters, Weezer teach fans how to 'Fly' in Worcester

By Matt O'Rourke

Some will argue that the best surfing is in California — unless, of course, your kind of surfing is crowd surfing. In that case, there was no better place to catch a wave this past weekend than the DCU Center (formerly the Centrum) in Worcester, as the Weezer and Foo Fighters co-headlining tour rolled in.

When the two acts announced that they would be co-headlining a tour together this fall, it was a dream come true for some fans of modern rock. And to top it off, Hot Hot Heat was selected as an opening act, a band that has been garnering increasing attention on the airwaves with their album "Elevators."

Weezer made their grand entrance into the DCU Center with the Disney classic "When You Wish Upon a Star," perhaps as a way of acknowledging this dream. The crowd of 12,000 was spattered with fans sporting vintage Ramones, Led Zeppelin and The Who t-shirts, and the backdrop featured album art from Weezer's latest "Make Believe."

Weezer was out to please fans new and old — the set included hits such as "My Name is Jonas," which featured a crowd sing-along, "El Scorcho," "Undone (The Sweater Song)," and "Beverly Hills," where beach balls began to fly around the arena.

The band didn't limit themselves to their assigned instruments or songs from their catalog. At varying points during the show, Rivers Cuomo found himself playing set while Patrick Wilson picked up the lead guitar, eventually leading to a cover of Blur's "Song 2." The track pumped up the crowd, as the mass of people in the general admission pit soon become airborne.

"This is show number 18 in the Foo-Weezer headlining tour," Cuomo announced to the crowd at one point. "It's been pretty darn great."

"Big Me" was also covered, which proved to be an interesting contrast for the show as they played a bit of the other headlining act.

For the encore set, fans were treated to a special rendition of "Island in the Sun" where Cuomo walked to the back of DCU Center to play acoustically on a small platform. A bigger treat for fans of the "Blue" and "Green" albums were the closers — "Hash Pipe," with its heavy metal guitar feel, and "Buddy Holly," perhaps the best track of the night and the perfect ending with Brian Bell's Frampton-esque singing guitar.

After a brief 30-minute interlude, the stage was set for Foo Fighters. At this point, fans were jam-packed throughout the building, waiting in anticipation for another set of pure rock.

With a blaring guitar solo, Dave Grohl launched Foo with the title track off of their fifth album, "In Your Honor." With fists pumping into the air and a small mosh pit forming, the crowd felt the adrenaline rush as much as the band.

Foo Fighters lead singer Dave Grohl (above), pleased both hardcore rock fans and those who prefer a softer sound with a half-electric, half-full band version of their rock anthem, "Everlong," at the DCU Center.

Shadid has citizens'-eye view of war in 'Night Draws Near'

By Matthew Kovacs
Collegian Correspondent

IN HIS BOOK, "Night Draws Near: Iraq's People in the Shadow of American War," the Oklahoma Gazette's former American reporter Anthony Shadid writes that "the [U.S.] occupation ... has killed more people in this country than Saddam Hussein ever did." And he goes on to say that "the greatest source of terrorism in Iraq is the occupation itself."

Shadid's book, "Night Draws Near: Iraq's People in the Shadow of American War," the Oklahoma Gazette's former American reporter, or embedded journalist, recounts his year living in Iraq from before the invasion through the controversy that continues to swirl today.

Using an array of odds, Iraqis emerge as the most obvious victims of the war and occupation. Shadid writes
